Berta Garlan (1900)

Original German Title: 'Frau Bertha Garlan'

Translated by J. H. Wisdom, 1914

Widely regarded as one of the most significant representatives of Viennese Modernism, Arthur Schnitzler is celebrated for his psychological dramas and narratives that capture turn-of-the-century Viennese bourgeois life. Schnitzler was born at Praterstrasse 16, Leopoldstadt, Vienna, capital of the Austrian Empire. He was the son of a prominent Hungarian laryngologist, Johann Schnitzler (1835-1893), and Luise Markbreiter (1838-1911), a daughter of the Viennese doctor Philipp Markbreiter. Following in the footsteps of his father, Schnitzler began studying medicine at the University of Vienna in 1879 and six years later he received his doctorate. He began work at Vienna's General Hospital, but in time abandoned the practice of medicine in favour of pursuing a career in literature.

His first novel, Frau Bertha Garlan, appeared in 1901 in the literary journal Neue Deutsche Rundschau in Berlin. A few weeks later, S. Fischer, the journal's publisher, released it in book format. It would form the first part of a series of novels later coined with the name of the 'Woman' trilogy. Each instalment concerns the dilemmas facing an Austrian upper middle-class female protagonist, hemmed in by the strictures of modern day society. In this first novel, Bertha Garlan, a widow living in a small town, encounters her childhood sweetheart, the celebrated violin virtuoso Emil Lindbach, in Vienna. The story charts her attempts to escape the provincial confines of her existence.

We learn that before her marriage, Bertha was friends with Emil, at the time a student at the Vienna Conservatory. After she was forced to abandon her studies at her father's behest, the two friends lost touch, partly because she found Emil's advances too direct. After the death of her parents, Bertha married the older insurance clerk Victor Matthias Garlan, more out of a sense of duty than love, and moved with him to a small town, not far from Vienna, to live with his relatives.

The story opens three years after Bertha has mourned her unexpectedly deceased husband. Since then, she has lived alone with her young son, Fritz. She gives piano lessons and often depends on the goodwill of her brother-in-law and sister-in-law. In town, she has a suitor with a dubious reputation, Mr. Klingemann, in whom she shows little interest. Bertha feels a longing to escape the small-town atmosphere. Her role model is her neighbour Anna Rupius, whose husband is paralysed at home. One day, Bertha joins Mrs. Rupius and travels with her to Vienna to order some new clothes. While there she sees a concert poster announcing a charity concert featuring Emil. Now, her thoughts keep returning to her first love.

Back in her small town, Bertha takes a newspaper article about Emil's appointment as Royal Bavarian Chamber Virtuoso as an opportunity to write to him. She receives a reply almost immediately. They subsequently arrange to meet on her next trip to the city. They meet at the Kunsthistorisches Museum. The conversation is initially rather halting, as Emil reveals very little about himself. They arrange a second meeting for the evening. After dinner in a private room, Emil and Bertha spend a passionate night in an apartment he has rented specifically for this purpose. Bertha would like to spend more time with him before her return journey, but he declines, citing other commitments. Upon her return, Berta openly confesses her unconditional love in a letter, stating that she intends to move to Vienna. However, can Bertha expect to find her love reciprocated from her erstwhile lover?

The novel has been noted for its autobiographical connection to Schnitzler's reunion with his childhood sweetheart Franziska Reich (1862-1930) – "his little Fännchen" — then a widow living in Bielitz. In May 1899, they met again at the Secession building, echoing the reunion of Berta and Emil. The brief affair that unfolded in the following days was more significant for her than for him, as can be seen from her letters and his diary.

Like Schnitzler's later novella Frau Beate und ihr Sohn (1913), the events, despite the chosen third-person narrative style, are provided exclusively from the protagonist's perspective, encompassing not only external events, but also her detailed thoughts and dreams. Both novels centre on a young widow who, after a long period of abstinence, throws herself into a love affair, revels in the overwhelming erotic sensations, but is both disappointed by her lover and unable to resolve the contradictions and double standards of societal codes of conduct.

SHE WAS WALKING slowly down the hill; not by the broad high road which wound its way towards the town, but by the narrow footpath between the trellises of the vines. Her little boy was with her, hanging on to her hand and walking all the time a pace in front of her, because there was not room on the footpath for them to walk side by side.

The afternoon was well advanced, but the sun still poured down upon her with sufficient power to cause her to pull her dark straw hat a little further down over her forehead and to keep her eyes lowered. The slopes, at the foot of which the little town lay nestling, glimmered as though seen through a golden mist; the roofs of the houses below glistened, and the river, emerging yonder amongst the meadows outside the town, stretched, shimmering, into the distance. Not a quiver stirred the air, and it seemed as if the cool of the evening was yet far remote.

Bertha stooped for a moment and glanced about her. Save for her boy, she was all alone on the hillside, and around her brooded a curious stillness. At the cemetery, too, on the hilltop, she had not met anybody that day, not even the old woman who usually watered the flowers and kept the graves tidy, and with whom Bertha used often to have a chat. Bertha felt that somehow a considerable time had elapsed since she had started on her walk, and that it was long since she had spoken to anyone.

The church clock struck — six. So, then, scarcely an hour had passed since she had left the house, and an even shorter time since she had stopped in the street to chat with the beautiful Frau Rupius. Yet even the few minutes which had slipped away since she had stood by her husband's grave now seemed to be long past.

"Mamma!"

Suddenly she heard her boy call. He had slipped his hand out of hers and had run on ahead.

"I can walk quicker than you, mamma!"

"Wait, though! Wait, Fritz!" exclaimed Bertha. "You're not going to leave your mother alone, are you?"

She followed him and again took him by the hand.

"Are we going home already?" asked Fritz.

"Yes; we will sit by the open window until it grows quite dark."

Before long they had reached the foot of the hill and they began to walk towards the town in the shade of the chestnut trees which bordered the high-road, now white with dust. Here again they met but few people. Along the road a couple of wagons came towards them, the drivers, whip in hand, trudging along beside the horses. Then two cyclists rode by from the town towards the country, leaving clouds of dust behind them. Bertha stopped mechanically and gazed after them until they had almost disappeared from view.

In the meantime Fritz had clambered up onto the bench beside the road.

"Look, mamma! See what I can do!"

He made ready to jump, but his mother took hold of him by the arms and lifted him carefully to the ground. Then she sat down on the bench.

"Are you tired?" asked Fritz.

"Yes," she answered, surprised to find that she was indeed feeling fatigued.

It was only then that she realized that the sultry air had wearied her to the point of sleepiness. She could not, moreover, remember having experienced such warm weather in the middle of May.

From the bench on which she was sitting she could trace back the course of the path down which she had come. In the sunlight it ran between the vine-trellises, up and up, until it reached the brightly gleaming wall of the cemetery. She was in the habit of taking a walk along that path two or three times a week. She had long since ceased to regard such visits to the cemetery as anything other than a mere walk. When she wandered about the well-kept gravel paths amongst the crosses and the tombstones, or stood offering up a silent prayer beside her husband's grave, or, maybe, laying upon it a few wild flowers which she had plucked on her way up, her heart was scarcely any longer stirred by the slightest throb of pain. Three years had, indeed, passed since her husband had died, which was just as long as their married life had lasted.

Her eyes closed and her mind went back to the time when she had first come to the town, only a few days after their marriage — which had taken place in Vienna. They had only indulged in a modest honeymoon trip, such as a man in humble circumstances, who had married a woman without any dowry, could treat himself to. They had taken the boat from Vienna, up the river, to a little village in Wachau, not far from their future home, and had spent a few days there. Bertha could still remember clearly the little inn at which they had stayed, the riverside garden in which they used to sit after sunset, and those quiet, rather tedious, evenings which were so completely different from those her girlish imagination had previously pictured to her as the evenings which a newly-married couple would spend. Of course, she had had to be content.

She was twenty-six years old and quite alone in the world when Victor Mathias Garlan had proposed to her. Her parents had recently died. A long time before, one of her brothers had gone to America to seek his fortune as a merchant. Her younger brother was on the stage; he had married an actress, and was playing comedy parts in third-rate German theatres. She was almost out of touch with her relations and the only one whom she visited occasionally was a cousin who had married a lawyer. But even that friendship had grown cool as years had passed, because the cousin had become wrapped up in her husband and children exclusively, and had almost ceased to take any interest in the doings of her unmarried friend.

Herr Garlan was a distant relation of Bertha's mother. When Bertha was quite a young girl he had often visited the house and made love to her in a rather awkward way. In those days she had no reasons to encourage him, because it was in another guise that her fancy pictured life and happiness to her. She was young and pretty; her parents, though not actually wealthy people, were comfortably off, and her hope was rather to wander about the world as a great pianiste, perhaps, as the wife of an artist, than to lead a modest existence in the placid routine of the home circle. But that hope soon faded. One day her father, in a transport of domestic fervour, forbade her further attendance at the conservatoire of music, which put an end to her prospects of an artistic career and at the same time to her friendship with the young violinist who had since made such a name for himself.

The next few years were singularly dull. At first, it is true, she felt some slight disappointment, or even pain, but these emotions were certainly of short duration. Later on she had received offers of marriage from a young doctor and a merchant. She refused both of them; the doctor because he was too ugly, and the merchant because he lived in a country town. Her parents, too, were by no means enthusiastic about either suitor.

When, however, Bertha's twenty-sixth birthday passed and her father lost his modest competency through a bankruptcy, it had been her lot to put up with belated reproaches on the score of all sorts of things which she herself had begun to forget — her youthful artistic ambitions, her love affair of long ago with the violinist, which had seemed likely to lead to nothing, and the lack of encouragement which the ugly doctor and the merchant from the country received at her hands.

At that time Victor Mathias Garlan was no longer resident in Vienna. Two years before, the insurance company, in which he had been employed since he had reached the age of twenty, had, at his own request, transferred him, in the capacity of manager, to the recently-established branch in the little town on the Danube where his married brother carried on business as a wine merchant. In the course of a somewhat lengthy conversation which took place on the occasion of his farewell visit to Bertha's parents, and which created a certain impression upon her, he had mentioned that the principal reasons for his asking to be transferred to the little town were that he felt himself to be getting on in years, that he had no longer any idea of seeking a wife, and that he desired to have some sort of a home amongst people who were closely connected with him. At that time Bertha's parents had made fun of his notion, which seemed to them somewhat hypochondriacal, for Garlan was then scarcely forty years old. Bertha herself, however, had found a good deal of common sense in Garlan's reason, inasmuch as he had never appeared to her as, properly speaking, a young man.

In the course of the following years Garlan used often to come to Vienna on business, and never omitted to visit Bertha's family on such occasions. After supper it was Bertha's custom to play the piano for Garlan's entertainment, and he used to listen to her with an almost reverent attention, and would, perhaps, go on to talk of his little nephew and niece — who were both very musical — and to whom he would often speak of Fraulein Bertha as the finest pianiste he had ever heard.

It seemed strange, and Bertha's mother could not refrain from commenting now and again upon it, that, since his diffident wooing in the old days, Herr Garlan had not once ventured so much as to make the slightest further allusion to the past, or even to a possible future. And thus Bertha, in addition to the other reproaches to which she had to listen, incurred the blame for treating Herr Garlan with too great indifference, if not, indeed, with actual coldness. Bertha, however, only shook her head, for at that time she had not so much as contemplated the possibility of marrying this somewhat awkward man, who had grown old before his time.

After the sudden death of her mother, which happened at a time when her father had been lying ill for many months, Garlan reappeared upon the scene with the announcement that he had obtained a month's holiday — the only one for which he had ever applied. It was clearly evident to Bertha that his sole purpose in coming to Vienna was to be of help to her in that time of trouble and distress. And when Bertha's father died a week after the funeral of her mother, Garlan proved himself to be a true friend, and one, moreover, blessed with an amount of energy for which she had never given him credit. He prevailed on his sister-in-law to come to Vienna, so that she could help Bertha to tide over the first few weeks of her bereavement, besides, in some slight degree, distracting her thoughts. He settled the business affairs capably and quickly. His kindness of heart did much to cheer Bertha during those sad days, and when, on the expiration of his leave, he asked her whether she would be his wife she acquiesced with a feeling of the most profound gratitude. She was, of course, aware of the fact that if she did not marry him she would in a few months' time have to earn her own living, probably as a teacher, and, besides, she had come to appreciate Garlan and had become so used to his company that she was able, in all sincerity, to answer "Yes," both when he led her to the altar and subsequently when, as they set off for their honeymoon, he asked her, for the first time, if she loved him.

It was true that at the very outset of their married life she discovered that she felt no love for him. She just let him love her and put up with the fact, at first with a certain surprise at her own disillusionment and afterwards with indifference. It was not until she found that she was about to become a mother that she could bring herself to reciprocate his affection. She very soon grew accustomed to the quiet life of the little town, all the more easily because even in Vienna she had led a somewhat secluded existence. With her husband's family she felt quite happy and comfortable; her brother-in-law appeared to be a most genial and amiable person, if not altogether innocent of an occasional display of coarseness; his wife was good-natured, and inclined at times to be melancholy. Garlan's nephew, who was thirteen years old at the time of Bertha's arrival at the little town, was a pert, good-looking boy; and his niece, a very sedate child of nine, with large, astonished eyes, conceived a strong attachment for Bertha from the very first moment that they met.

When Bertha's child was born, he was hailed by the children as a welcome plaything, and, for the next two years, Bertha felt completely happy. She even believed at times that it was impossible that her fate could have taken a more favourable shape. The noise and bustle of the great city came back to her memory as something unpleasant, almost hazardous; and on one occasion when she had accompanied her husband to Vienna, in order to make a few purchases and it so chanced, to her annoyance, that the streets were wet and muddy with the rain, she vowed never again to undertake that tedious and wholly unnecessary journey of three hours' duration. Her husband died suddenly one spring morning three years after their marriage. Bertha's consternation was extreme. She felt that she had never taken into consideration the mere possibility of such an event. She was left in very straitened circumstances. Soon, however, her sister-in-law, with thoughtful kindness, devised a means by which the widow could support herself without appearing to accept anything in the nature of charity. She asked Bertha to take over the musical education of her children, and also procured for her an engagement as music teacher to other families in the town. It was tacitly understood amongst the ladies who engaged her that they should always make it appear as if Bertha had undertaken these lessons only for the sake of a little distraction, and that they paid her for them only because they could not possibly allow her to devote so much time and trouble in that way without some return. What she earned from this source was quite sufficient to supplement her income to an amount adequate to meet the demands of her mode of living, and so, when time had deadened the first keen pangs and the subsequent sorrow occasioned by her husband's death, she was again quite contented and cheerful. Her life up to then had not been spent in such a way as to cause her now to feel the lack of anything. Such thoughts as she gave to the future were occupied by scarcely any other theme than her son in the successive stages of his growth, and it was only on rare occasions that the likelihood of marrying a second time crossed her mind, and then the idea was always a mere fleeting fancy, for as yet she had met no one whom she was able seriously to regard in the light of a possible second husband. The stirrings of youthful desires, which she sometimes felt within her in her waking morning hours, always vanished as the day pursued its even course. It was only since the advent of the spring that she had felt a certain disturbance of her previous sensation of well-being; no longer were her nights passed in the tranquil and dreamless sleep of heretofore, and at times she was oppressed by a sensation of tedium, such as she had never experienced before. Strangest of all, however, was the sudden access of lassitude which would often come over her even in the daytime, under the influence of which she fancied that she could trace the course of her blood as it circled through her body. She remembered that she had experienced a similar sensation in the days when she was emerging from childhood. At first this feeling, in spite of its familiarity, was yet so strange to her that it seemed as though one of her friends must have told her about it. It was only when it recurred with ever-increasing frequency that she realized that she herself had experienced it before.

She shuddered, with a feeling as though she were waking from sleep. She opened her eyes.

It seemed to her that the air was all a-whirl; the shadows had crept halfway across the road; away up on the hilltop the cemetery wall no longer gleamed in the sunlight. Bertha rapidly shook her head to and fro a few times as though to waken herself thoroughly. It seemed to her as if a whole day and a whole night had elapsed since she had sat down on the bench. How was it, then, that in her consciousness time passed in so disjointed a fashion? She looked around her. Where could Fritz have gone to? Oh, there he was behind her, playing with Doctor Friedrich's children. The nursemaid was on her knees beside them, helping them to build a castle with the sand.

The avenue was now less deserted than it had been earlier in the evening. Bertha knew almost all the people who passed; she saw them every day. As, however, most of them were not people to whom she was in the habit of talking, they flitted by like shadows. Yonder came the saddler, Peter Nowak, and his wife; Doctor Rellinger drove by in his little country trap and bowed to her as he passed; he was followed by the two daughters of Herr Wendelein, the landowner; presently Lieutenant Baier and his fiancee cycled slowly down the road on their way to the country. Then, again, there seemed to be a short lull in the movement before her and Bertha heard nothing but the laughter of the children as they played.

Then, again, she saw that some one was slowly approaching from the town, and she recognized who it was while he was still a long way off. It was Herr Klingemann, to whom of late she had been in the habit of talking more frequently than had previously been her custom. Some twelve years ago or more he had moved from Vienna to the little town. Gossip had it that he had at one time been a doctor, and had been obliged to give up his practice on account of some professional error, or even of some more serious lapse. Some, however, asserted that he had never qualified as a doctor at all, but, failing to pass his examinations, had finally given up the study of medicine. Herr Klingemann, for his own part, gave himself out to be a philosopher, who had grown weary of life in the great city after having enjoyed it to satiety, and for that reason had moved to the little town, where he could live comfortably on what remained of his fortune.

He was now but little more than five-and-forty. There were still times when he was of a genial enough aspect, but, for the most part, he had an extremely dilapidated and disagreeable appearance.

While yet some distance away he smiled at the young widow, but did not hasten his steps. Finally he stopped before her and gave her an ironical nod, which was his habitual manner of greeting people.

"Good evening, my pretty lady!" he said.

Bertha returned his salutation. It was one of those days on which Herr Klingemann appeared to make some claim to elegance and youthfulness. He was attired in a dark grey frock coat, so tightly fitting that he might almost have been wearing stays. On his head was a narrow brimmed brown straw hat with a black band. About his throat, moreover, there was a very tiny red cravat, set rather askew.

For a time he remained silent, tugging his slightly grizzled fair moustache upwards and downwards.

"I presume you have come from up there, my dear lady?" he said.

Without turning his head or even his eyes, he pointed his finger over his shoulder, in a somewhat contemptuous manner, in the direction of the cemetery behind him.

Throughout the town Herr Klingemann was known as a man to whom nothing was sacred, and as he stood before her, Bertha could not help thinking of the various bits of gossip that she had heard about him. It was well known that his relations with his cook, whom he always referred to as his housekeeper, were of a somewhat more intimate nature than that merely of master and servant, and his name was also mentioned in connexion with the wife of a tobacconist, who, as he had himself told Bertha with proud regret, deceived him with a captain of the regiment stationed in the town. Moreover, there were several eligible girls in the neighbourhood who cherished a certain tender interest in him.

Whenever these things were hinted at Herr Klingemann always made some sneering remark on the subject of marriage in general, which shocked the susceptibilities of many, but, on the whole, actually increased the amount of respect in which he was held.

"I have been out for a short walk," said Bertha.

"Alone?"

"Oh, no; with my boy."

"Yes — yes — of course, there he is! Good evening, my little mortal!" — he gazed away over Fritz's head as he said this— “may I sit down for a moment beside you, Frau Bertha?”

He pronounced her name with an ironic inflection and, without waiting for her to reply, he sat down on the bench.

“I heard you playing the piano this morning,” he continued. “Do you know what kind of an impression it made upon me? This: that with you music must take the place of everything.”

He repeated the word “everything” and, at the same time, looked at Bertha in a manner which caused her to blush.

“What a pity I so seldom have the opportunity of hearing you play!” he went on. “If I don’t happen to be passing your open window when you are at the piano—”

Bertha noticed that he kept on edging nearer to her, and that his arm was touching hers. Involuntarily she moved away. Suddenly she felt herself seized from behind, her head pulled back over the bench and a hand clasped over her eyes.

For a moment she thought that it was Klingemann’s hand, which she felt upon her lids.

“Why, you must be mad, sir,” she cried.

“How funny it is to hear you call me ‘Sir,’ Aunt Bertha!” replied the laughing voice of a boy at her back.

“Well, do let me at least open my eyes, Richard,” said Bertha, trying to remove the boy’s hands from her face. “Have you come from home!” she added, turning round towards him.

“Yes, Aunt, and here’s the newspaper which I have brought you.”

Bertha took the paper which he handed to her and began to read it.

Klingemann, meanwhile, rose to his feet and turned to Richard.

“Have you done your exercises already?” he asked.

“We have no exercises at all now, Herr Klingemann, because our final examination is to take place in July.”

“So you will actually be a student by this time next year?”

“This time next year! It’ll be in the autumn!”

As he said this Richard drummed his fingers along the newspaper.

“What do you want, then, you ill-mannered fellow?” asked Bertha.

“I say, Aunt, will you come and visit me when I am in Vienna?”

“Yes, I should like to catch myself! I shall be glad to be rid of you!”

“Here comes Herr Rupius!” said Richard.

Bertha lowered the paper and looked in the direction indicated by her nephew’s glance. Along the avenue leading from the town a maidservant came, pushing an invalid’s chair, in which a man was sitting. His head was uncovered and his soft felt hat was lying upon his knees, from which a plaid rug reached down to his feet. His forehead was lofty; his hair smooth and fair and slightly grizzled at the temples; his feet were peculiarly large. As he passed the bench on which Bertha was seated he only inclined his head slightly, without smiling. Bertha knew that, had she been alone, he would certainly have stopped; moreover, he looked only at her as he passed by, and his greeting seemed to apply to her alone. It seemed to Bertha that she had never before seen such a grave look in his eyes as on this occasion, and she was exceedingly sorry, for she felt a profound compassion for the paralysed man.

When Herr Rupius had passed by, Klingemann said:

“Poor devil! And wifie is away as usual on one of her visits to Vienna, eh?”

“No,” answered Bertha, almost angrily. “I was speaking to her only an hour ago.”

Klingemann was silent, for he felt that further remarks on the subject of the mysterious visits of Frau Rupius to Vienna might not have been in keeping with his own reputation as a freethinker.

“Won’t he really ever be able to walk again?” asked Richard.

“No,” said Bertha.

She knew this for a fact because Herr Rupius had told her so himself on one occasion when she had called on him and his wife was in Vienna.

At that moment Herr Rupius seemed to her to be a particularly pitiful figure, for, as he was being wheeled past her in his invalid’s chair, she had, in reading the paper, lighted upon the name of one whom she regarded as a happy man.

Mechanically she read the paragraph again.

“Our celebrated compatriot Emil Lindbach returned to Vienna a few days ago after his professional tour through France and Spain, in the course of which he met with many a triumphant reception. In Madrid this distinguished artist had the honour of playing before the Queen of Spain. On the 24th of this month Herr Lindbach will take part in the charity concert which has been organized for the relief of the inhabitants of Vorarlberg, who have suffered such severe losses as a result of the recent floods. A keen interest in the concert is being shown by the public in spite of the fact that the season is so far advanced.”

Emil Lindbach! It required a certain effort on Bertha’s part to realize that this was the same man whom she had loved — how many? — twelve years ago. Twelve years! She could feel the hot blood mount up into her brow. It seemed to her as though she ought to be ashamed of having gradually grown older.

The sun had set. Bertha took Fritz by the hand, bade the others good evening, and walked slowly homewards.

She lived on the first floor of a house in a new street. From her windows she had a view of the hill, and opposite were only vacant sites.

Bertha handed Fritz over to the care of the maid, sat down by the window, took up the paper and began to read again. She had kept the custom of glancing through the art news first of all. This habit had been formed in the days of her early childhood, when she and her brother, who was now an actor, used to go to the top gallery of the Burg-Theater together. Her interest in art naturally grew when she attended the conservatoire of music; in those days she had been acquainted with the names of even the minor actors, singers and pianists. Later on, when her frequent visits to the theatres, the studies at the conservatoire and her own artistic aspirations came to an end, there still lingered within her a kind of sympathy, which was not free from the touch of homesickness, towards that joyous world of art. But during the latter portion of her life in Vienna all these things had retained scarcely any of their former significance for her; just as little, indeed, as they had possessed since she had come to reside in the little town, where occasional amateur concerts were the best that was offered in the way of artistic enjoyment. One evening during the first year of her married life, she had taken part in one of these concerts at the “Red Apple” Hotel. She had played two marches by Schubert as a duet with another young lady in the town. On that occasion her agitation had been so great that she had vowed to herself never again to appear in public, and was more than glad that she had given up her hopes of an artistic career.

For such a career a very different temperament from hers was necessary — for example, one like Emil Lindbach’s. Yes, he was born to it! She had recognized that by his demeanour the very moment when she had first seen him step on to the dais at a school concert. He had smoothed back his hair in an unaffected manner, gazed at the people below with sardonic superiority, and had acknowledged the first applause which he had ever received in the calm, indifferent manner of one long accustomed to such things.

It was strange, but whenever she thought of Emil Lindbach she still saw him in her mind's eye as youthful, even boyish, just as he had been in the days when they had known and loved each other. Yet not so long before, when she had spent the evening with her brother-in-law and his wife in a restaurant, she had seen a photograph of him in an illustrated paper, and he appeared to have changed greatly. He no longer wore his hair long; his black moustache was curled downwards; his collar was conspicuously tall, and his cravat twisted in accordance with the fashion of the day. Her sister-in-law had given her opinion that he looked like a Polish count.

Bertha took up the newspaper again and was about to read on, but by that time it was too dark. She rose to her feet and called the maid. The lamp was brought in and the table laid for supper. Bertha ate her meal with Fritz, the window remaining open. That evening she felt an even greater tenderness for her child than usual; she recalled once more to memory the times when her husband was still alive, and all manner of reminiscences passed rapidly through her mind. While she was putting Fritz to bed, her glance lingered for quite a long time on her husband's portrait, which hung over the bed in an oval frame of dark brown wood. It was a full-length portrait; he was wearing a morning coat and a white cravat, and was holding his tall hat in his hand. It was all in memory of their wedding day.

Bertha knew for a certainty, at that moment, that Herr Klingemann would have smiled sarcastically had he seen that portrait.

Later in the evening she sat down at the piano, as was a not infrequent custom of hers before going to bed, not so much because of her enthusiasm for music, but because she did not want to retire to rest too early. On such occasions she played, for the most part, the few pieces which she still knew by heart — mazurkas by Chopin, some passages from one of Beethoven's sonatas, or the Kreisleriana. Sometimes she improvised as well, but never pursued the theme beyond a succession of chords, which, indeed, were always the same.

On that evening she began at once by striking those chords, somewhat more softly than usual; then she essayed various modulations and, as she made the last triad resound for a long time by means of the pedal — her hands were now lying in her lap — she felt a gentle joy in the melodies which were hovering, as it were, about her. Then Klingemann's observation recurred to her.

"With you music must take the place of everything!"

Indeed he had not been far from the truth. Music certainly had to take the place of much.

But everything —? Oh, no!

What was that? Footsteps over the way….

Well, there was nothing remarkable in that. But they were slow, regular footsteps, as though somebody was passing up and down. She stood up and went to the window. It was quite dark, and at first she could not recognize the man who was walking outside. But she knew that it was Klingemann. How absurd! Was he going to haunt the vicinity like a love-sick swain?

"Good evening, Frau Bertha," he said from across the road, and she could see in the darkness that he raised his hat.

"Good evening," she answered, almost confusedly.

"You were playing most beautifully."

Her only answer was to murmur "really?" and that perhaps did not reach his ears.

He remained standing for a moment, then said:

"Good night, sleep soundly, Frau Bertha."

He pronounced the word "sleep" with an emphasis which was almost insolent.

“Now he is going home to his cook!” thought Bertha to herself.

Then suddenly she called to mind something which she had known for quite a long time, but to which she had not given a thought since it had come to her knowledge. It was rumoured that in his room there hung a picture which was always covered with a little curtain because its subject was of a somewhat questionable nature.

Who was it had told her about that picture? Oh, yes, Frau Rupius had told her when they were taking a walk along the bank of the Danube one day last autumn, and she in her turn had heard of it from some one else — Bertha could not remember from whom.

What an odious man! Bertha felt that somehow she was guilty of a slight depravity in thinking of him and all these things. She continued to stand by the window. It seemed to her as though it had been an unpleasant day. She went over the actual events in her mind, and was astonished to find that, after all, the day had just been like many hundreds before it and many, many more that were yet to come.

II

THEY STOOD UP from the table. It had been one of those little Sunday dinner parties which the wine merchant Garlan was in the habit of occasionally giving his acquaintances. The host came up to his sister-in-law and caught her round the waist, which was one of his customs on an afternoon.

She knew beforehand what he wanted. Whenever he had company Bertha had to play the piano after dinner, and often duets with Richard. The music served as a pleasant introduction to a game of cards, or, indeed, chimed in pleasantly with the game.

She sat down at the piano. In the meantime the door of the smoking-room was opened; Garlan, Doctor Friedrich and Herr Martin took their seats at a small baize-covered table and began to play. The wives of the three gentlemen remained in the drawing-room, and Frau Martin lit a cigarette, sat down on the sofa and crossed her legs — on Sundays she always wore dress shoes and black silk stockings. Doctor Friedrich's wife looked at Frau Martin's feet as though fixed to the spot by enchantment. Richard had followed the gentlemen — he already took an interest in a game of taroc. Elly stood with her elbows leaning on the piano waiting for Bertha to begin to play. The hostess went in and out of the room; she was perpetually giving orders in the kitchen, and rattling the bunch of keys which she carried in her hand. Once as she came into the room Doctor Friedrich's wife threw her a glance which seemed to say: "Just look how Frau Martin is sitting there!"

Bertha noticed all those things that day more clearly, as it were, than usual, somewhat after the manner in which things are seen by a person suffering from fever. She had not as yet struck a note. Then her brother-in-law turned towards her and threw her a glance, which was intended to remind her of her duty. She began to play a march by Schubert, with a very heavy touch.

"Softer," said her brother-in-law, turning round again.

"Taroc with a musical accompaniment is a speciality of this house," said Doctor Friedrich.

"Songs without words, so to speak," added Herr Martin.

The others laughed. Garlan turned round towards Bertha again, for she had suddenly left off playing.

"I have a slight headache," she said, as if it were necessary to make some excuse; immediately, however, she felt as though it were beneath her dignity to say that, and she added: "I don't feel any inclination to play."

Everybody looked at her, feeling that something rather out of the common was happening.

"Won't you come and sit by us, Bertha?" said Frau Garlan.

Elly had a vague idea that she ought to show her affection for her aunt, and hung on her arm; and the two of them stood side by side, leaning against the piano.

"Are you going with us to the 'Red Apple' this evening?" Frau Martin asked of her hostess.

"No, I don't think so."

"Ah," broke in Herr Garlan, "if we must forgo our concert this afternoon we will have one in the evening instead — your lead, Doctor."

"The military concert?" asked Doctor Friedrich's wife.

Frau Garlan rose to her feet.

"Do you really mean to go to the 'Red Apple' this evening?" she asked her husband.

"Certainly."

"Very well," she answered, somewhat flustered, and at once went off to the kitchen again to make fresh arrangements.

"Richard," said Garlan to his son; "you might make haste and run over and tell the manager to have a table reserved for us in the garden."

Richard hurried off, colliding in the doorway with his mother, who was just coming into the room. She sank down on the sofa as though exhausted.

"You can't believe," she said to Doctor Friedrich's wife; "how difficult it is to make Brigitta understand the simplest thing."

Frau Martin had gone and sat down beside her husband, at the same time throwing a glance towards Bertha, who was still standing silently with Elly beside the piano. Frau Martin stroked her husband's hair, laid her hand on his knee and seemed to feel that she was under the necessity of showing the company how happy she was.

"I'll tell you what. Aunt," said Elly suddenly to Bertha; "let's go into the garden for a while. The fresh air will drive your headache away."

They went down the steps into the courtyard, in the centre of which a small lawn had been laid out. At the back, it was shut off by a wall, against which stood a few shrubs and a couple of young trees, which still had to be propped up by stakes. Away over the wall only the blue sky was to be seen; in boisterous weather the rush of the river which flowed close by could be heard. Two wicker garden chairs stood with their backs against the wall, and in front of them was a small table. Bertha and Elly sat down, Elly still keeping her arm linked in her aunt's.

"Tell you what, Elly?"

"See, I am quite a big girl now; do tell me about him."

Bertha was somewhat alarmed, for it struck her at once that her niece's question did not refer to her dead husband, but to some one else. And suddenly she saw before her mind's eye the picture of Emil Lindbach, just as she had seen it in the illustrated paper; but immediately both the vision and her slight alarm vanished, and she felt a kind of emotion at the shy question of the young girl who believed that she still grieved for her dead husband, and that it would comfort her to have an opportunity for talking about him.

"May I come down and join you, or are you telling each other secrets?"

Richard's voice came at that moment from a window overlooking the courtyard. For the first time Bertha was struck by the resemblance he bore to Emil Lindbach. She realized, however, that it might perhaps only be the youthfulness of his manner and his rather long hair that put her in mind of Emil. Richard was now nearly as old as Emil had been in the days of her studies at the conservatoire.

"I've reserved a table," he said as he came into the courtyard. "Are you coming with us, Aunt Bertha?"

He sat down on the back of her chair, stroked her cheeks, and said in his fresh, yet rather affected, way:

"You will come, won't you, pretty Aunt, for my sake?"

Mechanically Bertha closed her eyes. A feeling of comfort stole over her, as if some childish hand, as if the little fingers of her own Fritz, were caressing her cheeks. Soon, however, she felt that some other memory as well rose up in her mind. She could not help thinking of a walk in the town park which she had taken one evening with Emil after her lesson at the conservatoire. On that occasion he had sat down to rest beside her on a seat, and had touched her cheeks with tender fingers. Was it only once that that had happened? No — much oftener! Indeed, they had sat on that seat ten or twenty times, and he had stroked her cheeks. How strange it was that all these things should come back to her thoughts now!

She would certainly never have thought of those walks again had not Richard by chance — but how long was she going to put up with his stroking her cheek?

"Richard!" she exclaimed, opening her eyes.

She saw that he was smiling in such a way that she thought that he must have divined what was passing through her mind. Of course, it was quite impossible, because, as a matter of fact, scarcely anybody in the town was aware that she was acquainted with Emil Lindbach, the great violinist. If it came to that, was she really acquainted with him still? It was indeed a very different person from Emil as he must now be that she had in mind — a handsome youth whom she had loved in the days of her early girlhood.

Thus her thoughts strayed further and further back into the past, and it seemed altogether impossible for her to return to the present and chatter with the two children.

She bade them good-bye and went away.

The afternoon sun lay brooding heavily upon the streets of the little town. The shops were shut, the pavements almost deserted. A few officers were sitting at a little table in front of the restaurant in the market square. Bertha glanced up at the windows of the first story of the house in which Herr and Frau Rupius lived. It was quite a long time since she had been to see them. She clearly remembered the last occasion — it was the day after Christmas. It was then that she had found Herr Rupius alone and that he had told her that his affliction was incurable. She also remembered distinctly why she had not called upon him since that day: although she did not admit it to herself, she had a kind of fear of entering that house which she had then left with her mind in a state of violent agitation.

On the present occasion, however, she felt that she must go up; it seemed as though in the course of the last few days a kind of bond had been established between her and the paralysed man, and as though even the glance with which he had silently greeted her on the previous day, when she was out walking, had had some significance.

When she entered the room her eyes had, first of all, to become accustomed to the dimness of the light; the blinds were drawn and a sunbeam poured in only through the chink at the top, and fell in front of the white stove. Herr Rupius was sitting in an armchair at the table in the centre of the room. Before him lay stacks of prints, and he was just in the act of picking up one in order to look at the one beneath it. Bertha could see that they were engravings.

"Thank you for coming to see me once again," he said, stretching out his hand to her. "You see what it is I am busy on just now? Well, it is a collection of engravings after the old Dutch masters. Believe me, my dear lady, it is a great pleasure to examine old engravings."

"Oh, it is, indeed."

"See, there are six volumes, or rather six portfolios, each containing twenty prints. It will probably take me the whole summer to become thoroughly acquainted with them."

Bertha stood by his side and looked at the engraving immediately before him. It was a market scene by Teniers.

"The whole summer," she said absent-mindedly.

Rupius turned towards her.

"Yes, indeed," he said, his jaw slightly set, as though it was a matter of vindicating his point of view; "what I call being thoroughly acquainted with a picture. By that I mean: being able, so to speak, to reproduce it in my mind, line for line. This one here is a Teniers — the original is in one of the galleries at The Hague. Why don't you go to The Hague, where so many splendid examples of the art of Teniers and so many other styles of painting are to be seen, my dear lady?"

Bertha smiled.

"How can I think of making such a journey as that?"

"Yes, yes, of course, that's so," said Herr Rupius; "The Hague is a very beautiful town. I was there fourteen years ago. At that time I was twenty-eight, I am now forty-two — or, I might say, eighty-four" — he picked up the print and laid it aside— "here we have an Ostade— 'The Pipe Smoker.' Quite so, you can see easily enough that he is smoking a pipe. 'Original in Vienna.'"

"I think I remember that picture."

"Won't you come and sit opposite to me, Frau Bertha, or here beside me, if you would care to look at the pictures with me? Now we come to a Falkenborg — wonderful, isn't it? In the extreme foreground, though, it seems so void, so cramped. Yes, nothing but a peasant lad dancing with a girl, and there's an old woman who is cross about it, and here is a house out of the door of which someone is coming with a pail of water. Yes, that is all — a mere nothing of course, but there in the background you see, is the whole world, blue mountains, green towns, the clouded sky above, and near it a tourney — ha! ha! — in a certain sense perhaps it is out of place, but, on the other hand, in a certain sense it may be said to be appropriate. Since everything has a background and it is therefore perfectly right that here, directly behind the peasant's house, the world should begin with its tourneys, and its mountains, its rivers, its fortresses, its vineyards and its forests."

He pointed out the various parts of the picture to which he was referring with a little ivory paper-knife.

"Do you like it?" he continued. "The original also hangs in the Gallery in Vienna. You must have seen it."

"Oh, but it is now six years since I lived in Vienna, and for many years before that I had not paid a visit to the museum."

"Indeed? I have often walked round the galleries there, and stood before this picture, too. Yes, in those earlier days I walked."

He was almost laughing as he looked at her, and; her embarrassment was such that she could not make any reply.

"I fear I am boring you with the pictures," Herr Rupius went on abruptly. "Wait a little; my wife will be home soon. You know, I suppose, that she always goes for a two hours walk after dinner now. She is afraid of becoming too stout."

"Your wife looks as young and slender as … well, I don't think she has altered in the very least since I have come to live here."

Bertha felt as though Rupius' countenance had grown quite rigid. Then suddenly he said, in a gentle tone of voice which was not by any means in keeping with the expression of his face:

"A quiet life in a little town such as this keeps me young, of course. It was a clever idea of mine and hers, for it occurred simultaneously to both of us, to move here. Who can say whether, had we stayed in Vienna, it might not have been all over already?"

Bertha could not guess what he meant by the expression "all over"; whether he was referring to his own life, to his wife's youthfulness, or to something else. In any case, she was sorry that she had called that day; a feeling of shame at being so strong and well herself came over her.

"Did I tell you," continued Rupius, "that it was Anna who got these portfolios for me? It was a chance bargain, for the work is usually very expensive. A bookseller had advertised it and Anna telegraphed at once to her brother to procure it for us. You know, of course, that we have many relations in Vienna, both Anna and myself. Sometimes, too, she goes there to visit them. Soon after they pay us a return visit. I should be very glad indeed to see them again, especially Anna's brother and his wife, I owe them a great deal of gratitude. When Anna is in Vienna, she dines and sleeps at their house — but, of course, you already know all that, Frau Bertha."

He spoke rapidly and, at the same time, in a cool, businesslike tone. It sounded as though he had made up his mind to tell the same things to every one who should enter the room that day. It was the first time that he had as much as spoken to Bertha of the journeys of his wife to Vienna.

"She is going again to-morrow," he continued; "I believe the matter in hand this time is her summer costume."

"I think that is a very clever notion of your wife," said Bertha, glad to have found an opening for conversation.

"It is cheaper, at the same time," added Herr Rupius. "Yes, I assure you it is cheaper even if you throw in the cost of the journey. Why don't you follow my wife's example?"

"In that way, Herr Rupius?"

"Why, in regard to your frocks and hats! You are young and pretty, too!"

"Heavens above! On whose account should I dress smartly?"

"On whose account! On whose account is it that my wife dresses so smartly?"

The door opened and Frau Rupius entered in a bright spring costume, a red sunshade in her hand and a white straw hat, trimmed with red ribbon, on her dark hair, which was dressed high. A pleasant smile was hovering around her lips, as usual, and she greeted Bertha with a quiet cheerfulness.

"Are you making an appearance in our house once more?" she said, handing her sunshade and hat to the maid, who had followed her into the room.

"Are you also interested in pictures, Frau Garlan?"

She went up close behind her husband and softly passed her hand over his forehead and hair.

"I was just telling Frau Garlan," said Rupius, "how surprised I am that she never goes to Vienna."

"Indeed," Frau Rupius put in; "why don't you do so? Moreover, you must certainly have some acquaintances there, too. Come with me one day — to-morrow, for example. Yes, to-morrow."

Rupius gazed straight before him while his wife said this, as though he did not dare to look at her.

"You are really very kind, Frau Rupius," said Bertha, feeling as though a perfect stream of joy was coursing through her being.

She wondered, too, how it was that all this time the possibility of making such a journey had not once entered her mind, the more so as it could be accomplished with so little trouble. It appeared to her at that moment that such a journey might be a remedy for the strange sense of dissatisfaction under which she had been suffering during the past few days.

"Well, do you agree, Frau Garlan?"

"I don't really know — I daresay I could spare the time, for I have only one lesson to give tomorrow at my sister-in-law's, and she, of course, won't be too exacting; but wouldn't I be putting you to some inconvenience?"

A slight shadow flitted across Frau Rupius' brow.

"Putting me to inconvenience! Whatever are you dreaming of! I shall be very glad to have pleasant company during the few hours of the journey there and back. And in Vienna — oh, we shall be sure to have much to do together in Vienna."

"Your husband," said Bertha, blushing like a girl who is speaking of her first ball, "has told me … has advised me …"

"Surely, he has been raving to you about my dressmaker," said Frau Rupius, laughing.

Rupius still sat motionless in his chair and looked at neither of them.

"Yes, I should really like to ask you about her, Frau Rupius. When I see you I feel as if I should like to be well dressed again, just as you are."

"That is easily arranged," said Frau Rupius. "I will take you to my dressmaker, and by so doing I hope also to have the pleasure of your company on my subsequent visits. I am glad for your sake as well," she said to her husband, touching his hand which was lying on the table. Then she turned to Bertha and added: "and for yours. You will see how much good it will do you. Wandering about the streets without being known to a soul has a wonderful effect on one's spirits. I do it from time to time, and I always come back quite refreshed and—" in saying this she threw a sidelong glance, full of anxiety and tenderness, in the direction of her husband— "and then I am as happy here as ever it is possible to be; happier, I believe, than any other woman in the world."

She drew near her husband and kissed him on the temple. Bertha heard her say in a soft voice, as she did so:

"Dearest!"

Rupius, however, continued to stare before him as though he shrank from meeting his wife's glance.

Both were silent and seemed to be absorbed in themselves, as though Bertha was not in the room. Bertha comprehended vaguely that there was some mysterious factor in the relations of these two people, but what that factor was she was not clever, or not experienced, or not good enough to understand. For a whole minute the silence continued, and Bertha was so embarrassed that she would gladly have gone away had it not been necessary to arrange with Frau Rupius the details of the morrow's journey.

Anna was the first to speak.

"So then it is agreed that we are to meet at the railway station in time for the morning train — isn't it? And I will arrange matters so that we return home by the seven o'clock train in the evening. In eight hours, you see, it is possible to get through a good deal."

"Certainly," said Bertha; "provided, of course, that you are not inconveniencing yourself on my account in the slightest degree."

Anna interrupted her, almost angrily.

"I have already told you how glad I am that you will be travelling with me, the more so as there is not a woman in the town so congenial to me as you."

"Yes," said Herr Rupius, "I can corroborate that. You know, of course, that my wife is on visiting terms with hardly anybody here — and as it has been such a long time since you came to see us I was beginning to fear that she was going to lose you as well."

"However could you have thought such a thing? My dear Herr Rupius! And you, Frau Rupius, surely you haven't believed—"

At that moment Bertha felt an overwhelming love for both of them. Her emotion was such that she detected her voice to be assuming an almost tearful tone.

Frau Rupius smiled, a strange, deliberate smile.

"I haven't believed anything. As a matter of fact there are some things over which I do not generally ponder for long. I have no great need of friends, but you, Frau Bertha, I really and truly love."

She stretched out her hand to her. Bertha cast a glance at Rupius. It seemed to her that an expression of contentment should now be observable on his features. To her amazement, however, she saw that he was gazing into the corner of the room with an almost terrified look in his eyes.

The parlourmaid came in with some coffee. Further particulars as to their plans for the morrow were discussed, and finally they drew up a tolerably exact time-table which, to Frau Rupius' slight amusement, Bertha entered in a little notebook.

When Bertha reached the street again, the sky had become overcast, and the increasing sultriness foretold the approach of a thunderstorm. The first large drops were falling before she reached home, and she was somewhat alarmed when, on going upstairs, she failed to find the servant and little Fritz. As she went up to the window, however, in order to shut it, she saw the two come running along. The first thunderclap crashed out, and she started back in terror. Then immediately came a brilliant flash of lightning.

The storm was brief, but unusually violent. Bertha went and sat on her bed, held Fritz on her lap, and told him a story, so that he should not be frightened. But, at the same time, she felt as though there was a certain connexion between her experiences of the past two days and the thunderstorm.

In half an hour all was over. Bertha opened the window; the air was now fresh, the darkening sky was clear and distant. Bertha drew a deep breath, and a feeling of peace and hope seemed to permeate her being.

It was time to get ready for the concert in the gardens. On her arrival she found her friends already gathered at a large table beneath a tree. It was Bertha's intention to tell her sister-in-law at once about her proposed visit to Vienna on the morrow, but a sense of shyness, as though there was something underhand in the journey, caused her to refrain.

Herr Klingemann went by with his housekeeper towards their table. The housekeeper was getting on towards middle-age; she was a very voluptuous looking woman, taller than Klingemann, and, when she walked, always appeared to be asleep. Klingemann bowed towards them with exaggerated politeness. The gentlemen scarcely acknowledged the salutation, and the ladies pretended not to have noticed it. Only Bertha nodded slightly and gazed after the couple.

"That is his sweetheart — yes, I know it for a positive fact," whispered
Richard, who was sitting near his aunt.

Herr Garlan's party ate, drank and applauded. At times various acquaintances came over from other tables, sat down with them for awhile, and then went away again to their places. The music murmured around Bertha without making any impression on her. Her mind was continuously occupied with the question as to how to inform them of her project.

Suddenly, while the music was playing very loudly, she said to Richard:

"I say, I won't be able to give you a music lesson to-morrow. I am going to Vienna."

"To Vienna!" exclaimed Richard; then he called across to his mother; "I say, Aunt Bertha is going to Vienna to-morrow!"

"Who's going to Vienna?" asked Garlan, who was sitting furthest away.

"I am," answered Bertha.

"What's this! What's this!" said Garlan, playfully threatening her with his finger.

So, then, it was accomplished. Bertha was glad. Richard made jokes about the people who were sitting in the garden, also about the fat bandmaster who was always skipping about while he was conducting, and then about the trumpet-player whose cheeks bulged out and who seemed to be shedding tears when he blew into his instrument. Bertha could not help laughing very heartily. Jests were bandied about her high spirits and Doctor Friedrich remarked that she must surely be going to some rendezvous at Vienna.

“I should like to put a stop to that, though!” exclaimed Richard, so angrily that the hilarity became general. Only Elly remained serious, and gazed at her aunt in downright astonishment.

III

BERTHA LOOKED OUT through the open carriage window upon the landscape: Frau Rupius read a book, which she had taken out of her little traveling-bag very soon after the train had started. It almost appeared as though she wished to avoid any lengthy conversation with Bertha, and the latter felt somewhat hurt. For a long time past she had been cherishing a wish to be a friend of Frau Rupius, but since the previous day this desire of hers had become almost a yearning, which recalled to her mind the whole-hearted devotion of the friendships of the days of her childhood.

At first, therefore, she had felt quite unhappy, and had a sensation of having been abandoned, but soon the changing panorama to be seen through the window began to distract her thoughts in an agreeable manner. As she looked at the rails which seemed to run to meet her, at the hedges and telegraph poles which glided and leaped past her, she recalled to mind the few short journeys to the Salzkammergut, where she had been taken, when a child, by her parents, and the indescribable pleasure of having been allowed to occupy a corner seat on those occasions. Then she looked into the distance and exulted in the gleaming of the river, in the pleasant windings of the hills and meadows, in the azure of the sky and in the white clouds.

After a time Anna laid down the book, and began to chat to Bertha and smiled at her, as though at a child.

"Who would have foretold this of us?" said Frau Rupius.

"That we should be going to Vienna together?"

"No, no, I mean that we shall both — how shall I express it? — pass or end our lives yonder" — she gave a slight nod in the direction of the place from which they came.

"Very true, indeed!" answered Bertha, who had not yet considered whether there was anything really strange in the fact or not.

"Well, you, of course, knew it the moment you were married, but I—"

Frau Rupius gazed straight before her.

"So then your move to the little town," said Bertha, "did not take place until — until—"

She broke off in confusion.

"Yes, you know that, of course."

In saying this Frau Rupius looked Bertha full in the face as if reproaching her for her question. But when she continued to speak she smiled gently, as though her thoughts were not occupied by anything so sad.

"Yes, I never imagined that I should leave Vienna; my husband had his position as a government official, and indeed he would certainly have been able to remain longer there, in spite of his infirmity, had he not wanted to go away at once."

"He thought, perhaps, that the fresh air, the quiet—" began Bertha, and she at once perceived that she was not saying anything very sensible.

Nevertheless Anna answered her quite affably.

"Oh, no, neither rest nor climate could do him any good, but he thought that it would be better for both of us in every way. He was right, too — what should we have been able to do if we had remained in the city?"

Bertha felt that Anna was not telling her the whole story and she would have liked to beg her not to hesitate, but to open her whole heart to her. She knew, however, that she was not clever enough to express such a request in the right words. Then, as though Frau Rupius had guessed that Bertha was anxious to learn more, she quickly changed the subject of their conversation. She asked Bertha about her brother-in-law, the musical talent of her pupils, and her method of teaching; then she took up the novel again and left Bertha to herself.

Once she looked up from the book and said:

"You haven't brought anything with you to read, then?"

"Oh, yes," answered Bertha.

She suddenly remembered that she had bought a newspaper; she took it up and turned over the pages assiduously. The train drew near to Vienna. Frau Rupius closed her book and put it in the travelling-bag. She looked at Bertha with a certain tenderness, as at a child who must soon be sent away alone to meet an uncertain destiny.

"Another quarter of an hour," she remarked; "and we shall be — well, I very nearly said, home."

Before them lay the town. On the far side of the river chimneys towered up aloft, rows of tall yellow painted houses stretched away into the distance, and steeples ascended skywards. Everything lay basking in the gentle sunlight of May.

Bertha's heart throbbed. She experienced a sensation such as might come over a traveller returning after a long absence to a longed-for home, which had probably altered greatly in the meantime, and where surprises and mysteries of all kinds awaited him. At the moment when the train rolled into the station she seemed almost courageous in her own eyes.

Frau Rupius took a carriage, and they drove into the town. As they passed the Ring, Bertha suddenly leaned out of the window and gazed after a young man whose figure and walk reminded her of Emil Lindbach. She wished that the young man would turn round, but she lost sight of him without his having done so.

The carriage stopped before a house in the Kohlmarkt. The two ladies got out and made their way to the third floor, where the dressmaker's workroom was situated. While Frau Rupius tried on her new costume, Bertha had various materials displayed to her from which she made a choice. The assistant took her measure, and it was arranged that Bertha should call in a week's time to be fitted. Frau Rupius came out from the adjoining room and recommended that particular care should be given to her friend's order.

It seemed to Bertha that everybody was looking at her in a rather disparaging, almost compassionate manner, and, on looking at herself in the large pier glass she suddenly perceived that she was very tastelessly dressed. What on earth had put it into her head to attire herself on this occasion in the provincial Sunday-best, instead of in one of the simple plain dresses she usually wore? She grew crimson with shame. She had on a black and white striped foulard costume, which was three years out of date, so far as its cut was concerned, and a bright-coloured hat, trimmed with roses and turned up at an extravagant angle in front, which seemed to weigh heavily upon her dainty figure and made her appear almost ridiculous.

Then, as if her own conviction needed further confirmation by some word of consolation, Frau Rupius said, as they went down the stairs:

"You are looking lovely!"

They stood in the doorway.

"What shall be done now?" asked Frau Rupius. "What do you propose?"

"Will you then … I … I mean …"

Bertha was quite frightened; she felt as though she was being turned adrift.

Frau Rupius looked at her with kindly commiseration.

"I think," she said, "that you are going to pay a visit to your cousin now, are you not? I suppose that you will be asked to stay to dinner."

“Agatha will be sure to invite me to dine with her.”

“I will accompany you as far as your cousin’s, if you would like me to; then I will go to my brother and, if possible, I will call for you at three in the afternoon.”

Together they walked through the most crowded streets of the central part of the town and looked at the shop windows. At first Bertha found the din somewhat confusing; afterwards, however, she found it more pleasant than otherwise. She gazed at the passers-by and took great pleasure in watching the well-groomed men and smartly-attired ladies. Almost all the people seemed to be wearing new clothes, and it seemed to her they all looked much happier than the people at home.

Presently she stopped before the window of a picture-dealer’s shop and immediately her eyes fell on a familiar portrait; it was the same one of Emil Lindbach as had appeared in the illustrated paper, Bertha was as delighted as if she had met an acquaintance.

“I know that man,” she said to Frau Rupius.

“Whom?”

“That man there” — she pointed with her finger at the photograph— “what do you think? I used to attend the conservatoire at the same time he did!”

“Really?” said Frau Rupius.

Bertha looked at her and observed that she had not paid the slightest attention to the portrait, but was thinking of something else. Bertha, however, was glad of that, for it seemed to her that there had been too much warmth lurking in her voice.

All at once a gentle thrill of pride stirred within her at the thought that the man whose portrait hung there in the shop window had been in love with her in the days of his youth, and had kissed her. She walked on with a sensation of inward contentment. After a short time they reached her cousin’s house on the Riemerstrasse.

“So it’s settled then,” she said; “you will call for me at three o’clock, won’t you?”

“Yes,” replied Frau Rupius; “that is to say — but if I should be a little late, do not on any account wait for me at your cousin’s any longer than you want to. In any case, this much is settled: we will both be at the railway station at seven o’clock this evening. Good-bye for the present.”

She shook hands with Bertha and hurried away.

Bertha gazed after her in surprise. Once more she felt forlorn, just as she had done in the train when Frau Rupius had read the novel.

Then she went up the two flights of stairs. She had not sent her cousin word as to her visit, and she was a little afraid that her arrival might be somewhat inopportune. She had not seen Agatha for many years, and they had exchanged letters only at very rare intervals.

Agatha received her without either surprise or cordiality, as though it was only the day before that they had seen each other for the last time. A smile had been playing around Bertha’s lips — the smile of those who think that they are about to give some one else a surprise — she repressed it immediately.

“Well, you are not a very frequent visitor, I must say!” said Agatha, “and you never let us have a word from you.”

“But, Agatha, you know it was your turn to write; you have been owing me a letter these last three months.”

“Really!” replied Agatha. “Well, you’ll have to excuse me; you can imagine what a lot of work three children mean. Did I write and tell you that Georg goes to school now?”

Agatha took her cousin into the nursery, where Georg and his two little sisters were just having their dinner given them by the nursery-governess. Bertha asked them a few questions, but the children were very shy, and the younger girl actually began to cry.

"Do beg Aunt Bertha to bring Fritz with her next time she comes," said Agatha to Georg at length.

It struck Bertha how greatly her cousin had aged during the last few years. Indeed, when she bent down to the children Agatha appeared almost like an old woman; and yet she was only a year older than Bertha, as the latter knew.

By the time they had returned to the dining-room they had already told each other all that they had to say, and when Agatha invited Bertha to stay to dinner, it seemed that she spoke only for the mere sake of making some remark. Bertha accepted the invitation, nevertheless, and her cousin went into the kitchen to give some orders.

Bertha gazed around the room, which was furnished economically and in bad taste. It was very dark, for the street was extremely narrow. She took up an album which was lying on the table. She found hardly any but familiar faces in it. At the very beginning were the portraits of Agatha's parents, who had died long ago; then came those of her own parents and of her brothers, of whom she scarcely ever heard; portraits of friends whom they both had known in earlier days, and of whom she now knew hardly anything; and, finally, there was a photograph, the existence of which she had long forgotten. It was one of herself and Agatha together, and had been taken when they were quite young girls. In those days they had been very much alike in appearance, and had been great friends. Bertha could remember many of the confidential chats which they had had together in the days of their girlhood.

And that lovely creature there with the looped plaits was now almost an old woman! And what of herself? What reason had she, then, for still looking upon herself as a young woman? Did she not, perhaps, appear to others as old as Agatha had seemed to her? She resolved that, in the afternoon, she would take notice of the glances which passers-by bestowed upon her. It would be terrible if she really did look as old as her cousin! No, the idea was utterly ridiculous! She called to mind how her nephew, Richard always called her his "pretty aunt," how Klingemann had walked to and fro outside her window the other evening — and even the recollection of her brother-in-law's attentions reassured her. And, when she looked in the mirror which was hanging opposite to her, she saw two bright eyes gazing at her from a smooth, fresh face — they were her face and her eyes.

When Agatha came into the room again Bertha began to talk of the far-away years of their childhood, but it seemed that Agatha had forgotten all about those early days, as though marriage, motherhood and week-day cares had obliterated both youth and its memories. When Bertha went on to speak of a students' dance they had both attended, of the young men who had courted Agatha, and of a bouquet which some unknown lover had once sent her, Agatha at first smiled rather absent-mindedly, then she looked at Bertha and said:

"Just fancy you still remembering all those foolish things!"

Agatha's husband came home from his Government office. He had grown very grey since Bertha had last seen him. At first sight he did not appear to recognize Bertha, then he mistook her for another lady, and excused himself by remarking that he had a very bad memory for faces. At dinner he affected to be smart, he inquired in a certain superior way about the affairs of the little town, and wondered, jestingly, whether Bertha was not thinking of marrying again. Agatha also took part in this bantering, although, at the same time, she occasionally glanced reprovingly at her husband, who was trying to give the conversation a frivolous turn.

Bertha felt ill at ease. Later on she gathered from some words of Agatha's husband that they were expecting another addition to their family. Usually Bertha felt sympathy for women in such circumstances, but in this case the news created an almost unpleasant impression upon her. Moreover there was not a trace of love to be discerned in the tone of the husband's voice when he referred to it, but rather a kind of foolish pride on the score of an accomplished duty. He spoke of the matter as though it was a special act of kindness on his part that, in spite of the fact that he was a busy man, and Agatha was no longer beautiful, he condescended to spend his time at home. Bertha had an impression that she was being mixed up in some sordid affair which did not concern her in the least. She was glad when, as soon as he had finished his dinner, the husband went off — it was his custom, "his only vice," as he said with a smile, to play billiards at the restaurant for an hour after dinner.

Bertha and Agatha were left together.

"Yes," said Agatha, "I've got that to look forward to again."

Thereupon she began, in a cold, businesslike way, to talk about her previous confinements, with a candour and lack of modesty which seemed all the more remarkable because they had become such strangers. While Agatha was continuing the relation of her experiences, however, the thought suddenly passed through Bertha's mind that it must be glorious to have a child by a husband whom one loved.

She ceased to pay attention to her cousin's unpleasant talk; and her thoughts were only occupied by the infinite yearning for motherhood which had often come over her when she was quite a young girl, and she called to mind an occasion when that yearning had been more keen than it had ever been, either before or after. This had happened one evening when Emil Lindbach had accompanied her home from the conservatoire, her hand clasped in his. She still remembered how her head had begun to swim, and that at one moment she had understood what the phrase meant which she had sometimes read in novels: "He could have done with her just as he liked."

Then she noticed that it had grown quite silent in the room, and that Agatha was leaning back in the corner of the sofa, apparently asleep. It was three by the clock. How tiresome it was that Frau Rupius had not yet arrived! Bertha went to the window and looked out into the street. Then she turned towards Agatha, who had again opened her eyes. Bertha quickly tried to begin a fresh conversation, and told her about the new costume which she had ordered in the forenoon, but Agatha was too sleepy even to answer. Bertha had no wish to put her cousin out, and took her departure. She decided to wait for Frau Rupius in the street. Agatha seemed very pleased when Bertha got ready to go. She became more cordial than she had been at any time during her cousin's visit, and said at the door, as if struck by some brilliant idea:

"How the time does pass! I do hope you'll come and see us again soon."

Bertha, as she stood before the door of the house, realized that she was waiting for Frau Rupius in vain. There was no doubt that it had been the latter's intention from the beginning to spend the afternoon without her. Of course, it did not necessarily follow that there was anything wicked in it; as a matter of fact there was nothing wicked in it, but it hurt Bertha to think that Anna had so little trust in her.

She walked along with no fixed purpose. She had still more than three hours to while away before she was to be at the station. At first, she took a walk in the inner town, which she had passed through in the morning. It was really a pleasant thing to wander about unobserved like this, as a stranger in the crowd. It was long since she had experienced that pleasure. Some of the men who passed her glanced at her with interest, and more than one, indeed, stopped to gaze after her. She regretted that she was dressed to so little advantage, and rejoiced at the prospect of obtaining soon the beautiful costume she had ordered from the Viennese dressmaker. She would have liked to find some one following her.

Suddenly the thought passed through her mind: would Emil Lindbach recognize her if she were to meet him? What a question! Such things never happened, of course. No, she was quite sure that she could wander about Vienna the whole day long without ever meeting him. How long was it since she had seen him? Seven — eight years…. Yes, the last time she had met him was two years before her marriage. She had been with her parents one warm summer evening in the Schweitzerhaus on the Prater; he had gone by with a friend and had stopped a few minutes at their table. Ah, and now she remembered also that amongst the company at their table there had been the young doctor who was courting her. She had forgotten what Emil had said on that occasion, but she remembered that he had held his hat in his hand during the whole time he was standing before her, which had afforded her inexpressible delight. Would he do the same now, she thought to herself, if she were to meet him?

Where was he living now, she wondered. In the old days he had a room on the Weiden, near St. Paul's Church…. Yes, he had pointed out the window as they passed one day, and had ventured, as they did so, to make a certain remark — she had forgotten the exact words, but there was no doubt that they had been to the effect that he and she ought to be in that room together. She had rebuked him very severely for saying such a thing; she had even gone the length of telling him that if that was the sort of girl he thought she was, all was over between them. And, in fact, he had never spoken another word on the subject.

Would she recognize the window again? Would she find it? It was all the same to her, of course, whether she went for a walk in this direction or that. She hurried towards the Weiden as though she had suddenly found an object for her walk. She was amazed at the complete change which had come over the neighbourhood. When she looked down from the Elizabeth Bridge she saw walls that rose from the bed of the Wien, half finished tracks, little trucks moving to and fro, and busy workmen. Soon she reached St. Paul's Church by the same road as she had so often followed in the old days. But then she came to a standstill; she was absolutely at a loss to remember where Emil had lived — whether she had to turn to the right or to the left. It was strange how completely it had escaped her memory. She walked slowly back as far as the Conservatoire, then she stood still. Above her were the windows from which she had so often gazed upon the dome of St. Charles' Church, and longingly awaited the end of the lesson so that she might meet Emil. How great had been her love for him, indeed; and how strange it was that it should have died so completely!

And now, when she had returned to these scenes, she was a widow, had been so for years, and had a child at home who was growing up. If she had died, Emil would never have heard of it, or perhaps not until years afterwards. Her eyes fell on a large placard fixed on the entrance, gates of the Conservatoire. It was an announcement of the concert at which he was going to play, and there was his name appearing among a number of other great ones, many of which she had long since admired with gentle awe.

"BRAHMS VIOLIN CONCERTO — EMIL LINDBACH, VIOLINIST TO THE COURT OF BAVARIA."

"Violinist to the Court of Bavaria!" — she had never heard anything about that before.

Gazing up at his name, which stood out in glittering letters, it seemed to her as though the next moment Emil himself might come out through the gate, his violin case in his hand, a cigarette between his lips. Of a sudden it all seemed so near, and nearer still when all at once from the windows above came floating down the long-drawn notes of a violin, just as she had so often heard in the old days.

She thought she would like to come to Vienna for that concert — yes, even if she should be obliged to spend the night at an hotel! And she would take a seat right in front and see him quite close at hand. She wondered whether he, in his turn, would see her, and, if so, whether he would recognize her. She remained standing before the yellow placard, wholly absorbed in thought, until she felt that some young people coming out of the Conservatoire were staring at her and then she realized that she had been smiling to herself the whole time, as if lost in a pleasant dream.

She proceeded to walk on. The district around the town-park had also changed, and, when she sought the places where she and Emil had often been for walks together, she found that they had quite' disappeared. Trees had been felled, boardings barred the way, the ground had been dug up, and in vain she tried to find the seat where she and Emil had exchanged words of love, the tone of which she remembered so well without being able to recall the actual phrases.

Presently she reached the trim well-kept part of the park, which was full of people. But she had a sensation that many were looking at her, and that some ladies were laughing at her. And once more she felt that she was looking very countrified. She was vexed at being embarrassed, and thought of the time when, as a pretty young girl, she had walked, proud and unconcerned, along these very avenues. It seemed to her that she had fallen off so much since then, and become so pitiable. Her idea of sitting in the front row of the concert hall appeared presumptuous, almost unfeasible. It seemed also highly improbable now that Emil Lindbach would recognize her; indeed, it struck her as almost impossible that he should remember her existence. What a number of experiences he must have had! How many women and girls might well have loved him — and in a manner quite different from her own!

And whilst she continued her way, walking, now along the less frequented avenues and at length out of the park upon the Ringstrasse again, she drew a mental picture of the beloved of her youth figuring in all manner of adventures, in which confused recollections of events depicted in the novels she had read and indistinctly formed ideas of his professional tours were strangely intermingled. She imagined him in Venice with a Russian princess in a gondola; then in her mind's eye she saw him at the court of the King of Bavaria, where duchesses listened to his playing, and fell in love with him; then in the boudoir of an opera singer; then at a fancy-dress ball in Spain, with crowds of alluring masqueraders about him. The further he seemed to soar away, unapproachable and enviable, the more miserable she felt herself to be, and all at once it seemed utterly inconceivable that she had so lightly surrendered her own hopes of an artistic career and given up her lover, in order to lead a sunless existence, and to be lost in the crowd. A shudder seemed to seize her as she recalled that she was nothing but the widow of an insignificant man, that she lived in a provincial town, that she earned her living by means of music lessons, and that she saw old age slowly approaching. Never had there fallen upon her way so much as a single ray of the brilliance which shone upon the road his footsteps would tread so long as he lived. And again the same shudder ran through her at the thought that she had always been content with her lot, and that, without hope and indeed, without yearning, she had passed her whole existence in a gloom, which, at that moment, seemed inexplicable.

She reached the Aspernbrueke without in the least giving heed to where her footsteps were taking her. She wished to cross the street at this point, but had to wait while a great number of carriages drove by. Most of them were occupied by gentlemen, many of whom carried field-glasses. She knew that they were returning from the races at the Prater.

There came an elegant equipage in which were seated a young man and a girl, the latter dressed in a white spring costume. Immediately behind was a carriage containing two strikingly dressed ladies. Bertha gazed long after them, and noticed that one of the ladies turned round, and that the object of her attention was the carriage which followed immediately behind, and in which sat a young and very handsome man in a long grey overcoat. Bertha was conscious of something very painful — uneasiness and annoyance at one and the same time. She would have liked to be the lady whom the young man followed; she would have liked to be beautiful, young, independent, and, Heaven knows, she would have liked to be any woman who could do as she wanted, and could turn round after men who pleased her.

And at that moment she realized, quite distinctly, that Frau Rupius was now in the company of somebody whom she loved. Indeed why shouldn't she? Of course, so long as she stayed in Vienna, she was free and mistress of her own time — besides, she was a very pretty woman, and was wearing a fragrant violet costume. On her lips there hovered a smile such as only comes to those who are happy — and Frau Rupius was unhappy at home. All at once, Bertha had a vision of Herr Rupius sitting in his room, looking at the engravings. But on that day, surely, he was not doing so; no, he was trembling for his wife, consumed with an immense fear that some one yonder in the great city would take her away from him, that she would never return, and that he would be left all alone with his sorrow. And Bertha suddenly felt a thrill of compassion for him, such as she had never experienced before. Indeed, she would have liked to be with him, to comfort and to reassure him.

She felt a touch on her arm. She started and looked up. A young man was standing beside her and gazing at her with an impudent leer. She stared at him, full in the face, still quite absentmindedly; then he said with a laugh:

"Well?"

She was frightened, and almost ran across the street, quickly passing in front of a carriage. She was ashamed of her previous desire to be the lady in the carriage she had seen coming from the Prater. It seemed as though the man's insolence had been her punishment. No, no, she was a respectable woman; in the depth of her soul she had an aversion to everything that savoured of the insolent…. No, she could no longer stay in Vienna, where women were exposed to such things! A longing for the peace of her home came over her, and she rejoiced in the prospect of meeting her little boy again, as in something extraordinarily beautiful.

What time was it, though? Heavens, a quarter of seven! She would have to take a carriage; there was no question about that now, indeed! Frau Rupius had, of course, paid for the carriage in the morning, and so the one which she was now going to take would only cost her half, so to speak. She took her seat in an open cab, leaned back in the corner, in almost the same aristocratic manner as that of the lady she had seen in the white frock. People gazed after her. She knew that she was now looking young and pretty. Moreover, she was feeling quite safe, nothing could happen to her. She took an indescribable pleasure in the swift motion of the cab with its rubber-tyred wheels. She thought how splendid it would be if on the occasion of her next visit she were to drive through the town, wearing her new costume and the small straw hat which made her look so young.

She was glad that Frau Rupius was standing in the entrance to the station and saw her arrive. But she betrayed no sign of pride, and acted as though it was quite the usual thing for her to drive up to the station in a cab.

"We have still ten minutes to spare," said Frau Rupius. "Are you very angry with me for having kept you waiting? Just fancy, my brother was giving a grand children's party to-day, and the little ones simply wouldn't let me go. It occurred to me too late that I might really have called for you; the children would have amused you so much. I have told my brother that, next time, I will bring you and your boy with me."

Bertha felt heartily ashamed of herself. How she had wronged this woman again! She could only press her hand and say:

"Thank you, you are very kind!"

They went on to the platform and entered an empty compartment. Frau Rupius had a small bag of cherries in her hand, and she ate them slowly, one after another, throwing the stones out of the window. When the train began to move out of the station she leaned back and closed her eyes. Bertha looked out of the window; she felt very tired after so much walking, and a slight uneasiness arose within her; she might have spent the day differently, more quietly and enjoyably. Her chilly reception and the tedious dinner at her cousin's came to her mind. After all, it was a great pity that she no longer had any acquaintances in Vienna. She had wandered like a stranger about the town in which she had lived twenty-six years. Why? And why had she not made the carriage pull up in the morning, when she saw the figure that seemed to have a resemblance to Emil Lindbach? True, she would not have been able to run or call after him — but if it had been really he, if he had recognized her and been pleased to see her again? They might have walked about together, might have told each other all that had happened during the long time that had passed since they had last known anything about one another; they might have gone to a fashionable restaurant and had dinner; some would naturally have recognized him, and she would have heard quite distinctly people discussing the question as to who "she" might really be. She was looking beautiful, too; the new costume was already finished; and the waiters served her with great politeness, especially a small youth who brought the wine — but he was really her nephew, who had, of course, become a waiter in that restaurant instead of a student. Suddenly Herr and Frau Martin entered the dining-hall; they were holding one another in such a tender embrace as if they were the only people there. Then Emil rose to his feet, took up the violin bow which was lying beside him, and raised it with a commanding gesture, whereupon the waiter turned Herr and Frau Martin out of the room. Bertha could not help laughing at the incident, laughing much too loudly indeed, for by this time she had quite forgotten how to behave in a fashionable restaurant. But then it was not a fashionable restaurant at all; it was only the coffee room at the "Red Apple," and the military band was playing somewhere out of sight. That, be it known, was a clever invention on the part of Herr Rupius, that military bands could play without being seen. Now, however, it was her turn that was immediately to follow. Yonder was the piano — but, of course, she had long since completely forgotten how to play; she would run away rather than be forced to play. And all at once she was at the railway station, where Frau Rupius was already waiting for her. "It is high time you came," she said. She placed in Bertha's hand a large book, which, by the way, was her ticket. Frau Rupius, however, was not going to take the train; she sat down, ate cherries and spat out the stones at the stationmaster, who took a huge delight in the proceedings. Bertha entered the compartment. Thank God, Herr Klingemann was already there! He made a sign to her with his screwed-up eyes, and asked her if she knew whose funeral it was. She saw that a hearse was standing on the other line. Then she remembered that the captain with whom the tobacconist's wife had deceived Herr Klingemann was dead — of course, it was the day of the concert at the "Red Apple." Suddenly Herr Klingemann blew on her eyes, and laughed in a rumbling way.

Bertha opened her eyes — at that moment a train was rushing past the window. She shook herself. What a confused dream! And hadn't it begun quite nicely? She tried to remember. Yes, Emil played a part in it … but she could not recollect what part.

The dusk of evening slowly fell. The train sped on its way along by the Danube. Frau Rupius slept and smiled. Perhaps she was only pretending to be asleep. Bertha was again seized with a slight suspicion, and she felt rising within her a sensation of envy at the unknown and mysterious experiences which Frau Rupius had had. She, too, would gladly have experienced something. She wished that someone was sitting beside her now, his arm pressed against hers — she would fain have felt once more that sensation that had thrilled her on that occasion when she had stood with Emil on the bank of the Wien, and when she had almost been on the point of losing her senses and had yearned for a child…. Ah, why was she so poor, so lonely, so much in obscurity? Gladly would she have implored the lover of her youth:

“Kiss me but once again just as you used to do, I want to be happy!”

It was dark; Bertha looked out into the night.

She determined that very night before she went to bed to fetch from the attic the little case in which she kept the letters of her parents and of Emil. She longed to be home again. She felt as though a question had been wakened within her soul, and that the answer awaited her at home.

IV

WHEN, LATE IN the evening, Bertha entered her room, the idea which she had taken into her head of going up to the attic at once and fetching down the case with the letters seemed to her to be almost venturesome. She was afraid that some one in the house might observe her on her nocturnal pilgrimage, and might take her for mad. She could, of course, go up the next morning quite conveniently and without causing any stir; and so she fell asleep, feeling like a child who has been promised an outing into the country on the following day.

She had much to do the next forenoon; her domestic duties and piano lessons occupied the whole of the time. She had to give her sister-in-law an account of her visit to Vienna. Her story was that in the afternoon she had gone for a walk with her cousin, and the impression was conveyed that she had made an excuse to Frau Rupius at the request of Agatha.

It was not until the afternoon that she went up to the attic and brought down the dusty travelling-case, which was lying beside a trunk and a couple of boxes — the whole collection covered with an old and torn piece of red-flowered coffee-cloth. She remembered that her object on the last occasion on which she had opened the case had been to put away the papers which her parents had left behind. On her return to her room she opened the case and perceived lying on top of the other contents a number of letters from her brothers and other letters, with the handwriting of which she was not familiar; then she found a neat little bundle containing the few letters which her parents had addressed to her: these were followed by two books of her mother's household accounts, a little copybook dating back to her own schooldays and containing entries of timetables and exercises, a few programmes of the dances which she had attended when a young girl, and, finally, Emil Lindbach's letters, which were wrapped up in blue tissue paper, torn here and there. And now she was able to fix the very day on which she had last held those letters in her hand, although she had not read them on that occasion. It was when her father had been lying ill for some time and, for whole days, she had not once gone outside the door.

She laid the bundle aside. She wanted, first of all, to see all the other things which had been stored in the case, and concerning which she was consumed with curiosity. A number of letters lay in a loose heap at the bottom of the case, some with their envelopes and others without. She cast her eye over them at random. There were letters from old friends, a few from her cousin, and here was one from the doctor who had courted her in the old days. In it he asked her to reserve for him the first waltz at the medical students' dance. Here — what was it? Why, it was that anonymous letter which some one had addressed to her at the Conservatoire. She picked it up and read:

"My Dear Fraulein,

"Yesterday I again had the good fortune to have an opportunity of admiring you on your daily walk; I do not know whether I had also the good fortune to be observed by you."

No, he had not had that good fortune. Then followed three pages of enthusiastic admiration, and not a single wish, not a single bold word. She had, moreover, never heard anything more of the writer.

Here was a letter signed by two initials, "M.G." That was the impudent fellow who had once spoken to her in the street, and who in this letter made proposals — wait a minute, what were they? Ah, here was the passage which had sent the hot blood mounting to her brow when she had first read it:

"Since I have seen you, and since you have looked on me with a glance so stern and yet seemingly so full of promise, I have had but one dream, but one yearning — that I might kiss those eyes!"

Of course, she had not answered the letter; she was in love with Emil at the time. Indeed, she had even thought of showing him the letter, but was restrained by the fear of rousing his jealousy. Emil had never learned anything of "M. G."

And that piece of soft ribbon that now fell into her hands?… A cravat … but she had quite forgotten whose it was, and why she had kept it.

Here again was a little dance album in which she had written the names of her partners. She tried to call the young men to mind, but in vain. Though, by the way, it was at that very dance that she had met that man who had said such passionate words to her as she had never heard from any other. It seemed as though he suddenly emerged a victor from among the many shadows that hovered around her. It must have happened during the time when she and Emil had been meeting each other less frequently. How strange it was … or had it only been a dream? This passionate admirer had clasped her closely in his arms during the dance — and she had not offered the slightest resistance. She had felt his lips in her hair, and it had been incredibly pleasant … Well, and then? — she had never seen him again.

It suddenly seemed to her that, after all, in those days she had had many and strange experiences, and she was lost in amazement at the way in which all these memories had slumbered so long in the travelling case and in her soul…. But no, they had not slumbered; she had thought of all these things many a time: of the men who had courted her, of the anonymous letter, of her passionate partner at the dance, of the walks with Emil — but only as if they had been merely such things as go to constitute the past, the youth which is allotted to every young girl, and from which she emerges to lead the placid life of a woman. On the present occasion, however, it seemed to Bertha as if these recollections were, so to speak, unredeemed promises, as if in those experiences of distant days there lay destinies which had not been fulfilled; nay, more, as if a kind of deception had long been practised upon her, from the very day on which she had been married until the present moment; as if she had discovered it all too late; and here she was, unable to lift a finger to alter her destiny.

Yet why should it seem so?… She thought of all these futile things, and there beside her, wrapped up in tissue paper, still lay the treasure, for the sake of which alone she had rummaged in the case — the letters of the only man she had loved, the letters written in the days when she had been happy. How many women might there be now who envied her because that very man had once loved her — loved her with a different, better, chaster love than that which he had given any of the women who had followed her in his affections. She felt herself most bitterly deceived that she, who could have been his wife if … if … her thoughts broke off.

Hurriedly, as though seeking to rid her mind of doubt, or rather, indeed, of fear, she tore off the tissue paper and seized the letters. And she read — read them one after another. Long letters, short letters; brief, hasty notes, like: "To-morrow evening, darling, at seven o'clock!" or "Dearest, just one kiss ere I go to sleep!" letters that covered many pages, written during the walking tours which he and his fellow students had taken in the summer; letters written in the evening, in which he had felt constrained to impart to her his impressions of a concert immediately on returning home; endless pages in which he unfolded his plans for the future; how they would travel together through Spain and America, famous and happy … she read them all, one after another, as though tortured by a quenchless thirst. She read from the very first, which had accompanied a few pieces of music, to the last, which was dated two and a half years later, and contained nothing more than a greeting from Salzburg.

When she came to an end she let her hands fall into her lap and gazed fixedly at the sheets lying about. Why had that been the last letter? How had their friendship come to an end? How could it have come to an end? How had it been possible that that great love had died away? There had never been any actual rupture between Emil and herself; they had never come to any definite understanding that all was over between them, and yet their acquaintanceship had ended at some time or other — when?… She could not tell, because at the time when he had written that card to her from Salzburg she had still been in love with him. She had, as a matter of fact, met him in the autumn — indeed, during the winter of the same year everything had seemed once more to blossom forth. She remembered certain walks they had taken over the crunching snow, arm in arm, beside St. Charles' Church — but when was it that they had taken the last of these walks? They had, to be sure, never taken farewell of each other…. She could not understand it.

How was it that she had been able so easily to renounce a happiness which it might yet have been within her power to retain? How had it come about that she had ceased to love him? Had the dullness of the daily routine of her home life, which weighed so heavily upon her spirits ever since she had left the Conservatoire, lulled her feelings to sleep just as it had blunted the edge of her ambitions? Had the querulous remarks of her parents on the subject of her friendship with the youthful violinist — which had seemed likely to lead to nothing — acted on her with such sobering effect?

Then she recalled to mind that even at a later date, when some months had elapsed since she had last seen him, he had called at her parents' house, and had kissed her in the back room. Yes, that had been the last time of all. And then she remembered further that on that occasion she had noticed that his relation towards women had changed; that he must have had experiences of which she could know nothing — but the discovery had not caused her any pain.

She asked herself how it all would have turned out if in those days she had not been so virtuous, if she had taken life as easily as some of the other girls? She called to mind a girl at the Conservatoire with whom she had ceased to associate on finding that her friend had an intrigue with a dramatic student. She remembered again the suggestive words which Emil had spoken as they were walking together past his window, and the yearning that had come over her as they stood by the bank of the Wien. It seemed inconceivable that those words had not affected her more keenly at the moment, that that yearning had been awakened within her only once, and then only for so short a time. With a kind of perplexed amazement she thought of that period of placid purity and then, with a sudden agonized feeling of shame which drove the blood to her temples, of the cold readiness with which she had given herself afterwards to a man whom she had never loved. The consciousness that whatever happiness she had tasted in the course of her married life had been gained in the arms of the husband she had not loved made her shudder with horror, for the first time, in its utter wretchedness. Had that, then, been life such as her thoughts had depicted to her, had that been the mystic happiness such as she had yearned for?… And a dull feeling of resentment against everything and everybody, against the living and the dead, began to smoulder within her bosom. She was angry with her dead husband and with her dead father and mother; she was indignant with the people amongst whom she was now living, whose eyes were always upon her so that she dared not allow herself any freedom; she was hurt with Frau Rupius, who had not turned out to be such a friend that Bertha could rely on her for support; she hated Klingemann because, ugly and repulsive as he was, he desired to make her his wife; and finally she was violently enraged with the man she had loved in the days of her girlhood, because he had not been bolder, because he had withheld from her the ultimate happiness, and because he had bequeathed her nothing but memories full of fragrance, yet full of torment. And there she was, sitting in her lonely room amongst the faded mementoes of a youth that had passed unprofitably and friendlessly; there she was, on the verge of the time when there would be no more hopes and no more desires — life had slipped through her fingers, and she was thirty and poor.

She wrapped up the letters and the other things, and threw them, all crumpled as they were, into the case. Then she closed it and went over to the window.

Evening was at hand. A gentle breeze was blowing over from the direction of the vine-trellises. Her eyes swam with unwept tears, not of grief, but of exasperation. What was she to do? She, who had, without fear and without hope, seen the days, nights, months, years extending into the future, shuddered at the prospect of the emptiness of the evening which lay before her.

It was the hour at which she usually returned home from her walk. On that day she had sent the nursemaid out with Fritz — not so much as once did she yearn for her boy. Indeed, for one moment there even fell on her child a ray of the anger which she felt against all mankind and against her fate. And, in her vast discontent, she was seized with a feeling of envy against many people who, at ordinary times, seemed to her anything but enviable. She envied Frau Martin because of the tender affection of her husband; the tobacconist's wife because she was loved by Herr Klingemann and the captain; her sister-in-law, because she was already old; Elly, because she was still young; she envied the servant, who was sitting on a plank over there with a soldier, and whom she heard laughing. She could not endure being at home any longer; She took up her straw hat and sunshade and hurried into the street. There she felt somewhat better. In her room she had been unhappy; in the street she was no more than out of humour.

In the main thoroughfare she met Herr and Frau Mahlmann, to whose children she gave music lessons. Frau Mahlmann was already aware that Bertha had ordered a costume from a dressmaker in Vienna on the previous day, and she began to discuss the matter with great weightiness. Later on, Bertha met her brother-in-law, who came towards her from the chestnut avenue.

"Well," he said, "so you were in Vienna yesterday! Tell me, what did you do with yourself there? Did you have any adventures?"

"What do you mean?" asked Bertha, looking at him in great alarm, as though she had done something she ought not, and had been found out.

"What? You had no adventures? But you were with Frau Rupius; all the men must surely have run after you?"

"What on earth has come into your head? Frau Rupius' conduct is irreproachable! She is one of the most well-bred ladies I know."

"Quite so, quite so! I am not saying a word against Frau Rupius or you."

She looked him in the face. His eyes were gleaming, as they often did when he had had a little too much to drink. She could not help recalling that somebody had once foretold that Herr Garlan would die of an apoplectic stroke.

"I must pay another visit to Vienna myself one of these days," he said. "Why, I haven't been there since Ash Wednesday. I should like to see some of my acquaintances once again. The next time you and Frau Rupius go, you might just take me with you."

"With pleasure," answered Bertha. "I shall have to go again, of course, before long, to have my costume tried on."

Garlan laughed.

"Yes, and you can take me with you, too, when you try it on."

He sidled up closer to her than was necessary. It was a way he had always to squeeze up against her, and, moreover, she was accustomed to his jokes, but on the present occasion she thought him particularly objectionable. She was very much annoyed that he, of all men, always spoke of Frau Rupius in such a suspicious way.

“Let us sit down,” said Herr Garlan; “if you don’t mind.”

They both sat down on a seat. Garlan took the newspaper from his pocket.

“Ah!” said Bertha involuntarily.

“Will you have it?” asked Garlan.

“Has your wife read it yet?”

“Tut, tut!” said Garlan disdainfully. “Will you have it?”

“If you can spare it.”

“For you — with pleasure. But we might just as well read it together.”

He edged closer to Bertha and opened the paper.

Herr and Frau Martin came along, arm in arm, and stopped before them.

“Well, so you are back again from the momentous journey,” said
Herr Martin.

“Ah, yes, you were in Vienna,” said Frau Martin, nestling against her husband. “And with Frau Rupius, too,” she added, as though that implied an aggravation of the offence.

Once more Bertha had to give an account of her new costume. She told them all about it in a somewhat mechanical manner, indeed; but she felt, none the less, that it was long since she had been such an interesting personage as she was now.

Klingemann went by, bowed with ironical politeness, and turned round to Bertha with a look which seemed to express his sympathy for her in having to be friendly with such people.

It seemed to Bertha as though she were gifted that day with the ability to read men’s glances.

It began to grow dark. They set off together towards the town. Bertha suddenly grew uneasy at not having met her boy. She walked on in front with Frau Martin, who turned the conversation on to the subject of Frau Rupius. She badly wanted to find out whether Bertha had observed anything.

“But what do you mean, Frau Martin? I accompanied Frau Rupius to her brother’s house, and called for her there on my way back.”

“And are you convinced that she was with her brother the whole time?”

“I really don’t know what you expect Frau Rupius to do! Where would she have been then?”

“Well,” said Frau Martin; “really, you are an artless creature. I must say — or are you only putting on? Do you quite forget then …”

Then she whispered something into Bertha’s ear, at which the latter grew very red. She had never heard such an expression from a woman. She was indignant.

“Frau Martin,” she said, “I am not so old myself either and, as you see, it is quite possible to live a decent life in such circumstances.”

Frau Martin was a little taken aback.

“Yes, of course!” she said. “Yes, of course! You must, I dare say, think that I am a little over-nice in such matters.”

Bertha was afraid that Frau Martin might be about to give her some further and more intimate disclosures, and she was very glad to find that, at that moment, they had reached the street corner where she could say good-bye.

“Bertha, here’s your paper!” her brother-in-law called after her.

She turned round quickly and took the paper. Then she hastened home. Fritz had returned and was waiting for her at the window. She hurried up to him. She embraced and kissed him as though she had not seen him for weeks. She felt that she was completely engrossed with love for her boy, a fact which, at the time, filled her with pride. She listened to his account of how he had spent the afternoon, where he had been, and with whom he had played. She cut up his supper for him, undressed him, put him to bed, and was satisfied with herself. Her state of mind of the afternoon, when she had rummaged among the old letters, had cursed her fate and had even envied the tobacconist's wife, seemed to her, at the thought of it, as an attack of fever. She ate a hearty supper and went to bed early. Before falling to sleep, however, it occurred to her that she would like to read the paper. She stretched her limbs, shook up the soft bolster so that her head should be higher, and held the paper as near the candle as possible.

As her custom was, she first of all skimmed through the theatrical and art news. Even the short announcements, as well as the local reports, had acquired a new interest for her, since her trip to Vienna. Her eyelids were beginning to grow heavy when all at once she observed the name of Emil Lindbach amongst the personal news. She opened her eyes wide, sat up in bed and read the paragraph.

"Emil Lindbach, violinist to the Court of Bavaria, whose great success at the Spanish Court we were recently in a position to announce, has been honoured by the Queen of Spain, who has invested him with the Order of the Redeemer."

A smile flitted across her lips. She was glad, Emil Lindbach had obtained the Order of the Redeemer…. Yes … the man whose letters she had been reading that very day … the man who had kissed her — the man who had once written to her that he would never adore any other woman…. Yes, Emil — the only man in all the world in whom she really had still any interest — except her boy, of course. She felt as though this notice in the paper was intended only for her, as though, indeed, Emil himself had selected that expedient, so as to establish some means of communication with her. Had it not been he, after all, whose back she had seen in the distance on the previous day? All at once she seemed to be quite near to him; still smiling, she whispered to herself: "Herr Emil Lindbach, violinist to the Court of Bavaria, … I congratulate you…."

Her lips remained half open. An idea had suddenly come to her. She got up quickly, donned her dressing-gown, took up the light and went into the adjoining room. She sat down at the table and wrote the following letter as fluently as though some one were standing beside her and dictating it, word for word:

"DEAR EMIL,

"I have just read in the newspaper that the Queen of Spain has honoured you by investing you with the Order of the Redeemer. I do not know whether you still remember me" — she smiled as she wrote these words— "but, all the same, I will not let this opportunity slip without congratulating you upon your many successes, of which I so often have the pleasure of reading. I am living most contentedly in the little town where fate has cast me; I am getting on very well!

"A few lines in reply would make me very happy.

"Your old friend,

"BERTHA.

"P.S. — Kind regards also from my little Fritz (five years old)."

She had finished the letter. For a moment she asked herself whether she should mention that she was a widow; but even if he had not known it before, it was quite obvious from her letter. She read it over and nodded contentedly. She wrote the address.

“Herr Emil Lindbach, violinist to the Court of Bavaria, Holder of the Order of the Redeemer …” Should she write all that? He was certain to have many other Orders also … “Vienna …”

But where was he living at present? That, however, was of no consequence with such a celebrated name. Moreover the inaccuracy in the address would also show that she did not attach so very much importance to it all; if the letter reached him — well, so much the better. It was also a way of putting fate to the test…. Ah, but how was she to know for a certainty that the letter had arrived or not? The answer might, of course, quite easily fail to reach her if…. No, no, certainly not! He would be sure to thank her. And so, to bed.

She held the letter in her hand. No, she could not go to bed now, she was wide awake again. And, moreover, if she did not post the letter until next morning it would not go before the midday train, and would not reach Emil before the day after. That was an interminably long time. She had just spoken to him, and were thirty-six hours to be allowed to elapse before her words reached his ears?… Supposing she did not wait, but went to the post now?… no, to the station? Then he would have the letter at ten o’clock the next morning. He was certain to be late in rising — the letter would be brought into his room with his breakfast…. Yes, she must post the letter at once!

Quickly she dressed again. She hurried down the stairs — it was not yet late — she hastened along the main street to the station, put the letter in the yellow box, and was home again.

As she stood in her room, beside the tumbled bed, and she saw the paper lying on the floor and the candle flickering, it seemed as though she had returned from a strange adventure. For a long time she remained sitting on the edge of the bed, gazing through the window into the bright, starlit night, and her soul was filled with vague and pleasurable expectations.

"My Dear Bertha!

"I am wholly unable to tell you how glad I was to receive your letter. Do you really still think of me, then? How curious it is that it should have been an Order, of all things, that was the cause of my hearing from you again! Well, at all events, an Order has at least had some significance for once in a way! Therefore, I heartily thank you for your congratulations. But, apart from all that, don't you come to Vienna sometimes? It is not so very far, after all. I should be immensely pleased to see you again. So come soon!

"With all my heart,

"Your old

"Emil."

Bertha was sitting at breakfast, Fritz beside her. He was chatting, but she was not listening to him. The letter lay before her on the table.

It seemed miraculous. Two nights and a day ago she had posted her letter, and here was his reply already. Emil had not allowed a day to pass, not even an hour! He had written to her as cordially as if they had only parted the previous day.

She looked out of the window. What a splendid morning it was! Outside the birds were singing, and from the hills came floating down the fragrance of the early summer-tide.

Bertha read the letter again and again. Then she took Fritz, lifted him up and kissed him to her heart's content. It was long since she had been so happy.

While she was dressing she turned things over in her mind. It was Thursday; on Monday she had to go to Vienna again to try on the costume. That was four long days, just the same space of time as had elapsed since she had dined at her brother-in-law's — what a long time it seemed to have to wait. No, she must see Emil sooner than that. She could, of course, go the very next morning and remain in Vienna a few days. But what excuse could she make to the people at home?… Oh, she would be sure to find some pretext. It was more important to decide in what way she should answer his letter and tell him where she would meet him…. She could not write and say: "I am coming, please let me know where I can see you…." Perhaps he would answer: "Come to my rooms…." No, no, no! It would be best to let him have a definite statement of fact. She would write to the effect that she was going to Vienna on such and such a day and was to be found at such and such a place….

Oh, if she only had someone with whom she could talk the whole thing over!… She thought of Frau Rupius — she had a genuine yearning to tell her everything. At the same time she had an idea that, by so doing, she might become more intimate with her and might win her esteem. She felt that she had become much more important since the receipt of Emil's letter. Now she remarked, too, that she had been very much afraid that Emil might quite possibly have changed and become conceited, affected and spoiled — just as was the case with so many celebrated men. But there was not the slightest trace of such things in the letter; there was the same quick, heavy writing, the same warmth of tone, as in those earlier letters. What a number of experiences he might well have had since she had last seen him — well, had not she also had many experiences, and were they not all seemingly obliterated?

Before going out she read Emil's letter again. It grew more like a living voice; she heard the cadence of the words, and that final "Come soon" seemed to call her with tender yearning. She stuck the letter into her bodice and remembered how, as a girl, she had often done the same with his notes, and how the gentle touch had sent a pleasant thrill coursing through her.

First of all, she went to the Mahlmanns', where she gave the twins their music lesson. Very often the finger exercises, to which she had to listen there, were positively painful to her, and she would rap the children on the knuckles when they struck a false note. On the present occasion, however, she was not in the least strict. When Frau Mahlmann, fat and friendly as ever, came into the room and inquired whether Bertha was satisfied, the latter praised the children and added, as though suddenly inspired:

"Now, I shall be able to give them a few days' holiday."

"Holiday! How will that be, then, dear Frau Garlan?"

"You see, Frau Mahlmann, I have no choice in the matter. What do you think, when I was in Vienna lately my cousin begged me so pressingly to be sure to come and spend a few days with her—"

"Quite so, quite so," said Frau Mahlmann.

Bertha's courage kept rising, and she continued to add falsehood to falsehood, taking a kind of pleasure in her own boldness:

"I really wanted to put it off till June. But this very morning I had a letter from her, saying that her husband is going away for a time, and she is so lonely, and just now" — she felt the letter crackle, and had an indescribable desire to take it out; but yet restrained herself— "and I, think I shall perhaps take advantage of the opportunity…."

"Well, to tell the truth," said Frau Mahlmann, taking Bertha by both hands, "if I had a cousin in Vienna, I would like to stay with her a week every fortnight!"

Bertha beamed. She felt as though an invisible hand was clearing away the obstacles which lay in her path; everything was going so well. And, indeed, to whom, after all, was she accountable for her actions? Suddenly, however, the fear flashed through her mind that her brother-in-law really intended to go with her to Vienna. Everything became entangled again; dangers cropped up and suspicion lurked even under the good-natured smile of Frau Mahlmann….

Ah, she must on no account fail to take Frau Rupius into her confidence.
Directly the lesson was over she went to call upon her.

It was not until she had found Frau Rupius in a white morning gown, sitting on the sofa, and had observed the surprised glance with which the latter received her, that it struck Bertha that there was anything strange in her early visit, and she said with affected cheerfulness:

"Good morning! I'm early to-day, am I not?"

Frau Rupius remained serious. She had not the usual smile on her lips.

"I am very glad to see you. The hour makes no difference to me."

Then she threw her a questioning glance, and Bertha did not know what to say. She was annoyed, too, at the childish embarrassment, of which she could not rid herself in the presence of Frau Rupius.

"I wanted," she said, at length, "to ask you how you felt after our trip."

"Quite well," answered Frau Rupius, rather stiffly. But all at once her features changed, and she added with excessive friendliness: "Really, it was my place to have asked you. I am accustomed to those trips, you know."

As she said this she looked through the window and Bertha mechanically followed her gaze, which wandered over to the other side of the market square to an open window with flowers on the sill. It was quite calm, and the repose of a summer day shrouded the slumbering town. Bertha would have dearly liked to sit beside Frau Rupius and be kissed upon the brow by her, and blessed; but at the same time she had a feeling of compassion towards her. All this puzzled her. For what reason, indeed, had she really come? And what should she say to her?… "I'm going to-morrow to Vienna to see the man who used to be in love with me when I was a girl?"… In what way did all that concern Frau Rupius? Would it really interest her in the very slightest degree? There she sat as if surrounded by something impenetrable; it was impossible to approach her. She could not approach her, that was the trouble. Of course, there was a word by means of which it was possible to find the way to her heart, only Bertha did not know it.

"Well, how is your little boy?" asked Frau Rupius, without taking her eyes off the flowers in the opposite window.

"He is going on as well as ever. He is very well-behaved, and is a marvellously good child!"

The last word she uttered with an intentional tenderness as though Frau Rupius was to be won over by that means.

"Yes, yes," answered the latter, her tone implying that she knew he was good, and had not asked about that. "Have you a reliable nursemaid?" she added.

Bertha was somewhat astonished at the question.

"My maid has, of course, many other things to attend to besides her nurse's duties," she replied; "but I cannot complain of her. She is also a very good cook."

"It must be a great happiness to have such a boy," said Frau Rupius very drily, after a short interval of silence.

"It is, indeed, my only happiness," said Bertha, more loudly than was necessary.

It was an answer which she had often made before, but she knew that, on that day, she was not speaking with entire sincerity. She felt the sheet of paper touch her skin, and, almost with alarm, she realized that she had also deemed it a happiness to have received that letter. At the same time it occurred to her that the woman sitting opposite her had neither a child nor even the prospect of having one, and Bertha would have been glad to take back what she had said. Indeed, she was on the point of seeking some qualifying word. But, as if Frau Rupius was able to see into her soul, and as if in her presence a lie was impossible, she said at once:

"Your only happiness? Say, rather, 'a great happiness,' and that is no small thing! I often envy you on that score, although I really think that, apart from such considerations, life in itself is a joy to you."

"Indeed, my life is so lonely, so…."

Anna smiled.

"Quite so, but I did not mean that. What I meant was that the fact that the sun is shining and the weather is now so fine also makes you glad."

"Oh yes, very glad!" replied Bertha assiduously. "My frame of mind is generally dependent on the weather. During that thunderstorm a few days ago I was utterly depressed, and then, when the storm was over __"

Frau Rupius interrupted her.

"That is the case with every one, you know."

Bertha grew low-spirited. She felt that she was not clever enough for Frau Rupius; she could never do any more than follow the ordinary lines of conversation, like the other women of her acquaintance. It seemed as though Frau Rupius had arranged an examination for her, which she had not passed, and, all at once, she was seized with a great apprehension at the prospect of meeting Emil again. What sort of a figure would she cut in his presence? How shy and helpless she had become during the six years of her narrow existence in the little town!

Frau Rupius rose to her feet. The white morning gown streamed around her; she looked taller and more beautiful than usual, and Bertha was involuntarily reminded of an actress she had seen on the stage a very long time ago, and to whom at that moment Frau Rupius bore a remarkable resemblance. Bertha said to herself: If I were only like Frau Rupius I am sure I would not be so timid. At the same time it struck her that this exquisitely lovely woman was married to an invalid — might not the gossips be right then, after all? But here, again, she was unable to pursue further her train of thought; she could not imagine in what way the gossips could be right. And at that moment it dawned upon her mind how bitter was the fate to which Frau Rupius was condemned, no matter whether she now bore it or resisted it.

But, as if Anna had again read Bertha's thoughts, and could not tolerate that the latter should thus insinuate herself into her confidence, the uncanny gravity of her face relaxed suddenly, and she said in an innocent tone:

"Just fancy, my husband is still asleep. He has acquired the habit of remaining awake until late at night, reading and looking at engravings, and then he sleeps on until midday. As for that, it is quite a matter of habit; when I used to live in Vienna I was incredibly lazy about getting up."

And thereupon she began to chat about her girlhood, cheerfully, and with a confiding manner such as Bertha had never before noticed in her. She told about her father, who had been an officer on the Staff, about her mother, who had died when she was quite a young woman; and about the little house in the garden of which she had played as a child. It was only now that Bertha learned that Frau Rupius had first become acquainted with her husband when he was just a boy; he had lived with his parents in the adjoining house, and had fallen in love with Anna and she with him, while they were both children. To Bertha the whole period of Frau Rupius' youth appeared as if radiant with bright sunbeams, a youth replete with happiness, replete with hope; and it seemed to her, moreover, that Frau Rupius' voice assumed a fresher tone when she went on to relate about the travels which she and her husband had undertaken in the early days of their married life.

Bertha let her talk and hesitated to interrupt her with a word, as though she were a somnambulist wandering on the ridge of a roof. But while Frau Rupius was speaking of her past, a period through which the blessedness of being loved ever beamed brightly as its chiefest glory, Bertha's soul began to thrill with the hope of a happiness for herself such as she had not yet experienced. And while Frau Rupius was telling of the walking tours through Switzerland and the Tyrol, which she had once undertaken with her husband, Bertha pictured herself wandering by Emil's side on similar paths, and she was filled with such an immense yearning that she would dearly have liked at once to get up, go to Vienna, seek him out, fall into his arms, and at last, at last to taste those delights which had hitherto been denied her.

Her thoughts wandered so far that she did not notice that Frau Rupius had long since fallen silent, and was sitting on the sofa, staring at the flowers in the window of the house over the way. The utter stillness brought Bertha back to reality; the whole room seemed to her to be filled with some mysterious atmosphere, in which the past and the future were strangely intermingled. She felt that there existed an incomprehensible connexion between herself and Frau Rupius. She rose to her feet, stretched out her hand, and, as if it were quite a matter of course, the two ladies kissed each other good-bye like a couple of old friends.

On reaching the door Bertha remarked:

"I am going to Vienna again to-morrow for a few days."

She smiled as she spoke, like a girl about to be married.

After leaving Frau Rupius, Bertha went to her sister-in-law. Her nephew was already sitting at the piano, improvising in a very wild manner. He pretended not to have noticed her enter, and proceeded to practise his finger exercises, which he played in an attitude of stiffness, assumed for the occasion.

"We will play a duet to-day," said Bertha, endeavouring to find the volume of Schubert's marches.

She paid not the least attention to her own playing, and hardly noticed how, in using the pedals, her nephew touched her feet.

In the meantime Elly came into the room and kissed her aunt.

"Ah, just so, I had quite forgotten that!" said Richard, and, whilst continuing to play, he placed his lips close to Bertha's cheek.

Her sister-in-law came in with her bunch of keys rattling and a deep dejection on her pale and indistinct features.

"I have given Brigitta notice," she said in a feeble tone. "I couldn't endure it any longer."

"Shall I get you a maid in Vienna?" asked Bertha with a facility which even surprised her.

And now for the second time she told the fiction which she had invented about her cousin's invitation, with even greater assurance than before, and, moreover, with a little amplification this time. Along with the secret joy which she found in the telling, she felt her courage increasing at the same time. Even the possibility of being joined by her brother-in-law no longer alarmed her. She felt, too, that she had an advantage over him, because of the way in which he was in the habit of sidling up to her.

"How long are you thinking of staying in the town, then?" asked her sister-in-law.

"Two or three days; certainly no longer. And in any case, of course, I should have had to go on Monday — to the dressmaker."

Richard strummed on the keys, but Elly stood with both arms resting on the piano, gazing at her aunt with a look almost of terror.

"Whatever is the matter with you?" asked Bertha involuntarily.

"Why do you ask that?" said Elly.

"You are looking at me," said Bertha, "as queerly as though — well, as though you did not like the idea of missing your music lessons for a couple of days."

"No, it is not that," replied Elly, smiling. "But … no, I can't tell you."

"What is it, though?" asked Bertha.

"No, please, I really can't tell you."

She hugged her aunt, almost imploringly.

"Elly," said her mother, "I cannot permit you to have any secrets."

She sat down as though most deeply grieved and very tired.

"Well, Elly," said Bertha, filled with a vague fear, "if I were to beg you—"

"But you mustn't laugh at me, Aunt."

"Certainly not."

"Well, you see, Aunt, I was so frightened when you were away in Vienna that last time — I know very well it is silly — but it is because … because of the number of carriages in the streets."

Bertha drew a deep breath as of relief, and stroked Elly's cheeks.

"I will be sure to take great care. You can be quite easy in your mind."

Her sister-in-law shook her head.

"I am afraid that Elly will turn out a most eccentric girl."

Before Bertha left the house she arranged with her sister-in-law that she would come back to supper, and that she would hand over Fritz to the care of her relations while she as away in Vienna.

After dinner, Bertha sat down at the writing table, read over Emil's letter a few more times, and made a rough draft of her reply.

"My Dear Emil,

"It was very good of you to answer me so soon. I was very happy" — she crossed out "very happy" and substituted "very glad"— "when I received your dear note. How much has changed since we last saw each other! You have become a famous virtuoso since then, which I, for my part, was always quite sure that you would be" — she stopped and struck out the whole sentence— "I also share your desire to see me soon again" — no, that was mere nonsense! This was better: "I should be immensely delighted to have an opportunity of talking to you once more." — Then an excellent idea occurred to her, and she wrote with great zest: "It is really strange that we have not met for so long, for I come to Vienna quite often; for instance, I shall be there this week-end…." Then she allowed her pen to drop and fell into thought. She was determined to go to Vienna the next afternoon, to put up at an hotel, and to sleep there, so as to be quite fresh the following day, and to breathe the air of Vienna for a few hours before meeting him. The next question was to fix a meeting place. That was easily done. "In accordance with your kind wish I am writing to let you know that on Saturday morning at eleven o'clock…." No, that was not the right thing! It was so businesslike, and yet again too eager— "if," she wrote, "you would really care to take the opportunity of seeing your old friend again, then perhaps you will not consider it too much trouble to go to the Art and History Museum on Saturday morning at eleven o'clock. I will be in the gallery of the Dutch School" — as she wrote that she seemed to herself rather impressive and, at the same time, everything of a suspicious nature seemed to be removed.

She read over the draft. It appeared to her rather dry, but, after all, it contained all that was necessary, and did not compromise her in any way. Whatever else was to happen would take place in the Museum, in the Dutch gallery.

She neatly copied out the draft, signed it, placed it in an envelope, and hurried down the sunny street to post the letter in the nearest box. On arriving home again she slipped off her dress, donned a dressing-gown, sat down on the sofa, and turned over the leaves of a novel by Gerstacker, which she had read half a score of times already. But she was unable to take in a word. At first, she attempted to dismiss from her mind the thoughts which beset her, but her efforts met with no success.

She felt ashamed of herself, but all the time she kept dreaming that she was in Emil's arms. Why ever did such dreams come to her? She had never, even for a moment, thought of such a thing! No, … she would not think of it, either … she was not that sort of woman…. No, she could not be anyone's mistress — and even on this occasion…. Yes, perhaps if she were to go to Vienna once more and again … and again … yes, much later — perhaps. And besides, he would not even so much as dare to speak of such a thing, or even to hint at it…. It was, however, useless to reason like this; she could no longer think of anything else. Ever more importunate came her dreams and, in the end, she gave up the struggle. She lolled indolently in the corner of the sofa, allowed the book to slip from her fingers and lie on the floor, and closed her eyes.

When she rose to her feet an hour later a whole night seemed to have passed, and the visit to Frau Rupius seemed, in particular, to be far distant. Again she wondered at this confusion of time — in truth, the hours appeared to be longer or shorter just as they chose.

She dressed in order to take Fritz for a walk. She was in the tired, indifferent mood which usually came over her after an unaccustomed afternoon nap. It was that mood in which it is scarcely possible to collect one's thoughts with any degree of completeness, and in which the usual appears strange, but as though it refers to some one else. For the first time, it seemed strange to Bertha that the boy, whom she was now helping into his coat, was her own child, whose father had long been buried, and for whom she had endured the pangs of motherhood.

Something within her urged her to go to the cemetery again that day. She had not, however, the feeling that she had a wrong to make reparation for, but that she must again politely visit some one to whom she had become a stranger for no valid reason. She chose the way through the chestnut avenue. There the heat was particularly oppressive that day. When she passed out into the sun again a gentle breeze was blowing and the foliage of the trees in the cemetery seemed to greet her with a slight bow. As she passed through the cemetery gates with Fritz the breeze came towards her, cool, even refreshing. With a feeling of gentle, almost sweet, weariness, she walked through the broad centre avenue, allowed Fritz to run on in front, and did not mind when he disappeared from her sight for a few seconds behind a tombstone, though at other times she would not have allowed such behaviour. She remained standing before her husband's grave. She did not, however, look down at the flower-bed, as was her general custom, but gazed past the tombstone and away over the wall into the blue sky. She felt no tears in her eyes; she felt no emotion, no dread; she did not even realize that she had walked over the dead, and that there beneath her feet he, who had once held her in his arms, had crumbled into dust.

Suddenly she heard behind her hurried footsteps on the gravel, such as she was not generally accustomed to hear in the cemetery. Almost shocked, she turned round. Klingemann was standing before her, in an attitude of greeting, holding in his hand his straw hat, which was fixed by a ribbon to his coat button. He bowed deeply to Bertha.

"What a strange thing to see you here!" she said.

"Not at all, my dear lady, not at all! I saw you from the street; I recognized you by your walk."

He spoke in a very loud tone, and Bertha almost involuntarily murmured:

"Hush!"

A mocking smile at once made its appearance on Klingemann's face.

"He won't wake up," he muttered, between his clenched teeth.

Bertha was so indignant at this remark that she did not attempt to find an answer, but called Fritz, and was about to depart.

Klingemann, however, seized her by the hand.

"Stop," he whispered, gazing at the ground.

Bertha opened her eyes wide; she could not understand.

Suddenly Klingemann looked up from the ground and fixed his eyes on Bertha's.

"I love you, you see," he said.

Bertha uttered a low cry.

Klingemann let go her hand, and added in quite an easy conversational tone:

"Perhaps that strikes you as rather odd."

"It is unheard of! — unheard of!"

Once more she sought to go, and she called Fritz.

"Stop! If you leave me alone now, Bertha…." said Klingemann, now in a suppliant tone.

Bertha had recovered her senses again.

"Don't call me Bertha!" she said, vehemently. "Who gave you the right to do so? I have no wish to say anything further to you … and here, of all places!" she added, with a downward glance, which, as it were, besought the pardon of the dead.

Meanwhile Fritz had come back. Klingemann seemed very disappointed.

"My dear lady," he said, following Bertha, who, holding Fritz by the hand, was slowly walking away: "I recognize my mistake. I should have begun differently and not said that which seems now to have frightened you, until I had come to the end of a well-turned speech."

Bertha did not look at him, but said, as though she were speaking to herself:

"I would not have considered it possible; I thought you were a gentleman…."

They were at the cemetery gate. Klingemann looked back again, and in his glance there was something of regret at not having been able to play out his scene at the graveside to a finish. Hat in hand, and twisting the ribbon, by which it was fastened, round his finger, and still keeping by Bertha's side, he went on to say:

"All I can do now is to repeat that I love you, that you pursue me in my dreams — in a word, you must be mine!"

Bertha came to a standstill again, as if she were terrified.

"You will, perhaps, consider my remarks insolent, but let us take things as they are. You" — he made a long pause— "are alone in the world. So am I—"

Bertha stared him full in the face.

"I know what you are thinking of," said Klingemann. "That is all of no consequence; that is all done with the moment you give the word. I have a dim presentiment that we two suit each other very well. Yes, unless I am very much deceived, the blood should be flowing in your veins, my dear lady, as warm…."

The glance which Bertha now gave him was so full of anger and loathing that Klingemann was unable to complete the sentence. He therefore began another.

"Ah, when you come to think of it, what sort of a life is it that I am now leading? It is even a long, long time since I was loved by a noble woman such as you are. I understand, of course, your hesitation, or rather, your refusal. Deuce take it, of course it needs a bit of courage — with such a disreputable fellow as I am, too … although, perhaps, things are not quite so bad. Ah, if I could only find a human soul, a kind, womanly soul!" — He emphasized the "womanly soul"— "Yes, my dear lady, it was as little meant to be my fate as it was yours to pine away and grow crabbed in such a hole of a town as this. You must not be offended if I … if I—"

The words began to fail him when he approached the truth. Bertha looked at him. He seemed to her at that moment to be rather ridiculous, almost pitiable, and very old, and she wondered how it was that he still had the courage, not so much as to propose to her, as even simply to court her favour.

And yet, to her own amazement and shame, there overflowed from these unseemly words of a man who appeared absurd to her, the surge, so to speak, of desire. And when his words had died away she heard them again in her mind — but as though from the lips of another who was waiting for her in Vienna — and she felt that she would not be able to withstand this other speaker. Klingemann continued to talk; he spoke of his life as being a failure, but yet a life worth saving. He said that women were to be blamed for bringing him so low, and that a woman could raise him up again. Away back in his student days he had run away with a woman, and that had been the beginning of his misfortunes. He talked of his unbridled passions, and Bertha could not restrain a smile. At the same time she was ashamed of the knowledge which seemed to her to be implied by the smile….

"I will walk up and down in front of your window this evening," said

Klingemann, when they reached the gate. “Will you play the piano?”

“I don’t know.”

“I will take it as a sign.”

With that he went away.

In the evening she supped, as she had so often done, at her brother-in-law’s house. At the table she sat between Elly and Richard. Mention was made of her approaching journey to Vienna as though it was really nothing more than a matter of paying a visit to her cousin, trying on the new costume at the dressmaker’s, and executing a few commissions in the way of household necessities, which she had promised to undertake for her sister-in-law. Towards the end of supper, her brother-in-law smoked his pipe, Richard read the paper to him, her sister-in-law knitted, and Elly, who had nestled up close beside Bertha, leaned her childish head upon her aunt’s breast. And Bertha, as her glance took in the whole scene, felt herself to be a crafty liar. She, the widow of a good husband, was sitting there in a family circle which interested itself in her welfare so loyally; by her side was a young girl who looked up at her as on an older friend. Hitherto she had been a good woman, honest and industrious, living only for her son. And now, was she not about to cast aside all these things, to deceive and lie to these excellent people, and to plunge into an adventure, the end of which she could foresee? What was it, then, that had come over her these last few days, by what dreams was she pursued, how was it that her whole existence seemed only to aspire towards the one moment when she would again feel the arms of a man about her? She had but to think of it and she was seized with an indescribable sensation of horror, during which she seemed devoid of will, as if she had fallen under the influence of some strange power.

And while the words that Richard was reading beat monotonously upon her ear, and her fingers played with the locks of Elly’s hair — she resisted for the last time; she resolved that she would be steadfast — that she would do no more than see Emil once again, and that, like her own mother who had died long ago, and like all the other good women she knew — her cousin in Vienna, Frau Mahlmann, Frau Martin, her sister-in-law, and … yes, certainly Frau Rupius as well — she would belong only to him who made her his wife. As soon, however, as she thought of that, the idea flashed through her mind, like lightning: if he himself…if Emil…. But she was afraid of the thought, and banished it from her. Not with such bold dreams as these would she go to meet Emil. He, the great artist, and she, a poor widow with a child…no, no! — she would see him once again … in the Museum of course, at the Dutch gallery … once only, and that for the last time, and she would tell him that she did not wish for anything else than to see him that once. With a smile of satisfaction she pictured to herself his somewhat disappointed face; and, as if practising beforehand for the scene, she knitted her brow and assumed a stern cast of countenance, and had the words ready on her lips to say to him: “Oh, no, Emil, if you think that….” But she must take care not to say it in quite too harsh a tone, in order that Emil might not, as on that previous occasion … twelve years before! … cease to plead after only the one attempt. She intended that he should beg a second time, a third time — ah, Heaven knew, she intended that he should continue to plead until she gave way…. For she felt, there in the midst of all those good, respectable, virtuous people, with whom, indeed, she would soon no longer be numbered, that she would give way the moment he first asked her. She was only going to Vienna to be his, and after that, if needs must be, to die.

On the afternoon of the following day Bertha set off. It was very hot, and the sun beat down upon the leather-covered seats of the railway carriage. Bertha had opened the window and drawn forward the yellow curtain, which, however, kept flapping in the breeze. She was alone. But she scarcely thought of the place towards which she was travelling; she scarcely thought of the man whom she was about to see again, or of what might be in store for her — she thought only of the strange words she had heard, an hour before her departure. She would gladly have forgotten them, at least for the next few days. Why was it that she had been unable to remain at home during those few short hours between dinner and her departure? What unrest had driven her on this glowing hot afternoon out from her room, on to the street, into the market, and bade her pass Herr Rupius' house? He was sitting there upon the balcony, his eyes fixed on the gleaming white pavement, and over his knees, as usual, was spread the great plaid rug, the ends of which were hanging down between the bars of the balcony railings; in front of him was the little table with a bottle of water and a glass. When he perceived Bertha his eyes became fixed upon her, as though he were making some request to her, and she observed that he beckoned her with a slight movement of the head.

Why had she obeyed him? Why had she not taken his nod simply as a greeting and thanked him and gone upon her way? When, however, in answer to his nod, she turned towards the door of the house, she saw a smile of thanks glide over his lips and she found it still on his countenance when she went out to him on the balcony, through the cool, darkened room, and, taking his outstretched hand, sat down opposite to him on the other side of the little table.

"How are you getting on?" she asked.

At first he made no answer; then she observed from the working of his face that he wanted to say something, but seemed as if he was unable to utter a word.

"She is going to …" he broke out at length. These first words he uttered in an unnecessarily loud voice; then, as though alarmed at the almost shrieking tone, he added very softly: "My wife is going to leave me."

Bertha involuntarily looked around her.

Rupius raised his hands, as if to reassure her.

"She cannot hear us She is in her room; she is asleep."

Bertha was embarrassed.

"How do you know?…" she stammered. "It is impossible — quite impossible!"

"She is going away — away, for a time, as she says … for a time … do you understand?" "Why, yes, to her brother, I suppose."

"She is going away for ever … for ever! Naturally she does not like to say to me: Good-bye, you will never see me again! So she says: I should like to travel a little; I need a change; I will go to the lake for a few weeks; I should like to bathe; I need a change of air! Naturally she does not say to me: I can endure it no longer; I am young and in my prime and healthy; you are paralysed and will soon die; I have a horror of your affliction and of the loathsome state that must supervene before it is at an end. So she says: I will go away only for a few weeks, then I will come back again and stay with you."

Bertha's painful agitation became merged in her embarrassment.

"You are certainly mistaken," was all that she could answer.

Rupius hastily drew up the rug, which was on the point of slipping down off his knees. He seemed to find it chilly. As he continued to speak, he drew the rug higher and higher, until finally he held it with both hands pressed against her breast.

"I have seen it coming; for years I have seen this moment coming. Imagine what sort of an existence it has been; waiting for such a moment, defenceless and forced to be silent! — Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Oh, no," said Bertha, looking down at the market square.

"Well, I beg your pardon for referring to all this. I had no intention of doing so, but when I saw you walking past — well, thank you very much for having listened to me."

"Please don't mention it," said Bertha, mechanically stretching out her hand to him. He did not notice it, however, and she let it lie upon the table.

"Now it is all over," said Herr Rupius; "now comes the time of loneliness, the time of dread."

"But has your wife … she loves you, I'm sure of it!… I am quite certain that you are giving yourself needless anxiety. Wouldn't the simplest course be, Herr Rupius, for you to request your wife to forego this journey?"

"Request?…" said Herr Rupius, almost majestically. "Can I pretend to have the right to do so? AH these last six or seven years have only been a favour which she has granted me. I beg you, consider it. During all these seven years not a word of complaint at the waste of her youth has passed her lips."

"She loves you," said Bertha, decisively; "and that is the chief point."

Herr Rupius looked at her for a long time.

"I know what is in your mind, although you do not venture to say it. But your husband, my dear Frau Bertha, lies deep in the grave, and does not sleep by your side night after night."

He looked up with a glance that seemed to ascend to Heaven as a curse.

Time was getting on; Bertha thought of her train.

"When is your wife going to start?"

"Nothing has been said about that yet — but I am keeping you, perhaps?"

"No, not at all, Herr Rupius, only…. Hasn't Anna told you? I'm going to Vienna to-day, you know."

She grew burning red. Once more he gazed at her for a long time. It seemed to her as though he knew everything.

"When are you coming back?" he asked drily.

"In two or three days."

She would have liked to say that he was mistaken, that she was not going to see a man whom she loved, that all these things about which he was worrying were sordid and mean, and really of not the slightest importance to women — but she was not clever enough to find the right words to express herself.

"If you come back in two or three days' time you may, perhaps, find my wife still here. So, good-bye! I hope you will enjoy yourself."

She felt that his glance had followed her as she went through the dark, curtained room and across the market square. And now, too, as she sat in the railway carriage, she felt the same glance and still in her ears kept ringing those words, in which there seemed to lie the consciousness of an immense unhappiness, which she had not hitherto understood. The torment of this recollection seemed stronger than the expectation of any joys that might be awaiting her, and the nearer she approached to the great city the heavier she became at heart. As she thought of the lonely evening that lay before her she felt as though she were travelling, without hope, towards some strange, uncertain destination. The letter, which she still carried in her bodice, had lost its enchantment; it was nothing but a piece of crackling paper, filled with writing, the corners of which were beginning to get torn. She tried to imagine what Emil now looked like. Faces bearing a slight resemblance to his arose before her mind's eye; many times she thought that she had surely hit upon the right one, but it vanished immediately. Doubts began to assail her as to whether she had done the right thing in travelling so soon. Why had she not waited, at least, until Monday?

Then she was obliged, however, to confess to herself that she was going to Vienna to keep an appointment with a young man, with whom she had not exchanged a word for ten years, and who, perhaps, was expecting a quite different woman from the one who was travelling to see him on the morrow. Yes, that was the cause of all her uneasiness; she realized it now. The letter which was already beginning to chafe her delicate skin was addressed to Bertha, the girl of twenty; for Emil, of course, could not know what she looked like now. And, although for her own part, she could assure herself that her face still preserved its girlish features and that her figure, though grown fuller, still preserved the contours of youth, might he not see, in spite of all, how many changes a period of ten years had wrought in her, and, perhaps, even destroyed without her having noticed it herself?

The train drew up at Klosterneuburg. Bertha's ears were assailed by the sound of many clear voices and the clatter of hurrying footsteps. She looked out of the window. A number of schoolboys crowded up to the train and, laughing and shouting, got into the carriages. The sight of them caused Bertha to call to mind the days of her childhood, when her brothers used to come back from picnics in the country, and suddenly there came before her eyes a vision of the blue room in which the boys had slept. She seemed to feel a tremor run through her as she realized how all the past was scattered to the wind; how those to whom she owed her existence had died, how those with whom she had lived for years under one roof were forgotten; how friendships which had seemed to have been formed to last for ever had become dissolved. How uncertain, how mortal, everything was!

And he … he had written to her as if in the course of those ten years nothing had changed, as if in the meantime there had not been funerals, births, sorrows, illnesses, cares and — for him, at least — so much good fortune and fame. Involuntarily she shook her head. A kind of perplexity in the face of so much that was incomprehensible came over her. Even the roaring of the train, which was carrying her along to unknown adventures, seemed to her as a chant of remarkable sadness. Her thoughts went back to the time, by no means remote, in fact no more than a few days earlier, when she had been tranquil and contented, and had borne her existence without desire, without regret and without wonder. However had it happened that this change had come over her? She could not understand.

The train seemed to rush forward with ever-increasing speed towards its destination. Already she could see the smoke of the great city rising skywards as out of the depths. Her heart began to throb. She felt as if she was awaited by something vague, something for which she could not find a name, a thing with a hundred arms, ready to embrace her. Each house she passed knew that she was coming; the evening sun, gleaming on the roofs, shone to meet her; and then, as the train rolled into the station, she suddenly felt sheltered. Now for the first time, she realized that she was in Vienna, in her Vienna, the town of her youth and of her dreams, that she was home. Had she not given the slightest thought to that before? She did not come from home — no, now she had arrived home. The din at the station filled her with a feeling of comfort, the bustle of people and carriages gladdened her, everything that was sorrowful had been shed from her.

There she stood at the Franz Josef Station in Vienna, on a warm May evening, Bertha Garlan, young and pretty, free and accountable to no one, and on the morrow she was to see the only man whom she had ever loved — the lover who had called her.

She put up at a little hotel near the station. She had determined to choose one of the less fashionable, partly for the sake of economy, and partly, too, because she stood in awe, to a certain extent, of smart waiters and porters. She was shown to a room on the third floor with a window looking out on the street. The chambermaid closed the window when the visitor entered, and brought some fresh water, the boots placed her box beside the stove, and the waiter placed before her the registration paper, which Bertha filled up immediately and unhesitatingly, with the pride that comes of a clear conscience.

A feeling of freedom as regards external circumstances, such as she had not known for a long time, encompassed her; there were none of the petty domestic cares of the daily round, there was no obligation to talk to relations or acquaintances; she was at liberty that evening to do just as she liked.

When she had changed her dress she opened the window. She had already been obliged to light the candles, but out of doors it was not yet quite dark. She leaned her elbows on the window-sill and looked down. Again she remembered her childhood, when she had often looked down out of the windows in the evenings, sometimes with one of her brothers, who had thrown his arm around her shoulders. She also thought of her parents with so keen an emotion that she was on the verge of tears.

Down below the street lamps were already alight. Well, at all events, she must find something to do. She thought of what might be happening the next day at that hour…. She could not picture it to herself. At that moment, it just happened that a lady and gentleman drove by the hotel in a cab. If things turned out in accordance with her wishes, Emil and she should be going for a drive together into the country the next morning — yes, that would be nicest. Some quiet spot away from the town in a restaurant garden, a candle lamp on the table, and he beside her, hand in hand like a pair of young lovers. And then back again — and then…. No, she would rather not imagine anything further! Where was he now, she wondered. Was he alone? Or was he at that very instant engaged in talking with some one? And with whom — a man? — a woman? — a girl? But, after all, was it any concern of hers? For the present it was certainly not any concern of hers. And to Emil it mattered just as little that Herr Klingemann had proposed to her the previous day, that Richard, her precocious nephew, kissed her sometimes, and that she had a great admiration for Herr Rupius. She would be sure to ask him on the morrow — yes, she must be certain as regards all these points before she … well, before she went with him in the evening into the country.

So then she decided to go out — but where? She stopped, irresolute, at the door. All she could do was to go for a short walk and then have supper … but again, where? A lady alone…. No, she would have supper here in her room at the hotel, and go to bed early so that she might have a good night's rest and look fresh, young and pretty in the morning.

She locked the door and went out into the street. She turned towards the inner town, and proceeded at a very sharp pace, for she did not like walking alone in the evening. Soon she reached the Ring and went past the University, and on to the Town Hall. But she took no pleasure at all in this aimless rambling. She felt bored and hungry, and went back to her hotel in a tramcar. She had no great desire to seek her room. From the street she had already noticed that the dining-room of the hotel was barely lighted and evidently empty. She had supper there, after which she grew tired and sleepy and, with an effort, went up the three flights of stairs to her room. As she sat on the bed and undid her shoe laces, she heard ten o'clock chime in a neighbouring church steeple.

When she awoke in the morning she hurried, first of all, to the window and drew up the blinds with a great longing to see the daylight and the town. It was a sunny morning, and the air was as fresh as if it had come flowing down from a thousand springs in the forests and hills into the streets of the town. The beauty of the morning acted on Bertha as a good omen; she wondered at the strange, foolish manner in which she had spent the previous evening — as if she had not quite correctly understood why she had come to Vienna. The certainty that the repose of a whole night no longer separated her from the longed-for hour filled her with a sense of great gladness. All at once, she could no longer understand how it was that she could have come to Vienna, as she had done just recently, without daring to make even an attempt to see Emil. Finally, too, she wondered how it was that she had, for weeks, months, perhaps years, needlessly deferred availing herself of the opportunity of seeing him. The fact that she had scarcely thought of him during the whole time, did not occur to her at first, but, when at length she did realize it, she was amazed at that, most of all.

At last only four more hours were to be endured, and then she would see him. She lay down on the bed again; she reclined, at first, with her eyes wide open, and she whispered to herself, as though she wanted to intoxicate herself with the words: "Come soon!" She heard Emil himself speak the words, no longer far away, no, but as though he were close by her side. His lips breathed them on hers: "Come soon!" he said, but the words meant: "Be mine! be mine!" She opened her arms as though making ready to press her beloved to her heart. "I love you," she said, and breathed a kiss into the air.

At length she got up and dressed. This time she had brought with her a simple grey costume, cut in the English fashion, which, according to the general opinion of her friends, suited her very well, and she was quite content with herself when she had completed her toilet. She probably did not look like a fashionable lady of Vienna, but, on the other hand, she had not the appearance of a fashionable lady from the country either; it seemed to her that she looked more like a governess in the household of some Count or Prince, than anything else. Indeed, as a matter of fact, there was something of the young, unmarried lady in her aspect; no one would have taken her for a married woman and the mother of a five-year-old boy. She thought, with a slight sigh, that truly she would have done better to have remained unmarried. But, as to that, she was feeling that day very much like a bride.

Nine o'clock! Still two long hours to wait! What could she do in the meantime? She sat down at the table, ordered coffee and sipped it slowly. There was no sense in remaining indoors any longer; it was better to go out into the open air at once.

For a time she walked about the streets of the suburb, and she took a particularly keen pleasure in the wind blowing on her cheeks. She asked herself: What was Fritz doing at that moment? Probably Elly was playing with him. Bertha took the road which led towards the public gardens; she was glad to go for a walk through the avenues, in which, many years ago, she had played as a child. She entered the garden by the gate opposite the Burg-theatre. At that early hour of the day there were but few people in the gardens. Children were playing on the gravel; governesses and nursemaids were sitting on the seats; little girls were running about along the steps of the Temple of Theseus and under its colonnade. Elderly people were walking in the shade of the avenues; young men, who were apparently studying from large writing books, and ladies, who were reading books, had taken their seats in the cool shade of the trees.

Bertha sat on a seat and watched two little girls who were jumping over a piece of string, as she had so often done herself, when a child — it seemed to her, in just the same spot. A gentle breeze blew through the foliage; from afar she heard the calls and laughter of some children playing "catch." The cries came nearer and nearer; and then the children ran trooping past her. She felt a thrill of pleasure when a young man in a long overcoat walked slowly by and turned round to look at her for a second time, when he reached the end of the avenue. Then there passed by a young couple; the girl, who had a roll of music in her hand, was neatly but somewhat strikingly dressed; the man was clean-shaven and was wearing a light summer suit and a tall hat. Bertha thought herself most experienced when she fancied that she was able with certainty to recognize in the girl a student of music, and in her companion a young man who had just gone on the stage. It was very pleasant to be sitting there, to have nothing to do, to be alone, and to have people walking, running and playing like this before her. Yes, it would be nice to live in Vienna and be able to do just as she liked. Well, who could say how everything would turn out, what the next few hours would bring forth, what prospects for her future life that evening would open out before her? What was it then, that really forced her to live in that dreadful little town? After all, in Vienna she would be able to supplement her income by giving music lessons just as easily as at home. Why not, indeed? Moreover, in Vienna, better terms were to be obtained for music lessons…. Ah, what an idea!… if he came to her aid; if he, the famous musician, recommended her? Why, certainly it would only need one word from him. What if she were to speak to him on the subject? And would it not also be a most advantageous arrangement in view of her child? In a few years' time he would have to go to school, and then, of course, the schools were so much better in Vienna than at home. No, it was quite impossible for her to pass all her life in the little town — she would have to move to Vienna, and that, too, at no distant date. Moreover, even if she had to economise here, and — and…. In vain she attempted to restrain the bold thoughts which now came rushing along…. If she should take Emil's fancy, if he should again … if he should still be in love with her … if he should ask her to be his wife? If she could be a bit clever, if she avoided compromising herself in any way, and understood how to fascinate him — she felt rather ashamed of her craftiness. But, after all, was it so bad that she should think of such things, considering that she was really in love with him, and had never loved any other man but him? And did not the whole tone of his letter give her the right to indulge in such thoughts?

And then, when she realised that in a few minutes she was to meet him who was the object of her hopes, everything began to dance before her eyes. She rose to her feet, and nearly reeled. She saw the young couple, who had previously walked past her, leave the gardens by the road leading to the Burgplatz. She went off in the same direction. Yonder, she saw the dome of the Museum, towering and gleaming. She decided to walk slowly, so as not to appear too excited or even breathless when she met him. Once more she was seized with a thrill of fear — suppose he should not come? But whatever happened, she would not leave Vienna this time without seeing him.

Would it not, perhaps, even be better if he did not come, she wondered. She was so bewildered at that moment … and supposing she was to say anything silly or awkward…. So much depended on the next few minutes — perhaps her whole future….

There was the Museum before her. Up the steps, through the entrance, and she was standing in the large, cool vestibule. Before her eyes was the grand staircase and, yonder, where it divided to right and left, was the colossal marble statue of Theseus slaying the Minotaur. Slowly she ascended the stairs and, as she looked round about her, she grew calmer. The magnificence of her surroundings captivated her. She looked up at the galleries which, with their golden railings, ran round the interior of the dome. She came to a stop. Before her was a door, above which appeared in gilt letters: "Dutch School."

Her heart gave a sudden convulsive throb. Before her eyes lay the row of picture galleries. Here and there she saw people standing before the pictures. She entered the first hall, and gazed attentively at the first picture hanging at the very entrance. She thought of Herr Rupius' portfolio. And then she heard a voice say:

"Good morning, Bertha."

VI

IT WAS HIS voice. She turned round. He was standing before her, young, slim, elegant and rather pale. In his smile there was a suggestion of mockery. He nodded to Bertha, took her hand at the same time, and held it for a while in his own. It was Emil himself, and it was exactly as if the last occasion on which they had spoken to one another had been only the previous day.

"Good morning, Emil," she said.

They gazed at each other. His glance was expressive of much: pleasure, amiability, and something in the nature of a scrutiny. She realised all this with perfect clearness, whilst she gazed at him with eyes in which nothing but pure happiness was shining.

"Well, then, how are you getting on, Bertha?" he asked.

"Quite well."

"It is really funny that I should ask you such a question after eight or nine years. Things have probably gone very differently with you."

"Yes, indeed, that's true. You know, of course, that my husband died three years ago."

She felt obliged to assume an expression of sorrow.

"Yes, I know that, and I know, too, that you have a boy. Let me see, who could it have been that told me?"

"I wonder who?"

"Well, it'll come back to me presently. It is new to me, though, that you are interested in pictures."

Bertha smiled.

"Well, it wasn't really on account of the pictures alone. But you mustn't think that I am quite so silly as all that. I do take an interest in pictures."

"And so do I. If the truth must be told, I think I would rather be a painter than anything else."

"Yet you ought to be quite satisfied with what you have attained."

"Well, that's a question that can't be disposed of in one word. Of course, I find it a very pleasant thing to be able to play the violin so well, but what does it all lead to? Only to this, I think: that when I am dead my name will endure for a short time. That—" his eyes indicated the picture before which they were standing—"that, on the other hand, is something different."

"You are awfully ambitious, Emil!"

He looked at her, but without evincing the slightest interest in her.

"Ambitious? Well, it is not such a simple matter as all that. But let's talk about something else. What a strange idea to indulge in a theoretical conversation on the subject of art, when we haven't seen each other for a hundred years! So come, then, Bertha, tell me something about yourself! What do you do with yourself at home? How do you live? And what really put it into your head to congratulate me on getting that silly Order?"

She smiled a second time.

"I wanted to write to you again," she answered; "and, chiefly, I wanted to hear something of you once more; It was really very good of you to answer my letter at once."

"Good? Not at all, my child! I was so pleased when, all of a sudden, your letter came — I recognised your writing at once. You know, you still have the same schoolgirl writing as…. Well, let us say, as in the old days, although I can't bear such expressions."

“But why?” she asked, somewhat astonished.

He looked at her, and then said in a rapid voice:

“Well, tell me, how do you live? You must generally get very bored, I’m sure.”

“I haven’t much time for that,” she replied gravely. “I give lessons, you must know.”

“Oh!”

His tone was one of such disproportionate pity that she felt constrained to add quickly:

“Oh, not because there is really any pressing need for me to do so — although, of course, I find it very useful, because …” she felt that it would be best to be quite frank with him … “I could scarcely live on the slender means that I possess.”

“What is it, then, that you are actually a teacher of?”

“What! Didn’t I tell you that I give piano lessons?”

“Piano lessons? Really? Yes, of course … you used to be very talented. If you hadn’t left the Conservatoire when you did … well, of course, you would not have become one of the great pianistes, you know, but for certain things you had quite a pronounced aptitude. For instance, you used to play Chopin and the little things of Schumann very prettily.”

“You still remember that?”

“After all, I dare say that you have chosen the better course.”

“In what way?”

“Well, if it is impossible to master everything, it is better, no doubt, to get married and have children.”

“I have only one child.”

He laughed.

“Tell me something about him, and all about your own life in general.”

They sat down on the divan in the little saloon on front of the Rembrandts.

“What have I to tell you about myself? There is nothing in it of the slightest interest. Rather, you tell me about yourself” — she looked at him with admiration— “things have gone so splendidly with you, you are such a celebrated man, you see!”

Emil twitched his underlip very slightly, as if discontented.

“Why, yes,” she continued, undaunted; “quite recently I saw your portrait in an illustrated paper.”

“Yes, yes,” he said impatiently.

“But I always knew that you would make a name for yourself,” she added. “Do you still remember how you played the Mendelssohn Concerto at that final examination at the Conservatoire? Everybody said the same thing then.”

“I beg you, my dear girl, don’t, please, let us have any more of these mutual compliments! Tell me, what sort of a man was your late husband?”

“He was a good; indeed, I might say noble, man.”

“Do you know, though, that I met your father about eight days before he died?”

“Did you really?”

“Didn’t you know?”

“I am certain he didn’t tell me anything about it.”

“We stood chatting with one another in the street for a quarter of an hour, perhaps. I had just returned then from my first concert tour.”

“Not a word did he tell me — not a single word!”

She spoke almost angrily, as though her father had, at that time, neglected something that might have shaped her future life differently.

“But why didn’t you come to see us in those days?” she continued. “How did it happen at all that you had already suddenly ceased to visit us some considerable time before my father’s death?”

“Suddenly? — Gradually!”

He looked at her a long time; and now his eyes glided down over her whole body, so that she mechanically drew in her feet under her dress, and pressed her arms against her body, as though to defend herself.

“Well, how did it happen that you came to get married?”

She related the whole story. Emil listened to her, apparently with attention, but as she spoke on and remained seated, he rose to his feet and gazed out through the window…. When she had finished with a remark about the good-nature of her relations, he said:

“Don’t you think that we ought to look at a few pictures now that we are here in the Museum?”

They walked slowly through the galleries, stopping here and there before a picture.

“Lovely! Exquisite!” commented Bertha many a time, but Emil only nodded.

It seemed to Bertha that he had quite forgotten that he was with her. She felt slightly jealous at the interest which the paintings roused in him. Suddenly they found themselves before one of the pictures which she knew from Herr Rupius’ portfolio. Emil wanted to pass on, but she stopped and greeted it, as she might an old acquaintance.

“Exquisite!” she exclaimed. “Emil, isn’t it beautiful? On the whole, I greatly admire Falckenborg’s pictures.”

He looked at her, somewhat surprised.

She became embarrassed, and tried to go on talking.

“Because such an immense quantity — because the whole world—”

She felt that this was dishonest, even that she was robbing some one who could not defend himself; and accordingly she added, repentantly, as it were:

“You must know, there’s a man living in our little town who has an album, or rather a portfolio, of engravings, and that’s how I know the picture. His name is Rupius, he is very infirm; just fancy, he is quite paralysed.”

She felt obliged to tell Emil all this, for it seemed to her as though his eyes were unceasingly questioning her.

“That might be a chapter, too,” he said, with a smile, when she had come to an end; then he added more softly, as though ashamed of his indelicate joke: “There must certainly also be gentlemen in that little town who are not paralysed.”

She felt that she had to take poor Herr Rupius under her protection.

“He is a very unhappy man,” she said, and, remembering how she had sat with him on the balcony the previous day, a feeling of great compassion seized her.

But Emil was following his own train of thought.

“Yes,” he said; “that is what I should really like to know — what experiences you have had.”

“You know them, already.”

“I mean, since the death of your husband.”

She understood now what he meant, and was a little offended.

“I live only for my boy,” she said, with decision. “I do not allow men to make love to me. I am quite respectable.”

He had to laugh it the comically serious way in which she made this confession of virtue. For her part, she felt at once that she ought to have expressed herself differently, and so she laughed, too.

“How long are you going to stay, then, in Vienna?” asked Emil.

“Till to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow.”

“So short a time as that? And where are you staying? I should like to know.”

“With my cousin,” she replied.

Something restrained her from mentioning that she had put up at an hotel. But immediately she was angry with herself for having told such a stupid lie, and she was about to correct herself. Emil, however, broke in quickly:

“Perhaps you will have a little time to spare for me, too? I hope so, at least.”

“Oh, yes!”

“So, then, we can arrange something now if you like” — he glanced at the clock— “Ah!”

“Must you go?” she asked.

“Yes, by twelve o’clock I ought really to….”

She was seized with an intense uneasiness at the prospect of having to be alone again so soon, and she said:

“I have plenty of time — as much as you like. But, of course, it must not be too late.”

“Is your cousin so strict then?”

“But—” she said, “this time, as a matter of fact, I’m not staying with her, you see.”

He looked at her in astonishment.

She grew red.

“Usually I do stay with her…. I mean, sometimes…. She has such a large family, you know.”

“So you are staying at an hotel,” he said, rather impatiently. “Well, there, of course, you are accountable to no one, and we can spend the evening together quite comfortably.”

“I shall be delighted. But I should like not to be too late … even in an hotel I should like not to be too late….”

“Of course not. We will just have supper, and you can be in bed long before ten o’clock.”

They paced slowly down the grand staircase.

“So, if you are agreeable,” said Emil, “we will meet at seven o’clock.”

She was on the point of replying: “So late as that?” — but, remembering her resolution not to compromise herself, she refrained and answered instead:

“Very well, at seven.”

“Seven o’clock at … where?… Out of doors, shall we say? In that case we could go wherever we fancied, life would lie before us, so to speak … yes.”

He seemed to her just then remarkably absent-minded. They went through the entrance hall, and at the exit they stopped for a moment.

“At seven o’clock, then — by the Elizabeth Bridge.”

“Very well; seven o’clock at the Elizabeth Bridge.”

Before them lay the square, with the Maria Theresa memorial, in the brilliant glare of the noonday sun. It was a warm day, but a very high wind had arisen. It seemed to Bertha that Emil was looking at her with a scrutinising glance. At the same time, he appeared to her cold and strange, a very different man from what he had been when standing before the pictures in the Museum.

"Now we will say good-bye for the present," he said, after a time.

It made her feel somewhat unhappy to think that he was going to leave her.

"Won't you … or can't I come with you a little way?" she said.

"Well, no," he answered. "Besides, it is blowing such a gale. There's not much enjoyment to be had in walking side by side and having to hold your hat all the time, for fear it should blow away. Generally, it is difficult to converse if you are walking with a person in the street, and then, too, I have to be in such a hurry…. But perhaps I can see you to a carriage?"

"No, no, I shall walk."

"Yes, you can do that. Well, good-bye till we meet again this evening."

He stretched out his hand to her, and walked quickly away across the square. She gazed after him for a long time. He had taken off his hat and held it in his hand, and the wind was ruffling his hair. He went across the Ring, then through the Town Gate, and disappeared from Bertha's view.

Mechanically, and very slowly, she had followed him. Why had he suddenly grown so cold? Why had he taken his departure so quickly? Why didn't he want her to accompany him? Was he ashamed of her? She looked down at herself, wondering whether she was not dressed, after all, in a countrified and ridiculous manner. Oh, no, it could not be that! Moreover, she had been able to remark from the way in which people gazed at her that she was not looking ludicrous, but, on the contrary, decidedly pretty. Why, then, this sudden departure? She called to mind the period of their previous acquaintance, and it seemed to her that she could remember his having this strange manner even then. He would break off a conversation quite unexpectedly, whilst he suddenly became as though his thoughts had been carried away, and his whole being expressed an impatience which he could not master.

Yes, she was certain that he had been like that in those days also, though, perhaps, less strikingly so than now. She remembered, as well, that she had sometimes make jokes on the subject of his capriciousness, and had laid the responsibility at the door of his artistic temperament. Since then he had become a greater artist, and certainly more absent and irresponsible than ever.

The chimes of noon rang out from many a spire, the wind grew higher and higher, dust flew into her eyes. She had a whole eternity before her, with which she did not know what to do. Why wouldn't he see her, then, until seven o'clock? Unconsciously, she had reckoned on his spending the whole day with her. What was it that he had to do? Had he, perhaps, to make his preparations for the concert? And she pictured him to herself, violin in hand, by a cabinet, or leaning on a piano, just as, many years ago, he had played before the company at her home. Yes, that would be nice if she could only be with him now, sitting in his room, on a sofa, while he played, or even accompanying him on the piano. Would she, then, have gone with him if he had asked her? Why hadn't he asked her? No, of course, he could not have done so within an hour of seeing her again…. But in the evening — wouldn't he ask her that evening? And would she go with him? And, if she went, would she be able to deny him anything else that he might ask her? Indeed, he had a way of expressing everything so innocently. How easily he had managed to make those ten years seem as nothing! Had he not spoken to her as if they had seen each other daily all that time? "Good morning, Bertha. How are you, then?" — just as he might have asked if, on the previous evening, he had wished her "Good night!" and said "Good-bye till we meet again!" What a number of experiences he must have had since then! And who could tell who might be sitting on the sofa in his room that afternoon, while he leaned against the piano and played the violin? Ah, no, she would not think of it. If she followed up such thoughts to the end, would she not simply have to go home again?

She walked past the railings of the public gardens, and could see the avenue where, an hour ago, she had sat, and through which clouds of dust were now sweeping. So, then, that for which she had so deeply yearned was over — she had seen Emil again. Had it been so lovely as she expected? Had she felt any particular emotion when walking by his side, his arm touching hers? No! Had his departure put her out of humour? Perhaps. Would she be able to go home again without seeing him once more? Good heavens, no! And a sensation almost of terror thrilled through her at the thought. Had not, then, her life during the past few days been, as it were, obsessed by him? And all the years that lay behind her, had they been meant for anything else, at all, than to lead her back to him at the right moment? Ah, if she only had a little more experience, if she were a little more worldly-wise! She would have liked to possess the capability of marking out for herself a definite course.

She asked herself which would be the wiser — to be reserved or yielding? She would gladly have known what she was to do that evening, what she ought to do in order to win his heart with greater certainty. She felt that any move on her part, one way or the other, might have the effect of gaining him, or, just as well, of losing him. But she also realised that all her meditation was of no avail, and that she would do just as he wished.

She was in front of the Votive Church, a spot where many streets intersected. The wind there was so violent as to be altogether intolerable. It was time to dine. But she decided that she would not go back to the little hotel that day. She turned towards the inner town. It suddenly occurred to her that she might meet her cousin, but that was a matter of supreme indifference to her. Or, supposing that her brother-in-law had followed her to Vienna? But that thought did not worry her either in the least. She had a feeling, such as she had never experienced before, that she had the right to dispose of her person and her time just as she pleased. She strolled leisurely along the streets, and amused herself by looking at the shop windows. On the Stephansplatz the idea came to her to go into the church for a while. In the dim, cool, and immense building a profound sensation of comfort came over her. She had never been of a religious disposition, but she could never enter a place of worship without experiencing a devotional feeling and, without clothing her prayers in definite form, she had yet always thought to find a way to send up her wishes to Heaven. At first she wandered round the church in the manner of a stranger visiting a beautiful edifice, then she sat down in a pew before a small altar in a side chapel.

She called to mind the day on which she had been married, and she had a vision of her late husband and herself standing side by side before the priest — but the event seemed to be so infinitely far away in the past, and it affected her spirit as little as if her thoughts were occupied by strangers. But suddenly, as a picture changed in a magic lantern, she seemed to see Emil, instead of her husband, standing by her side, and the picture appeared to stand out so completely, without any co-operation on the part of her will, that she almost had to regard as a premonition, even as a prediction from Heaven itself. Mechanically, she folded her hands and said softly: “So be it.” And, as though her will acquired thereby a further access of strength, she remained sitting in a pew a while longer and sought to hold the picture fast.

After a few minutes she went out again into the street, where the broad daylight and the din of the traffic affected her as something new, something which she had not experienced for a long time, as though she had spent whole hours in the church. She felt tranquil, and hopes seemed to hover about her.

She dined in the restaurant of a fashionable hotel in the Kaernthernstrasse…. She was not in the least embarrassed, and thought it very childish that she had not preferred to put up at a first-class hotel. On reaching her room again, she undressed and, such was the state of languor into which she had fallen as the result of the unusually rich meal and the wine she had taken, that she had to stretch herself out on the sofa and fall asleep. It was five o'clock before she awoke. She had no great desire to get up. Usually at that time … what would she probably have been doing at that moment if she had not come to Vienna? If he had not answered her letter — if she had not written to him? If he had not received that Order? If she had never seen his portrait in the illustrated paper? If nothing had called his existence back into her memory? If he had become an insignificant, unknown fiddler in some suburban orchestra? What strange thoughts were these! Did she, then, love him merely because he was celebrated? What did it all mean? Did she, indeed, take any interest in his violin playing? … Wouldn't he be dearer to her if he was not famous and admired? Certainly in that case she would have felt herself much nearer to him, much more allied to him; in that case, she would not have had this feeling of uncertainty about him, and also he would have been different in his manner towards her. As it was, of course, he was, indeed, very charming, and yet … she realized it now … something had come between them that day and had sundered them. Yes, and that was nothing else than the fact that he was a man whom the whole world knew, and she was nothing but a stupid little woman from the country. Suddenly she pictured him to herself as he had stood in the Rembrandt gallery at the Museum, and had looked out of the window while she had been telling him the story of her life in the little town; she remembered how he had scarcely bidden her good-bye, and how he had gone away from her, indeed, absolutely fled away from her. But, then, had she herself felt any emotion such as a woman would feel in the presence of the man she loved? Had she been happy when he had been speaking to her? Had she longed to kiss him when he was standing beside her?… Not at all. And now — was she pleased at the prospect of the evening she was going to spend with him? Was she pleased at the idea of seeing him again in a couple of hours? If she had the power, simply by expressing the wish, to transport herself just where she pleased, would she not, perhaps, at that, moment, rather be at home, with her boy, walking between the vine-trellises, without fear, without agitation, and with a clear conscience; as a good mother and a respectable woman, instead of lying in that uncomfortable room in the hotel, on a miserable sofa, restlessly, yet without longing, awaiting the next hours? She thought of the time, still so near, when all her concern was for nothing save her boy, the household, and her lessons — had she not been contented, almost happy?…

She looked round her. The bare room with the ugly blue and white painted walls, the specks of dust and dirt on the ceiling, the cabinet with its half-open door, all seemed most repulsive to her. No, that was no place for her. Then she thought with displeasure, too, of the dinner in the fashionable hotel, and also of her strolling about in the town, her weariness, the wind and the dust. It seemed to her that she had been wandering about like a tramp. Then another thought came to her: what if something had happened at home! — Fritz might have caught the fever; they would telegraph to her cousin at Vienna, or they might even come to look for her, and they would not be able to find her, and all would know that she had lied like any disreputable person whose purpose it suits to do so…. It was terrible! How could she face them at home, her sister-in-law, her brother-in-law, Elly, her grown-up nephew Richard … the whole town, which, of course, would hear the news at once…. Herr Rupius! No, in good truth, she was not intended for such things! How childishly and clumsily, after all, she had set about it, so that only the slightest accident was needed to betray her. Had she, then, failed to give the least thought to all these things? Had she only been obsessed with the idea of seeing Emil once more, and for that had hazarded everything … her good name, even her whole future! For who could say whether the family would not renounce her, and she would lose her music lessons, if the truth came out?… The truth…. But what could come out? What had happened, then? What had she to reproach herself with? And with the comforting feeling of a clear conscience she was able boldly to answer: "Nothing." And, of course, there was still time…. She could leave Vienna directly by the seven o'clock train, be back by ten in her own home, in her own cosy room, with her beloved boy…. Yes, she could; to be sure, Fritz was not at home … but she could have him brought back…. No, she would not do it, she would not return at once … there was no occasion to do so — to-morrow morning would be quite time enough. She would say good-bye to Emil that very evening…. Yes, she would inform him at once that she was returning home early next morning, and that her only reason in coming had been to press his hand once more. Yes, that would be best.

Oh, he could, of course, accompany her to the hotel; and, goodness knows, he could even have supper with her in the garden restaurant … and she would go away as she had come…. Besides, she would see from his behaviour what he really felt towards her; she would be very reserved, even cold; it would be quite easy for her to act in that way, because she felt completely at her ease. It seemed to her as if all her desires had fallen into slumber again, and she had a feeling akin to a determination to remain respectable. As a young girl she had withstood temptation, she had been faithful to her husband; her whole widowhood had hitherto passed without attack…. Well, the long and the short of it was: if he wished to make her his wife she would be very glad, but she would reject any bolder proposal with the same austerity as … as … twelve years before, when he had showed her his window behind St. Paul's Church.

She stood up, stretched herself, held up her hands, and went to the window. The sky had become overcast, clouds were moving down from the mountains, but the storm had subsided.

She got ready to go out.

VII

BERTHA HAD HARDLY proceeded a few steps from the hotel when it began to rain. Under her open umbrella she seemed to herself to be protected against unwelcome attentions from people she might meet. A pleasant fragrance was diffused throughout the air, as if the rain brought with it the aroma of the neighbouring woods, shedding it over the town. Bertha gave herself up wholly to the pleasure of the walk; even the object of her outing appeared before her mind's eye only vaguely, as if seen through a mist. She had at last grown so weary as the result of the profusion of her changing feelings that she no longer felt anything at all. She was without fear, without hope, without purpose. She walked on past the gardens, across the Ring, and rejoiced in the humid fragrance of the elder-trees. In the forenoon it had completely escaped her notice that everything was beautiful in an array of violet blossoms. An idea brought a smile to her lips: she went into a flower shop and bought a little bunch of violets. As she raised the flowers to her lips, a great tenderness came over her; she thought of the train going homewards at seven o'clock, and she rejoiced, as if she had outwitted some one.

She walked slowly across the bridge, diagonally, and remembered how she had crossed it a few days ago in order to reach the neighbourhood of her former home, and to see Emil's window again. The throng of traffic at the bridge was immense; two streams, one coming from the suburb into the town, the other going in the opposite direction, poured by in confusion; carriages of all kinds rolled past; the air resounded with the jingling of bells, with whistling and with the shouts of drivers. Bertha tried to stand still, but was pushed forward.

Suddenly she heard a whistle quite close by. A carriage pulled up, a head leaned out of the window … it was Emil. He made a sign to her to come over to him. A few people immediately became attentive, and seemed very anxious to hear what the young man had to say to the lady who had gone up to his carriage.

"Will you get in?" Emil asked in a low voice.

"Get in…?"

"Why, yes, it is raining, you see!"

"Really, I would rather walk, if you don't mind."

"Just as you like," said Emil.

He got out quickly and paid the driver. Bertha observed, with some alarm, that about half a dozen people, who were crowding round her, were very anxious to see how this remarkable affair would turn out.

"Come," said Emil.

They quickly crossed the road, and thereby got away from the whole throng. They then walked slowly along a less frequented street by the bank of the Wien.

"Why, Emil, you haven't brought your umbrella with you!"

"Won't you take me under yours? Wait a moment, it won't do like this."

He took the umbrella out of her hand, held it over both of them, and thrust his arm under hers. Now she felt that it was his arm, and rejoiced greatly.

"The country, unfortunately, is out of the question," he said.

"What a pity."

"Well, what have you been doing with yourself all day long?"

She told him about the fashionable restaurant, in which she had had her dinner.

"Now, why on earth didn't I know about that? I thought you were dining with your cousin. We might, of course, have had such a pleasant lunch together!"

"You have had so much to do, I dare say," she said, a little proud at being able to infuse a slight tone of sarcasm into her voice.

"Yes, that's true, in the afternoon, of course. I had to listen to half an opera."

"Oh? How was that, then?"

"There was a young composer with me — a very talented fellow, in his own way."

She was very glad to hear that. So that, then, was the way in which he spent his afternoons.

He stood still and, without letting go her arm, looked into her face.

"Do you know that you have really grown much prettier? Yes, I am quite serious about it! But, tell me, first of all, tell me candidly, how the idea came to you to write to me."

"Why, I have already told you."

"Have you thought of me, then, all this time?"

"A great deal."

"When you were married, too?"

"Certainly, I have always thought of you. And you?"

"Often, very often."

"But …"

"Well, what?"

"You are a man, you see!"

"Yes — but what do you mean by that?"

"I mean that certainly you must have loved many women."

"Loved … loved … yes, I suppose I have."

"But I," she broke out with animation, as though the truth was too strong to be restrained within her; "I have loved no one but you."

He took her hand and raised it to his lips.

"I think we might rather leave that undecided, though," he said.

"Look, I have brought some violets with me for you."

He smiled.

"Are they to prove that you have told me the truth? Anybody would think, from the way in which you said that, that you have done nothing else since we last met but pluck, or, at least, buy, violets for me. However, many thanks! But tell me, why didn't you want to get into the carriage?"

"Oh, but you know, a walk is so nice."

"But we can't walk forever…. We are having supper together, though?"

"Yes, I shall be delighted — for instance, here in an hotel," she added hastily.

At that time they were walking through quieter streets, and it was growing dusk.

Emil laughed.

"Oh, no, we will arrange things a little more cosily than that."

Bertha cast her eyes down.

"However, we mustn't sit at the same table as strangers," she said.

"Certainly not. We will even go somewhere where there is nobody else at all."

"What are you thinking of?" she asked. "I don't do that sort of thing!"

"Just as you please," he answered, shrugging his shoulders. "Have you an appetite yet?"

"No, not at all."

They were both silent for a time.

"Shall I not make the acquaintance of your boy some day?" he asked.

"Certainly," she replied, greatly pleased; "whenever you wish."

She began to tell him about Fritz, and then went on to speak about her family. Emil threw in a question at times, and soon he knew all that happened in the little town, even down to the efforts of Klingemann, of which Bertha gave him an account, laughingly, but with a certain satisfaction.

The street lamps were alight; the rays glittered on the damp pavements.

"My dear girl, we can't stroll about the streets all night, you know," said Emil suddenly.

"No … but I cannot come with you … into a restaurant…. Just think, if I should happen to meet my cousin or anyone else!"

"Make your mind easy, no one will see us."

Quickly he passed through a gateway and closed the umbrella.

"What are you going to do, then?"

She saw a large garden before her. Near the walls, from which canvas shelters were stretched, people were sitting at tables, laid for supper.

"There, do you mean?"

"No. Just come with me."

Immediately on the right of the gate was a small door, which had been left ajar.

"Come in here."

They found themselves in a narrow, lighted passage, on both sides of which were rows of doors. A waiter bowed and went in front of them, past all the doors. The last one he opened, allowed the guests to enter, and closed it again after them.

In the centre of the little room stood a small table laid for three; by the wall was a blue velvet sofa, and opposite that hung a gilt framed oval mirror, before which Bertha took her hat off and, as she did so, she noticed that the names "Irma" and "Rudi" had been scratched on the glass. At the same time, she saw in the mirror Emil coming up behind her. He placed his hands on her cheeks, bent her head back towards himself, and kissed her on the lips. Then he turned away without speaking, and rang the bell.

A very young waiter came in at once, as if he had been standing outside the door. When he had taken his order he left them, and Emil sat down. "Well, Bertha!"

She turned towards him. He took her gently by the hand and still continued to hold it in his, when Bertha had taken a seat beside him on the sofa. Mechanically she touched her hair with her other hand.

An older waiter came in, and Emil made his choice from the menu. Bertha agreed to everything. When the waiter had departed, Emil said:

"Mustn't the question be asked: How is it that all this hasn't happened before to-day?"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why didn't you write to me long ago?"

"Well, I would … if you had got your Order sooner!"

He held her hand and kissed it.

"But you come to Vienna fairly often!"

"Oh, no."

He looked up.

"But you said something like that in your letter!"

She remembered then, and grew red.

"Well, yes … often … Monday was the last time I was here."

The waiter brought sardines and caviar, and left the room.

"Well," said Emil; "it is probably just the right time."

"In what way?"

"That we should have met again."

"Oh, I have often longed for you."

He seemed to be deep in thought.

"And perhaps it is also just as well that things then turned out as they did," he said. "It is on that very account that the recollection is so charming."

"Yes, charming."

They were both silent for a time.

"Do you remember …" she said, and then she began to talk of the old days, of their walks in the town-park, and of her first day at the Conservatoire.

He nodded in answer to everything she said, held his arm on the back of the sofa, and lightly touched the lock of hair, which curled over the nape of her neck. At times he threw in a word. Then Emil himself recalled something which she had forgotten; he had remembered a further outing: a trip to the Prater one Sunday morning.

"And do you still recollect," said Bertha, "how we …" she hesitated to utter it— "once were almost in love with each other?"

"Yes," he said. "And who knows …"

He was perhaps about to say: "It would have been better for me if I had married you" — but he did not finish the sentence.

He ordered champagne.

"It is not so long ago," said Bertha, "since I tasted champagne. The last time was about six months ago, at the party which my brother-in-law gave on the occasion of his fiftieth birthday."

She thought of the company at her brother-in-law's, and it was amazing how remote from the present time it all seemed — the entire little town and all who lived there.

The young waiter brought an ice-tub with the wine. At that moment it occurred to Bertha that Emil had certainly been there before, many a time, with other women. That, however, was a matter of tolerable indifference to her.

They clinked glasses and drank. Emil embraced Bertha and kissed her. That kiss reminded her of something … what could it have been, though?… Of the kisses she had received when a young girl?… Of the kiss of her husband?… No…. Then it suddenly occurred to her that it was exactly like the kisses which her young nephew Richard had lately given to her.

The waiter came in with fruit and pastry. Emil put some dates and a bunch of grapes on a plate for Bertha.

"Why don't you say something?" she asked. "Why do you leave me to do all the talking? And you know you could tell me so much!"

"I?…"

He slowly sipped the wine.

"Why, yes, about your tours."

"Good Heavens, one town is just like all the others. You must not, of course, lose sight of the fact that I only rarely travel for my own pleasure."

"Quite so, of course."

During the whole time she had not given a thought to the fact that it was Emil Lindbach, the celebrated violin virtuoso, with whom she was sitting there; and she felt bound to say:

"By the way, you are playing in Vienna soon. I should be very glad to hear you."

"Not a soul will hinder you from doing so," he replied drily.

It passed through her mind that it would really be very much nicer for her to hear him play, not at the concert, but for herself alone. She had almost said so, but then it occurred to her that that would have meant nothing else than: "I will come with you" — and, who could say, perhaps very soon she would go with him. It would be as easy for her as ever, if she had had some wine…. Yet, not so, the wine was affecting her differently from usual — it was not the soft inebriation which made her feel a little more cheerful; it was better, lovelier. It was not the few drops of wine that made it so; it was the touch of his dear hand, as he stroked her brow and hair. He had sat down beside her and he drew her head onto his shoulder. How gladly would she have fallen asleep like that…. Yes, indeed, nothing else did she desire…. Then she heard him whisper: "Darling."… She trembled softly.

Why was this the first time? Could she not have had all this before? Was there a grain of sense in living as she did?… After all, there was nothing wicked in what she was doing now…. And how sweet it was to feel the breath of a young man upon her eyelids!… No, not — not the breath of a young man… of a lover….

She had shut her eyes. She made not the slightest effort to open them again, she had not the least desire to know where she was, or with whom she was…. Who was it, after all?… Richard?… No…. Was she falling asleep, then?… She was there with Emil…. With whom?… But who was this Emil?… How hard it was to be clear as to who it was!… The breath upon her eyelids was the breath of the man she had loved when a girl … and, at the same time, that of the celebrated artist who was soon to give a concert … and, at the same time, of a man whom she had not seen for thousands and thousands of days … and, at the same time, of a gentleman with whom she was sitting alone in a restaurant, and who, at that moment, could do with her just as he pleased…. She felt his kiss upon her eyes…. How tender he was … and how handsome…. But what did he really look like, then?… She had only to open her eyes to be able to see him quite plainly…. But she preferred to imagine what he was like, without actually seeing him…. No, how funny — why, that was not in the least like his face!… Of course, it was the face of the young waiter, who had left the room a minute or two before…. But what did Emil look like, after all?… Like this?… No, no, of course, that was Richard's face…. But away … away…. Was she then so low as to think of nothing but other men while she … was with him?… If she could only open her eyes!… Ah!

She shook herself violently, so that she almost pushed Emil away — and then she tore her eyes wide open.

Emil gazed at her, smiling.

"Do you love me?" he asked.

She drew him towards her and kissed him of her own accord…. It was the first time that day that she had given him a kiss of her own accord, and in doing so she felt that she was not acting in accordance with her resolve of the morning…. She tried to think what that resolve had been…. To compromise herself in no way; to deny herself…. Yes, there had certainly been a time when that had been her wish, but why? She was in love with him, really and truly; and the moment had arrived which she had been awaiting for days…. No, for years!

Still their lips remained pressed together…. Ah, she longed to feel his arms about her … to be his, body and soul. She would not let him talk any more … he would have to take her unto himself…. He would have to realize that no other woman could love him so well as she did….

Emil rose to his feet and paced up and down the little room a few times.
Bertha raised her glass of champagne to her lips again.

"No more, Bertha," said Emil, in a low tone.

Yes, he was right, she thought. What was she really doing? Was she going to make herself drunk, then? Was there any need for that? After all, she was accountable to no one, she was free, she was young; she was determined to taste of happiness at last.

"Ought we not to be thinking of going?" said Emil.

Bertha nodded. He helped her to put on her jacket. She stood before the mirror and stuck the pin through her hat. They went. The young waiter was standing before the door; he bowed. A carriage was standing before the gate; Bertha got in; she did not hear what instructions Emil gave the driver. Emil took his seat by her side. Both were silent; they sat pressing closely against each other. The carriage rolled on, a long, long way. Wherever could it be, then, that Emil lived? But, perhaps, he had purposely told the driver to take a circuitous route, knowing, no doubt, how pleasant it was to drive together through the night like this.

The carriage pulled up. Emil got out.

"Give me your umbrella," he said.

She handed it out to him and he opened it. Then she got out and they both stood under the shelter of the umbrella, on which the rain was rattling down. Was this the street in which he lived? The door opened; they entered the hall; Emil took a candle which the porter handed to him. Before them was a fine broad staircase. When they reached the first floor Emil opened a door. They passed through an ante-chamber into a drawing-room. With the candle which he held in his hand Emil lighted two others upon the table; then he went up to Bertha, who was still standing in the doorway, as though waiting, and led her further into the room. He took the pin out of her hat, and placed the hat upon the table. In the uncertain light of the two feebly-burning candles, Bertha could only see that a few coloured pictures were hanging on the wall — portraits of the Emperor and Empress, so it appeared to her — that, on one side, was a broad divan covered with a Persian rug and that, near the window, there was an upright piano with a number of framed photographs on the lid. Over the piano a picture was hanging, but Bertha was unable to make it out. Yonder, she saw a pair of red curtains hanging down beside a door, which was standing half open and through the broad folds something white and gleaming could be seen within.

She could no longer restrain the question:

"Do you live here?"

"As you see."

She looked straight before her. On the table stood a couple of little glasses, a decanter containing liqueur and a small epergne, loaded with fruit and pastry.

"Is this your study?" asked Bertha.

Mechanically her eyes sought for a desk such as violin players use. Emil put his arm round her waist and led her to the piano. He sat down on the piano stool and drew her on to his knees.

"I may as well confess to you at once," he said to her, simply and almost drily, "that really I do not live here. It was only for our own sake … that I have … for a short while … I deemed it prudent … Vienna, you know, is a small town, and I didn't want to take you into my house at night-time."

She understood, but was not altogether satisfied. She looked up. She was now able to see the outlines of the picture which was hanging above the piano…. It was a naked female figure. Bertha had a curious desire to examine the picture, close at hand.

“What is that?” she asked.

“It is not a work of art,” said Emil.

He struck a match and held it up, so as to throw the light on the picture. Bertha saw that it was merely a wretched daub, but at the same time she felt that the painted woman, with the bold laughing eyes, was looking down at her, and she was glad when the match went out.

“You might just play something to me upon the piano,” said Emil.

She wondered at the coldness of his demeanour. Didn’t he realize that she was with him?… But, on the other hand, did she herself feel any special emotion?… No…. A strange sadness seemed to come welling forth from every corner of the room…. Why hadn’t he rather taken her to his own house?… What sort of a house was this, she wondered…. She regretted now that she had not drunk more wine…. She wished that she was not so sober….

“Well, won’t you play something to me?” said Emil. “Just think how long it is since I have heard you.”

She sat down and struck a chord.

“Indeed, I have forgotten everything.”

“Oh, do try!”

She played very softly Schumann’s Albumblatt, and she remembered how, a few days before, late in the evening, she had improvised as she was sitting at home, and Klingemann had walked up and down in front of the window. She could not help thinking also of the report that he had a scandalous picture in his room. And involuntarily, she glanced up again at the picture of the naked woman over the piano, but now the figure seemed to be gazing into space.

Emil had brought a chair beside Bertha’s. He drew her towards him and kissed her while her fingers first continued to play, and at length rested quietly upon the keys. Bertha heard the rain beating against the window-panes and a sensation as of being at home came over her.

Then she felt as though Emil was lifting her up and carrying her. Without letting her out of his arms he had stood up and was slowly bearing her out of the room. She felt her right arm graze against the curtain…. She kept her eyes closed; she could feel Emil’s cool breath upon her hair….

VIII

WHEN THEY WENT out into the street the rain had left off, but the air was permeated with a wondrous mildness and humidity. Most of the street lamps had already been extinguished; the one at the street corner was the nearest that was alight; and, as the sky was still overcast with clouds, deep darkness hung over the city. Emil had offered Bertha his arm; they walked in silence. From a church tower a clock struck — one. Bertha was surprised. She had believed that it must be nearly morning, but now she was glad at heart to wander mutely through the night in the still, soft air, leaning on his arm — because she loved him very much.

They entered an open square; before them lay the Church of St. Charles.

Emil hailed a driver who had fallen asleep, sitting on the footboard of his open carriage.

"It is such a fine night," said Emil; "we can still indulge in a short drive before I take you to your hotel — shall we?"

The carriage started off. Emil had taken off his hat; she laid it in her lap, an action which also afforded her pleasure. She took a sidelong glance at Emil; his eyes seemed to be looking into the distance.

"What are you thinking of?"

"I … To tell the truth, Bertha, I was thinking of a melody out of the opera, which that man I was telling you about played to me this afternoon. But I can't get it quite right."

"You are thinking of melodies now …" said Bertha, smiling, but with a slight-tone of reproach in her voice.

Again there was silence. The carriage drove slowly along the deserted Ringstrasse, past the Opera House, the Museum and the public gardens.

"Emil?"

"What do you want, my darling?"

"When shall I at last have an opportunity of hearing you play again?"

"I am playing at a concert to-day, as a matter of fact," he said, as if it were a joke.

"No, Emil, that was not what I meant — I want you to play to me alone. You will do that just once … won't you? Please!"

"Yes, yes."

"It would mean so much to me. I should like you to know that there was no one in the room except myself listening to you."

"Quite so. But never mind that now, though."

He spoke in such a decided tone of voice that it seemed as if he was defending something from her. She could not understand for what reason her request could have been distasteful to him, and she continued:

"So then it is settled: to-morrow at five o'clock in the evening at your house?"

"Yes, I am curious to see whether you will like it there."

"Oh, of course I shall. Surely it will be much nicer being at your house than at that place where we have been this evening. And shall we spend the evening together? Do you know, I am just thinking whether I ought not to see my cousin…."

"But, my dearest one, please, don't let us map out a definite programme."

In saying this he put his arm round her neck, as if he wanted to make her feel the tenderness which was absent from the tone of his voice.

"Emil!"

"Well?"

"To-morrow we will play the Kreatzer Sonata together — the Andante at least."

"But, my dear child, we've talked enough about music; do let us drop the subject. I am quite prepared to believe that you are immensely interested in it."

Again he spoke in that vague way, from which she could not tell whether he really meant what he said or had spoken ironically. She did not, however, venture to ask. At the same time her yearning at that moment to hear him play the violin was so keen that it was almost painful.

"Ah, here we are near your hotel, I see!" exclaimed Emil; and, as if he had completely forgotten his wish to go for a drive with her before leaving her at her door, he called out the name of the hotel to the driver.

"Emil—"

"Well, dearest?"

"Do you still love me?"

Instead of answering he pressed her close to him and kissed her on the lips.

"Tell me, Emil—"

"Tell you what?"

"But I know you don't like anybody to ask much of you."

"Never mind, my child, ask anything you like."

"What will you…. Tell me, what are you accustomed to do with your forenoons?"

"Oh, I spend them in all sorts of ways. To-morrow, for instance, I am playing the violin solo in Haydn's Mass in the Lerchenfeld Church."

"Really? Then, of course, I won't have to wait any longer than to-morrow morning before I can hear you."

"If you want to. But it is really not worth the trouble…. That is to say, the Mass itself, of course, is very beautiful."

"However does it happen that you are going to play in the Lerchenfeld Church?"

"It is … an act of kindness on my part."

"For whom?"

"For whom … well, for Haydn, of course."

A thrill of pain seemed to seize Bertha. At that moment she felt that there must be some special connexion between it and his taking part in the Mass at the Lerchenfeld Church. Perhaps some woman was singing in the Mass, who…. Ah, what did she know, after all?… But she would go to the church, yes, she must go … she could let no other woman have Emil! He belonged to her, to her alone … he had told her so, indeed…. And she would find a way to hold him fast… She had, she told herself, such infinite tenderness for him … she had reserved all her love for him alone…. She would completely envelop him in it … no more would he yearn for any other woman…. She would move to Vienna, be with him each day, be with him for ever.

"Emil—"

"Well, what is the matter with you, darling?"

He turned towards her and looked at her rather uneasily.

"Do you love me? Good Heavens, here we are already!"

"Really?" said Emil, with surprise.

"Yes — there, do you see? — that's where I am staying. So tell me, please, Emil, tell me once more—"

"Yes, to-morrow at five o'clock, my darling. I am very glad."

"No, not that…. Tell me, do you—" The carriage stopped. Emil waited by Bertha's side until the porter came out and opened the door, then he kissed her hand with the most ceremonious politeness, and said:

"Good-bye till we meet again, dear lady."

He drove away.

Bertha's sleep that night was sound and heavy.

When she awoke, the light of the morning sun was streaming around her. She remembered the previous evening, and she was very glad that something which she had imagined to be so hard, and almost grievous, had been done and had proved to be quite easy and joyous. And then she felt a thrill of pride on recollecting her kisses, which had had nothing in them of the timidity of a first adventure. She could not observe the slightest trace of repentance in her heart, although it occurred to her that it was conventional to be penitent after such things as she had experienced. Words, too, like "sin" and "love affair" passed through her mind, without being able to linger in her thoughts, because they seemed to be devoid of all meaning. She believed herself certain that she replied to Emil's tenderness just like a woman accomplished in the art of love, and was very happy in the thought that all those things which came to other women as the result of the experiences of nights of drunkenness had come to her from the depth of her feelings. It seemed to her as though in the previous evening she had discovered in herself a gift, of the existence of which she had hitherto had no premonition, and she felt a slight emotion of regret stir within her at not having turned that gift to the best advantage earlier. She remembered one of Emil's questions as to her past, on account of which she had not been so shocked as she ought to have been, and now, as she recalled it to mind, the same smile appeared on her lips, as when she had sworn that she had told him the truth, which he had not wanted to believe. Then she thought of their next meeting; she pictured to herself how he would receive her and escort her through his rooms. The idea came to her that she would behave just as if nothing at all had yet happened between them. Not once would he be able to read in her glance the recollection of the previous evening; he would have to win her all over again, he would have to woo her — not with words alone, but also with his music…. Yes…. Wasn't she going to hear him play that very forenoon?… Of course — in the Church…. Then she remembered the sudden jealousy which had seized her the previous evening…. Yes, but why?… It seemed to her now to be so absurd — jealousy of a singer who perhaps was taking part in singing the Mass, or of some other unknown woman. She would, however, go to the Church in any case. Ah, how fine it would be to stand in the dim light of the Church, unseen by him and unable to see him, and to hear only his playing, which would float down to her from the choir. And she felt as though she rejoiced in the prospect of a new tenderness which should come to her from him without his apprehending it.

Slowly she got up and dressed herself. A gentle thought of her home rose up within her, but it was altogether without strength. She even found it a trouble to think of it. Moreover, she felt no penitence on that account; rather, she was proud of what she had done. She felt herself wholly as Emil's creature; all that had had part in her life previous to his advent seemed to be extinguished. If he were to demand of her that she should live a year, live the coming summer with him, but that then she should die — she would obey him.

Her dishevelled hair fell over her shoulders. Memories came to her which almost made her reel. … Ah, Heaven; why had all this come so late, so late? But there was still a long time before her — there were still five, still ten years during which she might remain beautiful…. Oh, there was even longer so far as he was concerned, if they remained together, since, indeed, he would change together with her. And again the hope flitted through her mind: if he should make her his wife, if they should live together, travel together, sleep together, night after night — but now she began to feel slightly ashamed of herself — why was it that these thoughts were for ever present in her mind? Yet, to live together, did it not mean something further — to have cares in common, to be able to talk with one another on all subjects? Yes, she would, before all things, be his friend. And that was what she would tell him in the evening before everything else. That day he would have at last to tell her everything, tell her about himself; he would have to unfold his whole life before her, from the moment when they had parted twelve years ago until — and she could not help being amazed as she pursued her thoughts — until the previous morning…. She had seen him again for the first time the morning before, and in the space of that one day she had become so completely his that she could no longer think of anything except him; she was scarcely any longer a mother … no, nothing but his beloved.

She went out into the brightness of the summer day. It occurred to her that she was meeting more people than usual, that most of the shops were shut — of course, it was Sunday! She had not thought of that at all. And now that, too, made her glad. Soon she met a very slender gentleman who was wearing his overcoat open and by whose side was walking a young girl with very dark, laughing eyes. Bertha could not help thinking that she and Emil looked just such another couple … and she pictured to herself how beautiful it must be to stroll about, not merely in the darkness of the night, but, just as these two were doing, openly in the broad light of day, arm in arm, and with happiness and laughter shining in their eyes. Many a time, when a gentleman going past her looked into her face, she felt as though she understood the language of glances, like something new to her. One man looked at her with a sort of grave expression, and he seemed to say: Well, you are also just like the others! Presently came two young people who left off talking to each other when they saw her. She felt as though they knew perfectly well what had happened the previous night. Then another man passed, who appeared to be in a great hurry, and he cast her a rapid sidelong glance which seemed to say: Why are you walking about here as imposingly, as if you were a good woman? Yesterday evening you were in the arms of one of us. Quite distinctly she heard within her that expression “one of us,” and, for the first time in her life, she could not help pondering over the fact that all the men who passed by were indeed men, and that all the women were indeed women; that they desired one another, and, if they so wished, found one another. And she had the feeling as though only on the previous day at that time she had been a woman apart, from whom all other women had secrets, whilst now she also was included amongst them and could talk to them. She tried to remember the period which followed her wedding, and she recalled to mind that she had felt nothing beyond a slight disappointment and shame. Very vague there rose in her mind a certain sentence — she could not tell whether she had once read it or heard it — namely: “It is always the same, indeed, after all.” And she seemed to herself much cleverer than the person, whoever it might have been, man or woman, who had spoken or written that sentence.

Presently she noticed that she was following the same route as she had taken on the previous morning. Her eye fell on an advertising column on which was an announcement of the concert in which Emil was one of those taking part. Delightedly she stopped before it. A gentleman stood beside her. She smiled and thought: if he knew that my eyes are resting upon the very name of the man who, last night, was my lover…. Suddenly, she felt very proud. What she had done she considered as something unique. She could scarcely imagine that other women possessed the same courage. She walked on through the public gardens in which there were more people than on the previous day. Once again she saw children playing, governesses and nursemaids gossiping, reading, knitting. She noticed particularly a very old gentleman who had sat down on a seat in the sun; he looked at her, shook his head and followed her with a hard and inexorable glance. The incident created a most unpleasant impression upon her, and she had a feeling of injury in regard to the did gentleman. When, however, she mechanically glanced back, she observed that he was gazing at the sunlit sand and was still shaking his head. She realized then that this was due to his old age, and she asked herself whether Emil, too, would not one day be just such an aged gentleman, who would sit in the sun and shake his head. And all at once she saw herself walking along by his side in the chestnut avenue at home, but she was just as young as she was now, and he was being wheeled in an invalid's chair. She shivered slightly. If Herr Rupius were to know…. No — never, never would he believe that of her! If he had supposed her capable of such things he would not have called her to join him on the balcony and told her that his wife was intending to leave him….

At that moment she was amazed at what seemed to her to be the great exuberance of her life. She had the impression that she was existing in the midst of such complex relations as no other woman did. And this feeling also contributed to her pride.

As she walked past a group of children, of whom four were dressed exactly alike, she thought how strange it was that she had not for a moment considered the fact that her adventure of the previous day might possibly have consequences. But a connexion between that which had happened the day before between those wild embraces in a strange room — and a being which one day would call her "Mother" seemed to lie without the pale of all possibility.

She left the garden and took the road to the Lerchenfelderstrasse. She wondered whether Emil was now thinking that she was on her way to him. Whether his first thought that morning had been of her. And it seemed to her now that previously her imagination had pictured quite differently the morning after a night such as she had spent…. Yes, she had fancied it as a mutual awakening, breast on breast, and lips pressed to lips.

A detachment of soldiers came towards her. Officers paced along by the side of the pavement; one of them jostled her slightly, as he passed, and said politely:

"I beg your pardon."

He was a very handsome man, and he gave himself no further concern on her account, which vexed her a little. And the thought came to her involuntarily: had he also a beloved? And suddenly she knew for a certainty that he had been with the girl he loved the previous night; also that he loved her only, and concerned himself with other women as little as Emil did.

She was now in front of the church. The notes of the organ came surging forth into the street. A carriage was standing there, and a footman was on the box. How came that carriage there? All at once, it was quite clear to Bertha that some definite connexion must have subsisted between it and Emil, and she resolved to leave the church before the conclusion of the Mass so as to see who might enter the carriage. She went into the crowded church. She passed forward between the rows of seats until she reached the High Altar, by which the priest was standing. The notes of the organ died away, the string orchestra began to take up the melody. Bertha turned her head in the direction of the choir. Somehow, it seemed strange to her that Emil should, incognito, so to speak, be playing the solo in a Haydn Mass here in the Lerchenfelder Church…. She looked at the female figures in the front seats. She noticed two — three — four young women and several old ladies. Two were sitting in the foremost row; one of them was very fashionably dressed in black silk, the other appeared to be her maid. Bertha thought that in any case the carriage must belong to that aristocratic old lady, and the idea greatly tranquillized her mind. She walked back again, half unconsciously keeping everywhere on the lookout for pretty women. There were still some who were passably good-looking; they all seemed to be absorbed in their devotions, and she felt ashamed that she alone was wandering about the church without any holy thoughts.

Then she noticed that the violin solo had already begun. He was now playing — he! he!… And at that moment she was hearing him play for the first time for more than ten years. And it seemed to her that it was the same sweet tone as of old, just as one recognized the voices of people whom one has not met for years. The soprano joined in. If she could only see the singer! It was a clear, fresh voice, though not very highly trained, and Bertha felt something like a personal connexion between the notes of the violin and the song. It was natural that Emil should know the girl who was now singing…. But was there not something more in the fact of their performing together in the Mass than appeared on the surface? The singing ceased, the notes of the violin continued to resound, and now they spoke to her alone, as though they wished to reassure her. The orchestra joined in, the violin solo hovered over the other instruments, and seemed only to have that one desire to come to an understanding with her. "I know that you are there," it seemed to say, "and I am playing only for you…."

The organ chimed in, but still the violin solo remained dominant over the rest. Bertha was so moved that tears rose to her eyes. At length the solo came to an end, as though engulfed in the swelling flood of sound from the other instruments, and it arose no more. Bertha scarcely listened, but she found a wonderful solace in the music sounding around her. Many a time she fancied that she could hear Emil's violin playing with the orchestra, and then it seemed quite strange, almost incredible, that she was standing there by a column, down in the body of the church and he was sitting at a desk up in the choir above, and the previous night they had been clasped in each other's arms, and all the hundreds of people there in the church knew nothing at all about it….

She must see him at once — she must! She wanted to wait for him at the bottom of the staircase…. She did not want to speak a word to him — no, but she wished to see him and also the others who came out — including the singer of whom she had been jealous. But she had got completely over that now; she knew that Emil could not deceive her….

The music had ceased; Bertha felt herself thrust forward towards the exit; she wanted to find the staircase, but it was at a considerable distance from her. Indeed, it was just as well that it was so … no, she would not have dared to do it, to put herself forward, to wait for him — what would he have thought of her? He certainly would not have liked it! No, she would disappear with the crowd, and would tell him in the evening that she had heard him play. She was now positively afraid of being observed by him. She stood at the entrance, walked down the steps, and went past the carriage, just as the old lady and her maid were getting into it. Bertha could not help smiling when she called to mind in what a state of apprehension the sight of that carriage had thrown her, and it seemed to her that her suspicion in regard to the carriage having been removed, all the others must necessarily flicker out! She felt as though she had passed through an extraordinary adventure and was standing now on the brink of an absolutely new existence. For the first time it seemed to her to have a meaning; everything else had been but a fiction of the imagination and became as nothing in comparison with the happiness which was streaming through her pulses, while she slowly sauntered from the church through the streets of the suburbs towards her hotel. It was not until she had nearly reached her destination that she noticed that she had gone the whole way as though lost in a dream and could scarcely remember which way she had taken and whether she had met any people or not.

As she was taking the key of her room the porter handed her a note and a bouquet of violets and lilac blossoms…. Oh, why had not she had a similar idea and sent Emil some flowers? But what could he have to write to her about? With a slight thrill of fear at her heart, she opened the letter and read:

"DEAREST,

"I must thank you once again for that delightful evening. To-day, unfortunately, it is impossible for me to see you. Don't be angry with me, my dear Bertha, and don't forget to let me know in good time on the next occasion when you come to Vienna."

Ever your own,

"EMIL."

She went, she ran up the stairs, into her own room…. Why was he unable to see her that day? Why did he not at least tell her the reason? But then, after all, what did she know of his various obligations of an artistic and social nature?… It would certainly have been going too much into detail, and it would have appeared like an evasion if he had, at full length, given his reasons for putting her off. But in spite of that…. And then, why did he say: the next occasion when you came to Vienna?… Had she not told him that she would be remaining there a few days longer? He had forgotten that — he must have forgotten it! And immediately she sat down and wrote:

"MY DEAREST EMIL,

"I am very sorry indeed that you have had to put me off to-day, but luckily I am not leaving Vienna yet. Do please write to me at once, dearest, and tell me whether you can spare a little time for me to-morrow or the next day.

"A thousand kisses from your

"BERTHA."

"P.S. — It is most uncertain when I shall be coming to Vienna again, and I should be very sorry in any case to go away without seeing you once more."

She read the letter over. Then she added a further postscript:

"I must see you again!"

She hurried out into the street, handed the letter to a commissionaire, and impressed upon him strongly that he was on no account to come back without an answer. Then she went up to her room again and posted herself at the window. She wanted to keep herself from thinking, she wished only to look down into the street. She forced herself to fix her attention on the passers-by, and she recalled to mind a game, which she used to play as a child, and in which she and her brothers looked out of the window and amused themselves by commenting on how this or that passer-by resembled some one or other of their acquaintances. In the present circumstances, it was a matter of some difficulty for her to discover any such resemblances, for her room was situated on the third story; but, on the other hand, owing to the distance, it was easier for her to discover the arbitrary resemblances which she was looking for. First of all, came a woman who looked like her cousin Agatha; then some one who reminded her of her music teacher at the Conservatoire; he was arm in arm with a woman who looked like her sister-in-law's cook. Yonder was a young man who bore a resemblance to her brother, the actor. Directly behind him, and in the uniform of a captain, a person who was the image of her dead father came along the road; he stood still awhile before the hotel, glanced up, exactly as if he were seeking her, and then disappeared through the doorway. For a moment Bertha was as greatly alarmed as if it really had been her father, who had come as a ghost from the grave. Then she forced herself to laugh — loudly — and sought to continue the game, but she was not able to play it any longer with success.

Her sole purpose now was to see whether the commissionaire was coming. At length she decided to have dinner, just to while away the time. After she had ordered it, she again went to the window. But now she no longer looked in the direction from which the commissionaire had to come, but her glances followed the crowded omnibuses and trams on their way to the suburbs. Then the captain, whom she had seen a short time before, struck her attention again, as he was just jumping on to a tram, a cigarette in his mouth. He no longer bore the slightest resemblance to her dead father.

She heard a clatter behind her; the waiter had come into the room. Bertha ate but little, and drank her wine very quickly. She grew sleepy, and leaned back in the corner of the divan. Her thoughts gradually grew indistinct; there was a ringing in her ears like the echoes of the organ which she had heard in the church. She shut her eyes and, all at once, as though evoked by magic, she saw the room in which she had been with Emil the previous evening, and behind the red curtains she perceived the gleaming whiteness of the coverlet. It appeared that she herself was sitting again before the piano, but another man was holding her in a close embrace — it was her nephew Richard. With an effort she tore her eyes open, she seemed to herself depraved beyond all measure, and she felt panic-stricken as though some atonement would have to be exacted from her, for these visionary fancies.

Once more she went to the window. She felt as if an eternity had passed since she had sent the commissionaire on his errand. She read through Emil's letter once again. Her glance lingered on the last words: "Ever your own"; and she repeated them to herself aloud and in a tender tone, and called to mind similar words which he had spoken the previous evening. She concocted a letter which was surely on the point of arriving and would certainly be couched in these terms: "My dearest Bertha! Heaven be thanked that you are going to remain in Vienna until to-morrow! I shall expect you for certain at my house at three o'clock," or: "to-morrow we will spend the whole day together," or even; "I have put off the appointment I had, so we can still see each other to-day. Come to me at once; longingly I am waiting for you!"

Well, whatever his answer might be, she would see him again before leaving Vienna, although not that day perhaps. Indeed, anything else was quite unthinkable. Why, then, was she a prey to this dreadful agitation, as though all were over between them? But why was his answer so long in coming?… He had, in any case, gone out to dinner — of course, he had no one to keep house for him! So the earliest that he could be home again was three o'clock…. But if he were not to return home till the evening?… She had, indeed, told the commissionaire to wait in any case — even till the night, if necessary…. But what was she to do? Of course, she could not stand there looking out of the window all the time! The hours, indeed, seemed endless! She was ready to weep with impatience, with despair!

She paced up and down the room; then she again stood at the window for a while, then she sat down and took up for a short time the novel which she had brought with her in her travelling bag; she attempted, too, to go to sleep — but did not succeed in doing so. At length four o'clock struck — nearly three hours had passed since she had begun her vigil.

There was a knock at the door. The commissionaire came into the room and handed her a letter. She tore open the envelope and with an involuntary movement, so as to conceal the expression on her features from the stranger, she turned towards the window.

She read the letter.

“MY DEAREST BERTHA,

“It is very good of you still to give me a choice between the next few days but, as indeed I have already hinted to you in my former letter, it is, unfortunately, absolutely impossible for me to do just as I like during that time. Believe me, I regret that it is so, at least as much as you do.

“Once more a thousand thanks and a thousand greetings and I trust that we will be able to arrange a delightful time when next we meet.

“Don’t forget me completely,

“Your

“EMIL.”

When she had finished reading the letter she was quite calm; she paid the commissionaire the fee he demanded and found that, for a person in her circumstances, it was by no means insignificant. Then she sat down at the table and tried to collect her thoughts. She realized immediately that she could no longer remain in Vienna, and her only regret was that there was no train which could take her home at once. On the table stood the half empty bottle of wine, bread crumbs were scattered beside the plate, on the bed lay her spring jacket, beside it were the flowers which he had sent her that very morning.

What could it all mean? Was it at an end?

Indistinctly, but so that it seemed that it must bear some relation to her recent experiences, there occurred to her a sentence which she had once read. It was about men who desire nothing more than “to attain their object…” But she had always considered that to be a phrase of the novelists. But, after all, it was surely not a letter of farewell that she was holding in her hand, was it?… Was it really not a letter of farewell? Might not these kind words be also lies?… Also lies — that was it!… For the first time the positive word forced itself into her thoughts…. Lies!… Then it was certain that, when he brought her home the previous night, he had already made up his mind not to see her again. And the appointment for the present day and his desire to see her again that day were lies….

She went over the events of the previous evening in her mind, and she asked herself what could she have said or done to put him out of humour or disappoint him…. Really, it had all been so beautiful, and Emil had seemed so happy, just as happy as she had been … was all that going to prove to have been a lie too?… How could she tell?… Perhaps, after all, she had put him out of humour without being aware that she was doing so…. She had, indeed, been nothing more or less than a good woman all her life…. Who could say whether she had not been guilty of something clumsy or stupid?… whether she had not been ludicrous and repellent in some moment when she had believed herself to be sacrificing, tender, enchanted and enchanting?… But what did she know of all these things?… And, all at once, she felt something almost in the nature of repentance that she had set out upon her adventure so utterly unprepared, that, until the previous day, she had been so chaste and good, that she had not had other lovers before Emil…. Then she remembered, too, that he had evaded her shy questions and requests on the subject of his violin playing, as if he had not wanted to admit her into that sphere of his life. He had thus remained strange to her, intentionally strange, so far as concerned the very things which were of the deepest and most vital importance to him. All at once she realized that she had no more in common with him than the pleasures of a night, and that the present morning had found them both as far apart from one another as they had been during all the years in which they had each led a separate existence.

And then jealousy again flared up within her…. But she felt as though she was always thus, as though every conceivable emotion had always been present within her … love and distrust, and hope and penitence, and yearning and jealousy … and, for the first time in her life, she was so stirred, even to the very depths of her soul, that she understood those who in their despair have hurled themselves out of a window to meet their death…. And she perceived that the present state of affairs was impossible, that only certainty could be of any avail to her…. She must go to him and ask him … but she must ask in the manner of one who is holding a knife to another's breast….

She hurried away through the streets, which were almost deserted, as though all Vienna had gone off into the country…. But would she find him at home?… Would he not, perhaps, have had a presentiment that the idea might come to her to seek him, to take him to task, and would he not have taken steps to evade the chance of such an occurrence?… She was ashamed of having had to think of that, too…. And if he was at home would she find him alone?… And if he was not alone, would she be admitted into his house?

And if she found him in the arms of some other woman, what should she say?… Had he promised her anything? Had he sworn to be true to her? Had she even so much as demanded loyalty of him? How could she have imagined that he was waiting for her here in Vienna until she congratulated him on his Spanish Order?… Yes, could he not say to her: "You have thrown yourself on my neck and have desired nothing more than that I should take you as you are…." And if she asked herself — was he not right?… Had she not come to Vienna to be his beloved? — and for no other reason … without any regard to the past, without any guarantee as to the future?… Yes, that was all she had come for! All other hopes and wishes had only transiently hovered around her passion, and she did not deserve anything better than that which had happened to her…. And if she was candid to herself, she must also admit that of all that she had experienced this had still been the best….

She stopped at a street corner. All was quiet around her; the summer air about her was heavy and sultry. She retraced her steps back to her hotel. She was very tired, and a new thought rose up convulsively within her: was it not possible that he had written to put her off only because he also was tired?… She seemed to herself very experienced when that idea occurred to her…. And yet another thought flashed through her mind: that he could also love no other woman in the way in which he had loved her…. And suddenly she asked whether, after all, the previous night would remain her only experience — whether she herself would belong to no other man save him? And she rejoiced in the doubt, as if, by cherishing it, she was taking a kind of revenge on his compassionate glance and mocking lips.

And now she was back again in the cheerless room away up in the third storey of the hotel. The remains of her dinner had not yet been cleared away. Her jacket and the flowers were still lying on the bed. She took the flowers in her hand and raised them to her lips, as though about to kiss them. Suddenly, however, as though her whole anger burst forth again, she flung them violently to the ground. Then she threw herself on the bed, her face buried in her hands.

After lying for some time in this position she felt her calmness gradually returning. It was perhaps just as well that she could return home that very day. She thought of her boy, how he was accustomed to lie in his little cot with his whole face beaming with laughter, if his mother leaned over the railings. She yearned for him. Also she yearned in some slight degree for Elly and for Frau Rupius. Yes, it was true — Frau Rupius, of course, was going to leave her husband…. What could there be at the bottom of it all?… A love affair?… But, strangely enough, she was now still less able than before to picture to herself the answer to that question.

It was growing late, it was time for her to get ready for her departure…. So, then, she would be home again by Sunday evening.

She sat in the carriage; on her lap lay the flowers, which she had picked up from the floor…. Yes, she was now travelling home, leaving the town where she … had experienced something — that was the right expression, wasn't it?… Words which she had read or heard in connexion with similar circumstances kept recurring continually to her mind … such words as: "bliss" … "transports of love" … "ecstasy" … and a gentle thrill of pride stirred within her at having experienced what those words denoted. And yet another thought came to her which caused her to grow singularly calm: if he also — maybe — had an affair with another woman at that very time … she had taken him from her … not for long indeed, but yet as completely as it was possible to take a man from a woman. She grew calmer and calmer, almost cheerful.

It was, indeed, clear to her that she, Bertha, the inexperienced woman, could not, with one assault, completely obtain possession of her beloved…. But might she not be successful on a second occasion, she wondered? She was very glad that she had not carried out her determination to hasten to him at once. Indeed, she even formed the intention of writing him such a cold letter that he would fall into a mild fit of anger; she would be coquettish, subtle…. But she must have him again … of that she was certain … soon, and, if possible, forever!… And so her dreams went on and on as the train carried her homewards…. Ever bolder they grew as the humming of the wheels grew deeper and deeper, lulling her into a semi-slumberous state.

On her arrival she found the little town buried in a deep sleep — she reached home and told the maidservant to fetch Fritz from her sister-in-law's the first thing in the morning. Then she slowly undressed herself. Her glance fell on the portrait of her dead husband, which hung over the bed. She asked herself whether it should remain in that position. Then the thought occurred to her that there are some women who come from their lovers and then are able to sleep by the side of their husbands, and she shuddered…. She could never have done such a thing while her husband had been alive!… And, if she had done it, she would never have returned home again….

IX

THE NEXT MORNING Bertha was wakened by Fritz. He had jumped on to her bed and had breathed softly on her eyelids. Bertha sat up, embraced and kissed him, and he immediately began to tell her how well he had fared with his uncle and aunt, how Elly had played with him, and how Richard had once had a fight with him without being able to beat him. On the previous day, too, he had learned to play the piano, and would soon be as clever at it as mamma.

Bertha was content just to listen to him.

"If only Emil could hear his sweet prattle now!" she thought.

She considered whether, on the next occasion, she should not take Fritz with her to Vienna to see Emil, by doing which she would at once remove anything of a suspicious nature in such a visit.

She thought only of the pleasant side of her experiences in Vienna, and of the letters which Emil had written to put her off scarcely anything remained in her memory, other than those words which had reference to a future meeting.

She got up in an almost cheerful frame of mind and, whilst she was dressing herself, she felt a quite new tenderness for her own body, which still seemed to her to be fragrant with the kisses of her beloved.

While the morning was yet young, she went to call on her relations. As she walked by the house of Herr Rupius she deliberated for a moment whether she should not go up and see him there and then. But she had a vague fear of being immediately involved again in the agitated atmosphere of the household, and she deferred the visit until the afternoon.

At her brother-in-law's house Elly was the first to meet her, and she welcomed her as boisterously as if Bertha had returned from a long journey. Her brother-in-law, who was on the point of going out, jestingly shook a threatening finger at Bertha and said:

"Well, have you had a good time?"

Bertha felt herself blushing crimson.

"Yes," he continued; "these are pretty stories that we hear about you!"

He did not, however, notice her embarrassment and, as he went out of the door, greeted her with a glance which plainly meant: "You can't keep your secrets from me."

"Father is always making jokes like that," said Elly. "I don't like him doing that at all!"

Bertha knew that her brother-in-law had only been talking at random, as his usual manner was, and that, if she had told him the truth, he would not have believed her for a moment.

Her sister-in-law came into the room, and Bertha had to relate all about her stay in Vienna.

To her own surprise she succeeded very well in cleverly blending truth with fiction. She told how she had been with her cousin to the public gardens and the picture gallery; on Sunday she had heard Mass at St. Stephen's Church; she had met in the street a teacher from the Conservatoire; and finally she even invented a funny married couple, whom she represented as having had supper one evening at her cousin's. The further she proceeded with her lies, the greater was her desire to tell all about Emil as well, and to inform them how she had met in the street the celebrated violinist Lindbach, who had formerly been with her at the Conservatoire, and how she had had a conversation with him. But a vague fear of not being able to stop at the right time caused her to refrain from making any reference to him.

Frau Albertine Garlan sat on the sofa in an attitude of profound lassitude, and nodded her head. Elly stood, as usual, by the piano, her head resting on her hands, and she gazed open-eyed at her aunt.

From her sister-in-law's Bertha went on to the Mahlmanns' and gave the twins their music lesson. The finger exercises and scales which she had to hear were at first intolerable to her, but finally she ceased to listen to them at all, and let her thoughts wander at will. The cheerful mood of the morning had vanished, Vienna seemed to her to be infinitely distant, a strange feeling of disquietude came over her and suddenly the fear seized her that Emil might go away immediately after his concert. That would indeed be terrible! He might go away all of a sudden without her having seen him once more — and who could say when he would return?

She wondered whether it would not be well to arrange to be in Vienna in any case on the day of the concert. She had to admit to herself that she had not: the slightest longing to hear him play. Indeed, it seemed to her that she would not in the least mind if he was not a violin virtuoso at all, if he was not even an artist, but just an ordinary kind of man — a bookseller, or something like that! If she could only have him for herself, for herself alone!…

Meanwhile the twins played through their scales. It was surely a terrible doom to have to sit there and give these untalented brats music lessons. How was it that she had been in good spirits only just a little earlier that day?…

Ah, those beautiful days in Vienna! Quite irrespective of Emil — the entire freedom, the sauntering about the streets, the walks in the public gardens…. To be sure, she had spent more money during her stay than she could afford; two dozen lessons to the Mahlmann twins would not recoup her the outlay…. And now, here she had to come back again to her relations, to give music lessons, and really it might even be necessary to look about for fresh pupils, for her accounts would not balance at all that year!… Ah, what a life!…

In the street Bertha met Frau Martin, who asked her how she had enjoyed herself in Vienna. At the same time she threw Bertha a glance which clearly said:

"I'm quite sure you don't enjoy life so much as I do with my husband!"

Bertha had an overwhelming desire to shriek in that person's face:

"I have had a much better time than you think! I have been with an enchanting young man who is a thousand times more charming than your husband! And I understand how to enjoy life quite as well as you do! You have only a husband, but I have a lover! — a lover! — a lover!"…

Yet, of course, she said nothing of the kind, but related how she had gone with her cousin and the children for a walk in the public gardens.

Bertha also met with some other ladies with whom she was superficially acquainted. She felt that her mental attitude towards those ladies had undergone a complete change since her visit to Vienna — that she was freer, superior. It seemed to her that she was the only woman in the town with any experience, and she was almost sorry that nobody knew anything about it, for although, publicly, they would have despised her, in their hearts all those women would have been filled with unutterable envy of her.

And if, after all, they had known who…. Although in that hole of a town there were certainly many who had not so much as heard Emil's name! If only there was some one in the world to whom she could open her heart! Frau Rupius — yes, there was Frau Rupius!… But, of course, she was in the habit of going away, of taking trips!… And, to tell the truth, thought Bertha, that was also a matter of indifference to her. She would only like to know how things would eventually turn out so far as she and Emil were concerned, she would like to know how matters actually stood. It was the uncertainty that was causing her that terrible uneasiness…. Had she only had a love affair with him, after all?… Ah, but why had she not gone to him once again?… But, of course, that was quite impossible!… That letter…. He didn't want to see her, that was it!…

But then, on the other hand, he had sent her flowers….

And now she was back again with her relations. Richard was going to meet her and embrace her in his playful manner. She pushed him away.

"Impudent boy!" she thought to herself. "I know very well what he means by doing that, although he himself does not know. I understand these things — I have a lover in Vienna!…"

The music lesson took its course and, at the end of it, Elly and Richard played as a duet Beethoven's [Footnote: Query — Brahms (translator's note).] "Festival Overture" which was intended by them to be a birthday surprise for their father.

Bertha thought only of Emil. She was nearly being driven out of her mind by this wretched strumming … no, it was not possible to live on like that, whichever way she looked at it!… She was still a young woman, too…. Yes, that was the secret of it all, the real secret…. She would not be able to live on like that any more…. And yet it would not do for her … any other man…. How could she ever think of such a thing!… What a very wicked person she must be, after all! Who could tell whether it had not been that trait in her character which Emil, with his great experience of life, had perceived in her, and which had been the cause of his being unwilling to see her any more?… Ah, those women surely had the best of it who took everything easily, and, when abandoned by one man, immediately turned to another…. But stay, whatever could it be that was putting such thoughts as these into her head? Had Emil, then, abandoned her?… In three or four days she would be in Vienna again; with him; in his arms!… And had she been able to live for three years as she had done?… Three? — Six years — her whole life!… If he only knew that, if he only believed that!

Her sister-in-law came into the room and invited Bertha to have supper with them that evening…. Yes, that was her only distraction: to go out to dinner or supper occasionally at some other house than her own!

If only there was a man in the town to whom she could talk!… And Frau Rupius was going off on her travels and leaving her husband…. Hadn't a love affair, maybe, something to do with that, Bertha wondered.

The music lesson came to an end and Bertha took her leave. In the presence of her sister-in-law, too, she noticed that she had that feeling of superiority, almost of compassion, which had come over her when she had seen the other ladies. Yes, she was certain that she would not give up that one hour with Emil for a whole life such as her sister-in-law led. Moreover, as she thought to herself as she was walking homewards, she had not been able to arrive at a complete perception of her happiness, which, indeed, had all slipped by so quickly. And then that room, that whole house, that frightful picture…. No, no, it was all really hideous rather than anything else. After all, the only really beautiful moments had been those which had followed, when Emil had accompanied her to her hotel in the carriage, and her head had rested on his breast….

Ah, he loved her indeed; of course, not so deeply as she loved him; but how could that be possible? What a number of experiences he had had in his life! She thought of that now without any feeling of jealousy; rather, she felt a slight pity for him in having to carry so much in his memory. It was quite evident from his appearance that he was not a man who took life easily…. He was not of a cheerful disposition…. All the hours which she had spent with him seemed in her recollection as if encompassed by an incomprehensible melancholy. If she only knew all about him! He had told her so little about himself … nothing, indeed, absolutely nothing!… But how would that have been possible on the very first day that they had met again? Ah! if only he really knew her! If she were only not so shy, so incapable of expressing herself!

She would have to write to him again before seeing him…. Yes, she would write to him that very day. What a stupid concoction it was, that letter which she had sent him on the previous day! In truth, he could not have sent her any other answer than that which she had received. She would not write to him either defiantly or humbly…. No, after all, she was his beloved! She who, as she walked along the streets here in the little town, was regarded by every one who met her as one of themselves … she was the beloved of that magnificent man whom she had worshipped since her girlhood. How unreservedly and unaffectedly she had given herself to him — not one of all the women she knew would have done that!… Ah, and she would do still more! Oh, yes! She would even live with him without being married to him, and she would be supremely indifferent to what people might say … she would even be proud of her action! And later on he would marry her, after all … of course he would. She was such a capable housekeeper, too…. And how much good it would be sure to do him, after the unsettled existence which he had been leading during the years of his wanderings, to live in a well-ordered house, with a good wife by his side, who had never loved any man but him.

And now she was home again. Before dinner was served she had made all her preparations for writing the letter. She ate her dinner with feverish impatience; she scarcely allowed herself time to cut up Fritz's dinner and give it to him. Then, instead of undressing him herself and putting him to bed for his afternoon sleep, as she was always accustomed to do, she told the maid to attend to him.

She sat down at the desk and the words flowed without effort from her pen, as though she had long ago composed in her head the whole letter.

"My EMIL, MY BELOVED, MY ALL!

"Since I have returned home again I have been possessed by an overwhelming desire to write to you, and I should like to say to you over and over again how happy, how infinitely happy, you have made me. I was angry with you at first when you wrote and said you could not see me on Sunday. I must confess that to you as well, for I feel that I am under the necessity of telling you everything that passes in my mind. Unfortunately, I could not do so while we were together; I had not the power of expressing myself, but now I can find the words and you must, I fear, put up with my boring you with this scribble. My dearest, my only one — yes, that you are, although it seems to me that you were not quite so certain of it as you ought to have been. I beseech you to believe that it is true. You see, I have no means, of course, wherewith to tell you this, other than these words, Emil, I have never, never loved any man, but you — and I will never love any other. Do with me as you will. I have no ties in the little town where I am living now — on the contrary, indeed, I often find it a terrible thing to be obliged to live my life here. I will move to Vienna, so as to be near you. Oh, do not fear that I will disturb you! I am not alone, you see, I have my boy, whom I idolize. I will cut down my expenses, and, in the long run, why shouldn't I succeed in finding pupils even in a large town like Vienna just as I do here, perhaps, indeed, even more easily than here, and in that way improve my position? Yet that is a secondary consideration, for I may tell you that it has long been my intention to move to Vienna if only for the sake of my dearly loved boy, when he grows older.

"You cannot imagine how stupid the men are here! And I can no longer bear to look at any one of them at all, since I have again had the happiness of being in your company.

"Write to me, my dearest! Yet you need not trouble to send me a whole long letter. In any case I shall be coming to Vienna again this week. I would have had to do so in any event, because of some pressing commissions, and you will then be able to tell me everything — just what you think of my proposal, and what you consider best for me to do. But you must promise me this, that, when I live in Vienna, you will often visit me. Of course, no one need know anything about it, if you do not care that they should. But you may believe me — every day on which I may be allowed to see you will be a red-letter day for me and that, in all the world, there is nobody who loves you in such a true and life-long manner as I do.

"Farewell, my beloved!

"Your

"BERTHA."

She did not venture to read over what she had written, but left the house at once so as to take the letter herself to the railway station. There she saw Frau Rupius, a few paces in front of her, accompanied by a maid who was carrying a small valise.

What could that mean?

She caught up Frau Rupius, just as the latter was going into the waiting room. The maid laid the valise on the large table in the centre of the room, kissed her mistress's hand, and departed.

"Frau Rupius!" exclaimed Bertha, a note of inquiry in her voice.

"I heard that you had returned already. Well, how did you get on?" said Frau Rupius, extending her hand in a friendly way.

"Very well — very well indeed, but—"

"Why, you are gazing at me as though you were quite frightened! No, Frau Bertha, I am coming back again — no later than to-morrow. The long journey that I had in view came to nothing, so I have had to — settle on something else."

"Something else?"

"Why, of course, staying at home. I shall be back again to-morrow. Well, how did you get on?"

"I told you just now — very well."

"Yes, of course, you did tell me before. But I see you are going to post that letter, are you not?"

And then for the first time Bertha noticed that she was still holding the letter to Emil in her hand. She gazed at it with such enraptured eyes that Frau Rupius smiled.

"Perhaps you would like me to take it with me? It is to go to Vienna, I presume?"

"Yes," answered Bertha, and then she added resolutely, as though she was glad to be able to say it out at last: "to him."

Frau Ropius nodded her head, as if satisfied. But she neither looked at Bertha nor made any reply.

"I am so glad that I have met you again!" said Bertha. "You are the only woman here, you know, whom I trust; indeed, you are the only woman who could understand anything like this."

"Ah, no," said Frau Rupius to herself, as though she were dreaming.

"I do envy you so, because to-day in a few short hours you will see Vienna again. How fortunate you are!"

Frau Rupius had sat down in one of the leather armchairs by the table.
She rested her chin on her hand, looked at Bertha, and said:

"It seems to me, on the other hand, that it is you who are fortunate."

"No, I must, you see, remain here."

"Why?" asked Frau Rupius. "You are free, you know. But go and put that letter into the box at once, or I shall see the address, and so learn more than you wish to tell me."

"I will, though not because of that — but I should be glad if the letter went by this train and not later."

Bertha hurried into the vestibule, posted the letter and at once returned to Anna, who was still sitting in the same quiet attitude.

"I might have told you everything, you know," Bertha went on to say; "indeed I might say that I wished to tell you before I actually went to Vienna … but — just fancy, isn't it strange? I did not venture to do so."

"Moreover at that time, too, there probably had not been anything to tell," said Frau Rupius, without looking at Bertha.

Bertha was amazed. How clever that woman was! She could see into everybody's thoughts!

"No, at that time there had not been anything to tell," she repeated, gazing at Frau Rupius with a kind of reverence. "Just think — you will probably find it hard to believe what I am going to tell you now, but I should feel a liar if I kept it secret."

"Well?"

Bertha had sat down on a seat beside Frau Rupius, and she spoke in a lower tone, for the vestibule door was standing open.

"I wanted to tell you this, Anna: that I do not in the least feel that I have done anything wicked, not even anything immoral."

"It wouldn't be a very clever thing, either, if you had."

"Yes, you are quite right…. What I really meant to say was rather that it seems to me as though I had done something quite good, as if I had done something outstanding. Yes, Frau Rupius, the fact of the matter is, I have been proud of myself ever since."

"Well, there is probably no reason for that either," said Frau Rupius, as if lost in thought, stroking Bertha's hand, which lay upon the table.

"I am aware of that, of course, and yet I am so proud and seem quite different from all the women whom I know. You see if you knew … if you were acquainted with him — it is such a strange affair! You mustn't think, let me tell you, that it is an acquaintanceship which I have made recently — quite the contrary; I have been in love with him, you must know, ever since I was quite a young girl, no less than twelve years ago. For a long time we had completely lost sight of one another, and now — isn't it wonderful? — now he is my … my … my … lover!"

She had said it at last. Her whole face was radiant.

Frau Rupius threw her a glance in which could be detected a little scorn and a great deal of kindliness.

"I am glad that you are happy," she said.

"How very kind you are indeed! But then, you see, on the other hand again, it is a dreadful thing that we are so far apart from one another; he, in Vienna; I, here — I don't think I shall ever be able to endure that. Moreover, I have ceased to feel that I belong to this place, least of all to my relations. If they knew … no, if they knew! However, they would never be able to bring themselves to believe it. A woman like my sister-in-law, for instance — well, I am perfectly certain that she could never imagine such a thing to be in any way possible."

"But you are really very ingenuous!" said Frau Rupius suddenly, almost with exasperation. Then she listened for a moment. "I thought I could hear the train whistling already."

She rose to her feet, walked over to the large glass door leading on to the platform, and looked out. A porter came and asked for the tickets in order to punch them.

"The train for Vienna is twenty minutes late," he remarked, at the same time.

Bertha had stood up and gone over to Frau Rupius.

"Why do you consider that I am ingenuous?" she asked shyly.

"But, indeed, you know absolutely nothing about men," replied Frau Rupius, as if she were annoyed. "You haven't, you know, the slightest idea among what kind of people you are living. I can assure you, you have no reason at all to be proud."

"I know, of course, that it is very stupid of me."

"Your sister-in-law — that is delightful! — your sister-in-law!"

"What do you mean, then?"

"I mean that she has had a lover too!"

"Whatever put such an idea as that into your head!"

"Well, she is not the only woman in this town."

"Yes, there are certainly women who … but, Albertine—"

"And do you know who it was? That is very amusing! It was Herr Klingemann!"

"No, that is impossible!"

"Of course, it is now a long time ago, about ten or eleven years."

"But at that time, by the way, you yourself had not come to live here, Frau Rupius!"

"Oh, I have heard it from the best source. It was Herr Klingemann himself who told me about it."

"Herr Klingemann himself! But is it possible for a man to be so base as all that!"

"I don't think there's the least doubt about that," answered Frau Rupius, sitting down on a seat near the door, whilst Bertha remained standing beside her, listening in amazement to her friend's words. "Yes, Herr Klingemann himself…. As soon as I came to the town, you must know, he did me the honour of making violent love to me, neck or nothing, so to speak. You know yourself, of course, what a loathsome wretch he is. I laughed him to scorn, which probably exasperated him a great deal, and evidently he thought that he would be able conclusively to prove to me how irresistible he was by recounting all his conquests."

"But perhaps he told you some things which were not true."

"A great deal, probably; but this story, as it happens, is true…. Ah, what a rabble these men are!"

There was a note of the deepest hatred in Frau Rupius' voice. Bertha was quite frightened. She had never thought it possible that Frau Rupius could have said such things.

"Yes, why shouldn't you know what kind of men they are amongst whom you are living?" continued Frau Rupius.

"No, I would never have thought it possible! If my brother-in-law knew about it!—"

"If he knew about it? He knows about it as well as you or I do!"

"What do you say! No, no!"

"Indeed, he caught them together — you understand me! Herr Klingemann and Albertine! So that, however much inclined he might have been to make the best of things, there was no doubt possible!"

"But, for Heaven's sake — what did he do, then?"

"Well, as you can see for yourself, he has not turned her out!"

"Well, yes, the children … of course!"

"The children — pooh-pooh! He forgave her for the sake of convenience — and chiefly because he could do as he liked after that. You can see for yourself how he treats her. When all is said and done, she is but little better than his servant; you know as well as I do in what a miserable, brow-beaten way she slinks about. He has brought it to this, that, ever since that moment, she has always had to look upon herself as a woman who has been treated with mercy. And I believe she has even a perpetual fear that he is reserving the punishment for some future day. But it is stupid of her to be afraid of that, for he wouldn't look out for another housekeeper for anything…. Ah, my dear Frau Bertha, we are not by any means angels, as you know now from your own experiences, but men are infamous so long" — she seemed to hesitate to complete the phrase — "so long as they are men."

Bertha was as though crushed; not so much on account of the things which Frau Rupius had told her as on account of the manner in which she had done so. She seemed to have become a quite different woman, and Bertha was pained at heart.

The door leading to the platform was opened and the low, incessant tinkling of the telegraph was heard. Frau Rupius stood up slowly, her features assumed a mild expression, and, stretching out her hand to Bertha, she said:

"Forgive me, I was only a little bit vexed. Things can be also very nice; of course, there are certainly decent men in the world as well as others. Oh, yes, things can be very nice, no doubt."

She looked out on to the railway lines and seemed to be following the iron track into the distance. Then she went on to say with that same soft, harmonious voice which appealed so strongly to Bertha:

"I shalt be home again to-morrow evening…. Oh, yes, of course, my travelling case!"

She hurried to the table and took her valise.

"It would have been a terrible catastrophe if I had forgotten that! I cannot travel without my ten bottles! Well, good-bye! And don't forget, though, that all I have been telling you happened ten years ago."

The train came into the station. Frau Rupius hurried to a compartment, got in, and, looking out of the window, nodded affably to Bertha. The latter endeavoured to respond as cheerfully, but she felt that her wave of the hand to the departing Frau Rupius was stiff and forced.

Slowly she walked homewards again. In vain she sought to persuade herself that all that she had heard was not the least concern of hers; the long past affair of her sister-in-law, the mean conduct of her brother-in-law, the baseness of Klingemann, the strange whims of that incomprehensible Frau Rupius; all had nothing to do with her. She could not explain it to herself, but somehow, it seemed to her as though all these things were mysteriously related to her own adventure.

Suddenly the gnawing doubts appeared again…. Why hadn't Emil wanted to see her again? Not on the following day, or on the second or on the third day? How was it? He had attained his object, that was sufficient for him…. However had she been able to write him that mad, shameless letter?

And a thrill of fear arose within her…. If he were to show her letter to another woman, maybe … make merry over it with her…. No, how on earth could such an idea come into her head? It was ridiculous even to think of such a thing!… It was possible, of course, that he would not answer the letter and would throw it into the wastepaper basket — but nothing worse than that…. No…. However, she must just have patience, and in two or three days all would be decided. She could not say anything with certainty, but she felt that this unendurable confusion within her mind could not last much longer. The question would have to be settled, somehow.

Late in the afternoon she again went for a walk amongst the vine-trellises with Fritz, but she did not go into the cemetery. Then she walked slowly down the hill and sauntered along under the chestnut trees. She chatted with Fritz, asked him about all sorts of things, listened to his stories and, as her frequent custom was, instilled some knowledge into his head on several subjects. She tried to explain to him how far the sun is distant from the earth, how the rain comes from the clouds, and how the bunches of grapes grow, from which wine is made. She was not annoyed, as often happened, if the boy did not pay proper attention to her, because she realized well enough that she was only talking for the sake of distracting her own thoughts.

Then she walked down the hill, under the chestnut trees, and so back to the town. Presently she saw Herr Klingemann approaching, but the fact made not the slightest impression upon her. He spoke to her with forced politeness; all the time he held his straw hat in his hand and affected a great and almost gloomy gravity. He seemed very changed, and she observed, too, that his clothes in reality were not at all elegant, but positively shabby. Suddenly she could not help picturing him tenderly embracing her sister-in-law, and she felt extremely disgusted.

Later on she sat down on a bench and watched Fritz playing with some other children, all the time making an effort to keep her attention fixed on him so that she would not have to think of anything else.

In the evening she went to her relatives. She had a sensation as though she had had a presentiment of everything long before, for otherwise how could she have failed to have been struck before this by the kind of relations which existed between her brother-in-law and his wife? The former again made jocular remarks about Bertha's visit to Vienna. He asked when she was going there again, and whether they would not soon be hearing of her engagement. Bertha entered into the joke, and told how at least a dozen men had proposed to her, amongst others, a Government official; but she felt that her lips alone were speaking and smiling, while her soul remained serious and silent.

Richard sat beside her, and his knee touched hers, by chance. And as he was pouring out a glass of wine for her and she seized his hand to stop him, she felt a comforting glow steal up her arm as far as her shoulder. It made her feel happy. It seemed to her that she was being unfaithful to Emil. And that was quite as she wished; she wanted Emil to know that her senses were on the alert, that she was just the same as other women, and that she could accept the embraces of her nephew in just the same way as she did his…. Ah, yes, if he only knew it! That was what she ought to have written in her letter, not that humble, longing letter!…

But even while these thoughts were surging through her mind, she remained serious in the depths of her soul, and a feeling of solitude actually came over her, for she knew that no one could imagine what was taking place within her.

Afterwards, when she was walking homewards through the deserted streets, she met an officer whom she knew by sight. With him he had a pretty woman whom she had never seen before.

"Evidently a woman from Vienna!" she thought, for she knew that the officers often had such visitors.

She had a feeling of envy towards the woman; she wished that she was also being accompanied by a handsome young officer at that moment…. And why not?… After all, everybody was like that…. And now she herself had ceased to be a respectable woman. Emil, of course, did not believe that, any more than anybody else, and, anyhow, it was all just the same!

She reached home, undressed and went to bed. But the air was too sultry. She got up again, went to the window and opened it. Outside, all was dark. Perhaps somebody could see her standing there at the window, could see her skin gleaming through the darkness…. Indeed, she would not mind at all if anybody did see her like that!… Then she lay down on the bed again…. Ah, yes, she was no better than any of the others! And there was no good reason either why she should be….

Her thoughts grew indistinct…. Yes, he was the cause of it all, he had brought her to this, he had just taken her like a woman of the street — and then cast her off!… Ah, it was shameful, shameful! — how base men were! And yet … it was delightful….

She fell asleep.

X

A WARM RAIN was gently falling the next morning. Thus Bertha was able to endure her immense impatience more easily than if the sun had been blazing down. She felt as though during her sleep much had been smoothed out within her. In the soft grey of the morning everything seemed so simple and so utterly commonplace. On the morrow she would receive the letter she was expecting, and the present day was just like a hundred others.

She gave her pupils their music lessons. She was very strict with her nephew that day and rapped him on the knuckles when he played unbearably badly. He was a lazy pupil — that was all.

In the afternoon she was struck by an idea, which seemed to herself to be extremely praiseworthy. She had for a long time past intended to teach Fritz how to read, and she would make a start that very day. For a whole hour she slaved away, instilling a few letters into his head.

The rain still kept falling; it was a pity that she could not go for a walk. The afternoon would be long, very long. Surely she ought to go and see Herr Rupius without further delay. It was too bad of her that she had not called on him since her return from Vienna. It was quite possible that he would feel somewhat ashamed of himself in her presence, because just lately he had been using such big words, and now Anna was still with him, after all….

Bertha left the house. In spite of the rain, she walked, first of all, out into the open country. It was long since she had been so tranquil as she was that day; she rejoiced in the day without agitation, without fear, and without expectation. Oh, if it could be always like that! She was astonished at the indifference with which she could think of Emil. She would be more than content if she should not hear another word from him, and could continue in her present state of tranquillity forever…. Yes, it was good and pleasant to be like that — to live in the little town, to give the few music lessons, which, after all, required no great effort, to educate her boy, to teach him to read, to write, and to count! Were her experiences of the last few days, she asked herself, worth so much anxiety — nay, so much humiliation? No, she was not intended for such things. It seemed as though the din of the great city, which had not disturbed her on her last visit, was now for the first time ringing in her ears, and she rejoiced in the beautiful calm which encompassed her in her present surroundings.

Thus the state of profound lassitude into which her soul had fallen after the unaccustomed agitations of the last few days appeared to Bertha as a state of tranquillity that would be final…. And yet, only a short time later, when she was wending her way back to the town, the internal quietude gradually disappeared, and vague forebodings of fresh agitations and sorrows awoke within her.

The sight of a young couple who passed her, pressed close to one another under an open umbrella, aroused in her a yearning for Emil. She did not resist it, for she already realized that everything within her was in such a state of upheaval that every breath brought some fresh and generally unexpected thing on to the surface of her soul.

It was growing dusk when Bertha entered Herr Rupius' room. He was sitting at the table, with a portfolio of pictures before him. The hanging lamp was lighted.

He looked up and returned her greeting.

"Let me see; you, of course, came back from Vienna on the evening of the day before yesterday," he said.

It sounded like a reproach, and Bertha had a sensation of guilt.

"Well, sit down," he continued; "and tell me what happened to you in Vienna."

“Nothing at all,” answered Bertha. “I went to the Museum, and I have seen the originals of several of your pictures.”

Herr Rupius made no reply.

“Your wife is coming back this very evening?”

“I believe not” — he was silent for a time, and then said, with intentional dryness: “I must ask your pardon for having told you recently things which I am sure could not possibly have been of any interest to you. For the rest, I do not think that my wife will return to-day.”

“But…. She told me so herself, you know.”

“Yes, she told me also. She simply wanted to spare me the farewell, or rather the comedy of farewell. By that I don’t mean anything at all untruthful, but just the things which usually accompany farewells: touching words, tears…. However, enough of that. Will you be good enough to come and see me at times? I shall be rather lonely, you know, when my wife is no longer with me.”

All this he said in a tone the sharpness of which was so little in keeping with the meaning of his words that Bertha sought in vain for a reply.

Rupius, however, continued at once:

“Well, and what else did you see besides the Museum?”

With great animation, Bertha began to tell all sorts of things about her visit to Vienna. She also mentioned that she had met an old friend of her schooldays, whom she had not seen for a long time. Strangely, too, the meeting had taken place exactly in front of the Falckenborg picture.

While she was speaking of Emil in this way without mentioning his name, her yearning for him increased until it seemed boundless, and she thought of writing to him again that day.

Then she noticed that Herr Rupius was keeping his gaze fixed intently on the door. His wife had come into the room. She went up to him, smiling.

“Here I am, back again!” she said, kissing him on the forehead; and then she held out her hand to Bertha.

“Good evening, Frau Rupius,” said Bertha, highly delighted.

Herr Rupius spoke not a word, but signs of violent agitation could be seen on his face. His wife, who had not yet taken off her hat, turned away for a moment, and then Bertha noticed how Herr Rupius had rested his face on both his hands, and had begun to sob inwardly.

Bertha left them. She was glad that Frau Rupius had returned; it seemed to be something in the nature of a good omen. By an early hour on the morrow she might receive the letter which would, perhaps, decide her fate. Her sense of restfulness had again completely vanished, but her being was filled with a different yearning from that which she had experienced before. She wished only to have Emil there, near her; she would have liked only to see him, to walk by his side.

In the evening, after she had put her little boy to bed, she stopped on for a long time alone in the dining-room; she went to the piano and played a few chords, then she walked over to the window and gazed out into the darkness. The rain had ceased, the earth was imbibing the moisture, the clouds were still hanging heavily over the landscape.

Bertha’s whole being became imbued with yearning; everything within her called to him; her eyes sought to see him before her in the darkness; her lips breathed a kiss into the air, as though it could reach his lips; and, unconsciously, as if her wishes had to soar aloft, away from all else that surrounded her, she looked up to Heaven and whispered:

“Give him back to me!…”

Never had she been as at that moment. She had an impression that for the first time she now really loved him. Her love was free from all the elements which had previously disturbed it; there was no fear, no care, no doubt. Everything within her was the purest tenderness, and now, when a faint breeze came blowing and stirring the hair on her forehead, she felt as though it was a breath from the lips of Emil.

The next morning came, but no letter. Bertha was a little disappointed, but not disquieted. Soon Elly, who had suddenly acquired a great liking for playing with Fritz, made her appearance. The servant, on returning from the market, brought the news that the doctor had been summoned in the greatest haste to Herr Rupius' house, though she did not know whether it was Herr Rupius or his wife who was ill. Bertha decided to go and inquire herself without waiting until after dinner.

She gave the Mahlmaan twins their music lesson, feeling very absent-minded and nervous all the time, and then went to Herr Rupius' house. The servant told her that her mistress was ill in bed, but that it was nothing dangerous, although Doctor Friedrich had strictly forbidden that any visitors should be admitted. Bertha was frightened. She would have liked to speak to Herr Rupius, but did not wish to appear importunate.

In the afternoon she made an attempt at continuing Fritz's education, but, do what she could, she met with no success. Again, she had the impression that her own hopes were influenced by Anna having been taken ill; if Anna had been well, it would have surely happened also that the letter would have arrived by that time. She knew that such an idea was utter nonsense, but she could not resist it.

Soon after five o'clock she again set out to call on Herr Rupius. The maid admitted her. Herr Rupius himself wanted to speak to her. He was sitting in his easy-chair by the table.

"Well?" asked Bertha.

"The doctor is with her just at this moment — if you will wait a few minutes …"

Bertha did not venture to ask any questions, and both remained silent.
After a few seconds, Doctor Friedrich came out from the bedroom.

"Well, I cannot say anything definite yet," he said slowly; then, with a sudden resolution, he added: "Excuse me, Frau Garlan, but it is absolutely necessary for me to have a few words with Herr Rupius alone."

Herr Rupius winced.

"Then I won't disturb you," said Bertha mechanically, and she left them.

But she was so agitated that it was impossible for her to go home, and she walked along the pathway leading between the vine-trellises to the cemetery. She felt that something mysterious was happening in that house. The thought occurred to her that Anna might, perhaps, have made an attempt to commit suicide. If only she did not die, Bertha said to herself. And immediately the thought followed: if only a nice letter were to come from Emil!

She seemed to herself to be encompassed by nothing but dangers. She went into the cemetery. It was a beautiful, warm summer's day, and the flowers and blossoms were fragrant and fresh after the rain of the previous day. Bertha followed her accustomed path towards her husband's grave, but she felt that she had absolutely no object in going there. It was almost painful to her to read the words on the tombstone; they had no longer the least significance for her:

"Victor Mathias Garlan, died the 6th June, 1895."

It seemed to her, then, that any of her walks with Emil, which had happened ten years before, were nearer than the years she had spent by the side of her husband. Those years were as though they had not even existed … she would not have been able to believe in them if Fritz had not been alive…. Suddenly the idea passed through her mind that Fritz was not Garlan's son at all … perhaps he was really Emil's son…. Were not such things possible, after all?… And she felt at that moment that she could understand the doctrine of the Holy Ghost…. Then she was alarmed at the madness of her own thoughts.

She looked at the broad roadway, stretching straight from the cemetery gate to the opposite wall, and all at once she knew, for a positive fact, that in a few days a coffin, with the corpse of Frau Rupius within it, would be borne along that road. She wanted to banish the idea, but the picture was there in full detail; the hearse was standing before the gate; the grave, which two men were digging yonder just at that moment, was destined for Frau Rupius; Herr Rupius was waiting by the open grave. He was sitting in his invalid chair, his plaid rug across his knees, and was staring at the coffin, which the black-garbed undertakers were slowly carrying along…. The vision was more than a mere presentiment; it was a precognition…. But whence had this idea come to her?

Then she heard people talking behind her. Two women walked past her — one was the widow of a lieutenant-colonel who had recently died, the other was her daughter. Both greeted Bertha and walked slowly on. Bertha thought that these two women would consider her a faithful widow who still grieved for her husband, and she seemed to herself to be an impostor, and she retired hastily.

Possibly there would be some news awaiting her at home, a telegram from Emil, perhaps — though that, indeed, would be nothing extraordinary … after all, the two things were closely connected…. She wondered whether Frau Rupius still thought of what Bertha had told her at the railway station, and whether, perhaps, she would speak of it in her delirium … however, that was a matter of indifference, indeed. The only matters of importance were that Emil should write and that Frau Rupius should get better…. She would have to call again and see Herr Rupius; he would be sure to tell her what the doctor had had to say…. And Bertha hastened homewards between the vine-trellises down the hill….

Nothing had arrived, no letter, no telegram…. Fritz had gone out with the maid. Ah, how lonely she was. She hurried to Herr Rupius' house once more, and the maid opened the door to her. Things were progressing very badly, Herr Rupius was unable to see anyone….

"But what is the matter with her? Don't you know what the doctor said?"

"An inflammation, so the doctor said."

"What kind of an inflammation?"

"Or it might even be blood poisoning, he said. A nurse from the hospital will be here immediately."

Bertha went away. On the square in front of the restaurant a few people were sitting, and one table, right in front, was occupied by some officers, as was usual at that time of the day.

They didn't know what was going on up yonder, thought Bertha, otherwise they wouldn't be sitting there and laughing…. Blood poisoning — well, what could that mean?… Obviously Frau Rupius had attempted to commit suicide!… But why?… Because she was unable to go away — or did not wish to? — but she wouldn't die — no, she must not die!

Bertha called on her relatives, so as to pass the time. Only her sister-in-law was at home; she already knew that Frau Rupius had been taken ill, but that did not affect her very much, and she soon began to talk of other things. Bertha could not endure it, and took her departure.

In the evening she tried to tell Fritz stories, then she read the paper, in which, amongst other things, she found another announcement of the concert at which Emil was to play. It struck her as very strange that the concert was still an event which was announced to take place, and not one long since over.

She was unable to go to bed without making one more inquiry at Herr Rupius' house. She met the nurse in the anteroom. It was the one Doctor Friedrich always sent to his private patients. She had a cheerful-looking face, and a comforting expression in her eyes.

"The doctor will be sure to pull Frau Rupius through," she said.

And, although Bertha knew that the nurse was always making such observations, she felt more reassured.

She walked home, went to bed, and fell quietly asleep.

XI

THE NEXT MORNING Bertha was late in waking up. She was fresh after her good night's rest. A letter was lying beside the bed. And then, for the first time that morning, everything came back to her mind; Frau Rupius was very ill, and here was a letter from Emil. She seized it so hurriedly that she set the little candlestick shaking violently; she opened the envelope and read the letter.

"MY DEAR BERTHA,

"Many thanks for your nice letter. I was very pleased to get it. But I must tell you that your idea of coming to live permanently in Vienna requires again to be carefully considered by you. Circumstances here are quite different from what you seem to imagine. Even the native, fully accredited musicians have the greatest difficulty in obtaining pupils at anything like decent fees, and for you it would be — at the beginning, at least — almost a matter of impossibility. Where you are now you have your assured income, your circle of relations and friends, your home; and, finally, it is the place where you lived with your husband, where your child was born, and so it is the place where you ought to be.

"And, apart from all these considerations, it would be a very foolish procedure on your part to plunge into the exhausting struggle for a livelihood in the city. I purposely refrain from saying anything about the part which your affection for me (you know I return it with all my heart) seems to play in your proposals; to bring that in would carry the whole question over to another domain, and we must not let that happen. I will accept no sacrifice from you, under any condition. I need not assure you that I would like to see you again, and soon, too, for there is nothing I desire so much as to spend another such an hour with you as that which you recently gave me (and for which I am very grateful to you).

"So, then, arrange matters, my child, in such a way that, say, every four or six weeks you can come to Vienna for a day and a night. We will often be very happy again, I trust. I regret I cannot see you during the next few days, and, moreover, I start off on a tour immediately after the concert. I have to play in London during the season there, and after that I am going on to Scotland. So I look forward to the joyful prospect of meeting you again in the autumn.

"I greet you and kiss that sweet spot behind your ear, which I love best of all.

"Your

"EMIL."

When Bertha had read the letter to the end, for some little time she sat bolt upright in the bed. A shudder seemed to pass through her whole body. She was not surprised; she knew that she had expected no other kind of letter. She shook herself….

Every four or six weeks … excellent! Yes, for a day and a night…. It was shameful, shameful!… And how afraid he was that she might go to Vienna…. And then that observation right at the end, as if his object had been, while he was still at a safe distance, so to speak, to stimulate her senses, because that, forsooth, was the only kind of relations he desired to keep up with her…. It was shameful, shameful!… What sort of a woman had she been! She felt a loathing — loathing!…

She sprang out of bed and dressed herself…. Well, what was going to happen after that?… It was over, over, over! He had not time to spare for her — no time at all!… One night every, six weeks, after the autumn…. Yes, my dear sir, I at once accept your honourable proposals with pleasure. Indeed, for myself, I desire nothing better! I will go on turning sour; I will go on giving music lessons and growing imbecile in this hole of a town…. You will fiddle away, turn women's heads, travel, be rich, famous and happy — and every four or six weeks I may hope to be taken for one night to some shabby room where you entertain your women of the street…. It was shameful, shameful, shameful!…

Quick! She would get ready to go to Frau Rupius — Anna was ill, seriously ill — what mattered anything else?

Before she went out, Bertha pressed Fritz to her heart, and she recalled the passage in Emil's letter: it is the place where your child was born…. Indeed, that was quite right, too; but Emil had not said that because it was true, but only to avoid the danger of having to see her more than once in six weeks.

She hurried off…. How was it, then, that she did not feel any nervousness on Frau Rupius' account?… Ah, of course, she had known that Frau Rupius had been better the previous evening. But where was the letter, though?… She had again thrust it quite mechanically into her bodice.

Some officers were sitting in front of the restaurant having breakfast. They were all covered with dust, having just returned from the manoeuvres. One of them gazed after Bertha. He was a very young man, and could only have obtained his commission quite recently….

Pray, don't be afraid, thought Bertha. I am altogether at your disposal. I have an engagement which takes me into Vienna only once every four or six weeks … please, tell me when you would like …

The balcony door was open, the red velvet piano cover was hanging over the balustrade. Well, evidently order had been restored again — otherwise, would the cover have been hanging over the balustrade?… Of course not, so forward then, and upstairs without fear….

The maid opened the door. There was no need for Bertha to ask her any questions; in her wide-open eyes there was an expression of terrified amazement, such as is only called forth by the proximity of an appalling death.

Bertha went in. She entered the drawing-room first; the door leading to the bedroom was open to its full extent. The bed was standing in the middle of the room, away from the wall, and free on all sides. At the foot was sitting the nurse, looking very tired, with her head sunk upon her breast, Herr Rupius was sitting in his invalid's chair by the head of the bed. The room was so dark that it was not until Bertha had come quite close that she could see Anna's face clearly. Frau Rupius seemed to be asleep. Bertha came nearer. She could hear the patient's breathing; it was regular, but inconceivably rapid — she had never heard a human being breathe like that before. Then Bertha felt that the eyes of the two others were fixed upon her. Her surprise at having been admitted in this unceremonious manner lasted only for a moment, since she understood that all precautionary measures had now become superfluous; the matter had been decided.

Suddenly another pair of eyes turned towards Bertha. Frau Rupius opened her eyes, and was watching her friend attentively. The nurse made room for Bertha, and went into the adjoining room. Bertha sat down, moving her chair closer to the bed. She noticed that Anna was slowly stretching out her hand towards her. She grasped it.

"Dear Frau Rupius," she said, "you are already getting on much better now, are you not?"

She felt that she was again saying something awkward, but she knew she could not help doing so. It was just her fate to say such things in the presence of Frau Rupius, even in her last hour.

Anna smiled; she looked as pale and young as a girl.

"Thank you, dear Bertha," she said.

"But whatever for, my dear, dear Anna?"

She had the greatest difficulty in restraining her tears. At the same time, however, she was very curious to hear what had actually happened.

A long interval of silence ensued. Anna closed her eyes again and appeared to sleep. Herr Rupius sat motionless in his chair. Bertha looked sometimes at Anna and sometimes at him.

In any case, she must wait, she thought. She wondered what Emil would say if she were suddenly to die. Ah, surely it would cause him some slight grief if he had to think that she whom he had held in his arms a few days before now lay mouldering in the grave. He might even weep. Yes, he would weep if she were to die … wretched egoist though he was at other times….

Ah, but where were her thoughts flying to again? Wasn't she still holding her friend's hand in her own? Oh, if she could only save her!… Who was now in the worse plight — this woman who was doomed to die, or Bertha herself — who had been so ignominiously deceived? Was it necessary, though, to put it so strongly as that, because of one night?… Ah, but that had much too fine a sound!… for the sake of one hour — to humiliate her so — to ruin her so — was not that unscrupulous and shameless?… How she hated him! How she hated him!… If only he were to break down at the next concert, so that all the people would laugh him to scorn, and he would be put to shame, and all the papers would have the news— "The career of Herr Emil Lindbach is absolutely ended." And all his women would say: "Ah, I don't like that a bit, a fiddler who breaks down!"…

Yes, then he would probably remember her, the only woman who had loved him since the days of her girlhood, who loved him truly … and whom he was now treating so basely!… Then he would be sure to come back to her and beg her to forgive him — and she would say to him: "Do you see, Emil; do you see, Emil?"… for, naturally, anything more intelligent than that would not occur to her….

And there she was thinking again of him, always of him — and here somebody was dying, and she was sitting by the bed, and that silent person there was the husband…. It was all so quiet; only from the street, as though wafted up over the balcony and through the open door, came a confused murmur — men's voices, the rumble of the traffic, the jingle of a cyclist's bell, the clattering of a sabre on the pavement, and, now and then, the twitter of the birds — but it all seemed so far away, so utterly unconnected with actuality.

Anna became restless and tossed her head to and fro — several times, quickly, quicker and quicker….

"Now it's beginning!" said a soft voice behind Bertha.

She turned round. It was the nurse with the cheerful features; but Bertha now perceived that that expression did not denote cheerfulness at all, but was only the result of a strained effort never to allow sorrow to be noticeable, and she considered the face to be indescribably fearful…. What was it the nurse had said?… "Now it's beginning."… Yes, like a concert or a play … and Bertha remembered that once the same words had been spoken beside her own bed, at the time when she began to feel the pangs of childbirth….

Suddenly Anna opened her eyes, opened them very wide, so that they appeared immense; she fixed them on her husband, and, vainly striving, meanwhile, to raise herself up, said in a quite clear voice:

"It was only you, only you … believe me, it was only you whom I have…"

The last word was unintelligible, but Bertha guessed it.

Then Herr Rupius bent down, and kissed the dying woman on the forehead.
Anna threw her arms around him; his lips lingered long on her eyes.

The nurse had gone out of the room again. Suddenly Anna pushed her husband away from her; she no longer recognized him; delirium had set in.

Bertha rose to her feet in great alarm, but she remained standing by the bed.

"Go now!" said Herr Rupius to her.

She lingered.

"Go!" he repeated, this time in a stern voice.

Bertha realized that she must go. She left the room quietly on tip-toes, as though Anna might still be disturbed by the sound of footsteps. Just as she entered the adjoining room she saw Doctor Friedrich, who was taking off his overcoat and, at the same time, was talking to a young doctor, the assistant at the hospital.

He did not notice Bertha, and she heard him say:

"In any other case I would have notified the authorities, but, as this affair falls out as it does…. Besides, there would be a terrible scandal, and poor Rupius would be the worst sufferer—" then he saw Bertha—"Good day, Frau Garlan."

"Oh, doctor, what is really the matter, then?"

Doctor Friedrich threw his colleague a rapid glance.

"Blood poisoning," he replied. "You are, of course, aware, my dear Frau Garlan, that people often cut their fingers and die as a result; the wound cannot always he located. It is a great misfortune…. Yes, indeed!"

He went into the room, followed by the assistant.

Bertha went into the street like one stupified. What could be the meaning of the words which she had overheard— "information?"— "scandal?" Yes, had Herr Rupius, perhaps, murdered his own wife?… No, what nonsense! But some injury had been done to her, it was quite obvious … and it must have been, in some way, connected with the visit to Vienna; for she had been taken ill during the night subsequent to her journey…. And the words of the dying woman recurred to Bertha: "It was only you, only you whom I have loved!…" Had they not sounded like a prayer for forgiveness? "Loved only you" — but … another … of course, she had a lover in Vienna…. Well, yes, but what followed?… Yes, she had wished to go away, and had not done so after all…. What could it have been that she said on that occasion at the railway station?… "I have made up my mind to do something else."… Yes, of course, she had taken leave of her lover in Vienna, and, on her return — had poisoned herself?… But why should she do that, though, if she loved only her husband?… And that was not a lie, certainly not!

Bertha could not understand….

Why ever had she gone away, then?… What should she do now, too?… She could not rest. She could neither go home nor to her relatives, she must go back again…. She wondered, too, whether Anna would have to die if another letter from Emil came that day?… In truth, she was losing her reason…. Of course, these two things had not the least connection between them … and yet … why was she unable to dissociate them one from the other?…

Once more she hurried up the steps. Not a quarter of an hour had elapsed since she had left the house. The hall door was open, the nurse was in the anteroom.

"It is all over," she said.

Bertha went on. Herr Rupius was sitting by the table, all alone; the door leading to the death-chamber was closed. He made Bertha come quite close to him, then he seized the hand which she stretched out to him.

"Why, why did she do it?" he said. "Why did she do that?"

Bertha was silent.

"It wasn't necessary," continued Herr Rupius, "Heaven knows, it wasn't necessary. What difference could the other men make to me — tell me that?"

Bertha nodded.

"The main point is to live — yes, that is it! Why did she do that?"

It sounded like a suppressed wail, although he seemed to be speaking very quietly. Bertha burst into tears.

"No, it wasn't necessary! I would have brought it up — brought it up as my own child!"

Bertha looked up sharply. All at once she understood everything, and a terrible fear ran through her whole being. She thought of herself. If in that night she also … in that one hour?… So great was her terror that she believed that she must be losing her reason. What had hitherto been scarcely more than a vague possibility floating through her mind now loomed suddenly before her, an indisputable certainty. It could not possibly be otherwise, the death of Anna was an omen, the pointing of the finger of God.

At the same time there arose within her mind the recollection of the day, twelve years ago, when she had been walking with Emil on the bank of the Wien, and he had kissed her and for the first time she had felt an ardent yearning for a child. How was it that she had not experienced the same yearning when, recently, she felt his arms about her?… Yes, she knew now; she had desired nothing more than the pleasures of the moment; she had been no better than a woman of the streets. It would be only the just punishment of Heaven if she also perished in her shame, like the poor woman lying in the next room.

"I would like to see her once more," she said.

Rupius pointed towards the door. Bertha opened it, went up slowly to the bed on which lay the body of the dead woman, gazed upon her friend for a long time, and kissed her on both eyes. Then a sense of unequalled restfulness stole over her. She would have liked to have remained beside the corpse for hours together, for, in proximity to it, her own sorrow and disappointment became as nothing to her. She knelt down by the bed and clasped her hands, but she did not pray.

All at once everything danced before her eyes. Suddenly a well-known attack of weakness came over her, a dizziness which passed off immediately. At first she trembled slightly, but then she drew a deep breath, as one who has been rescued, because, indeed, with the approach of that lassitude, she felt at the same time that, at that moment, not only her previous apprehensions, but all the illusion of that confused day, the last tremors of the desires of womanhood, everything which she had considered to be love, had begun to merge and to fade away into nothingness. And kneeling by the death-bed, she realized that she was not one of those women who are gifted with a cheerful temperament and can quaff the joys of life without trepidation. She thought with disgust of that hour of pleasure that had been granted her, and, in comparison with the purity of that yearning kiss, the recollection of which had beautified her whole existence, the shameless joys which she then had tasted seemed to her like an immense falsehood.

The relations which had existed between the paralysed man in the room beyond and this woman, who had had to die for her deceit, seemed now to be spread out before her with wonderful clearness. And, while she gazed upon the pallid brow of the dead woman she could not help thinking of the unknown man, on account of whom Anna had had to die, and who, exempt from punishment, and, perhaps, remorseless, too, dared to go about in a great town and to live on, like any other — no, like thousands and thousands of others who had stared at her with covetous, indecent glances. Bertha divined what an enormous wrong had been wrought against the world in that the longing for pleasure is placed in woman just as in man: and that with women that longing is a sin, demanding expiation, if the yearning for pleasure is not at the same time a yearning for motherhood.

She rose, threw a last farewell glance at her dearly loved friend, and left the death-chamber.

Herr Rupius was sitting in the adjoining room, exactly as she had left him. She was seized with a profound desire to speak some words of consolation to him. For a moment it seemed to her as though her own destiny had only had this one purpose: to enable her fully to understand the misery of that man. She would have liked to have been able to tell him so, but she felt that he was one of those who desire to be alone with their sorrow. And so, without speaking, she sat down opposite to him.

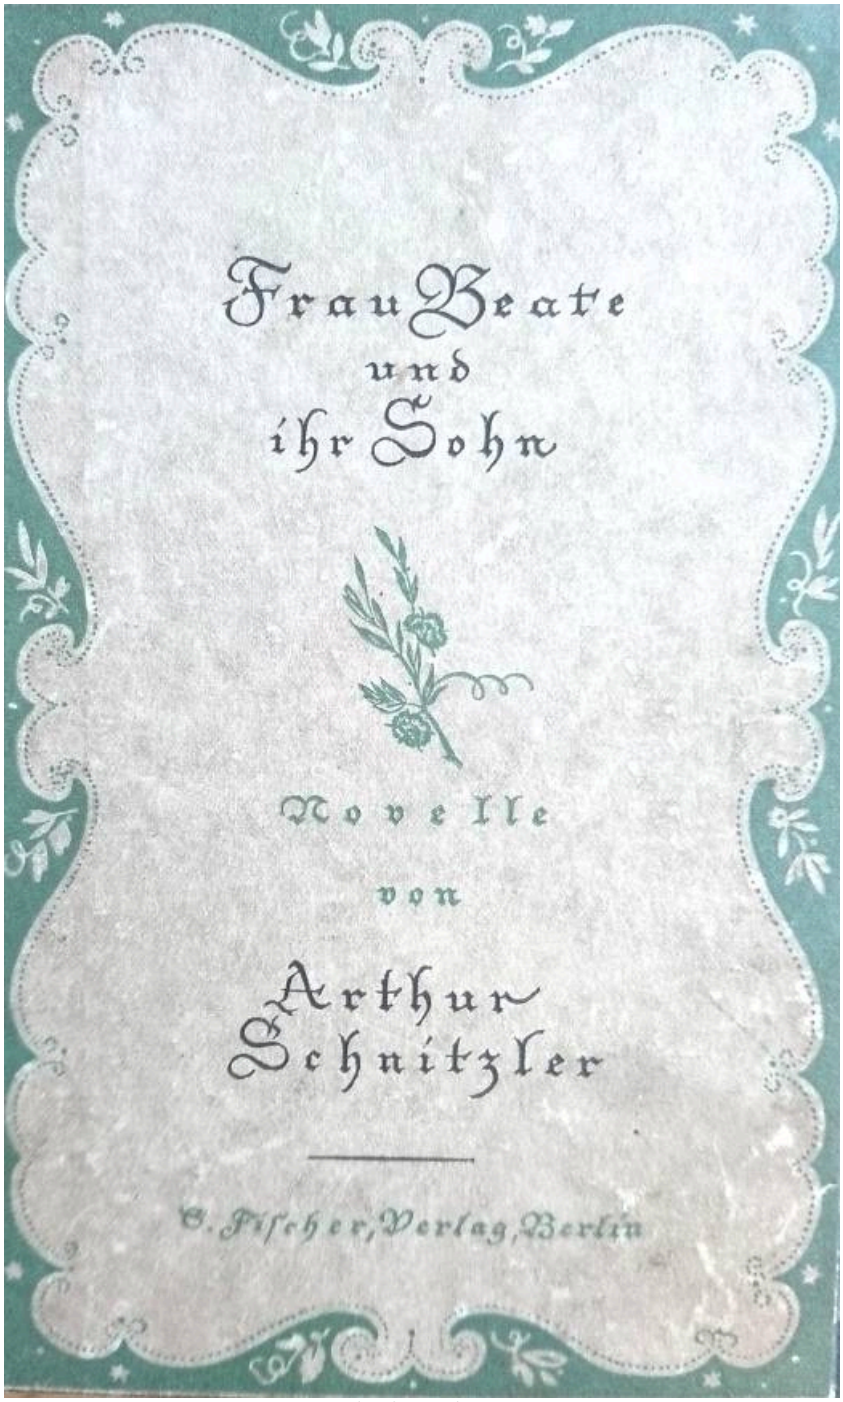
Beatrice (1913)

Original German Title: 'Frau Beate und ihr Sohn'



Translated by Agnes Jacques, 1926

The second instalment of the 'Woman' trilogy, Frau Beate und ihr Sohn first appeared in the literary journal Die neue Rundschau in Berlin between February and April 1913. In the same year, the publisher S. Fischer released it as a book. It tells the story of the widow Beate Heinold, who after five years of sexual abstinence, gives in to the advances of a young admirer, but is unable to resolve the conflicts arising from her own expectations and societal norms.

Beate (Beatrice in the translation) is the widow of the celebrated actor Ferdinand Heinold and lives with her son Hugo in a villa on a lake in the Salzkammergut region. To prevent her son from being permanently disappointed by an unhappy love affair, Beate visits Baroness Fortunata, a neighbour whom she suspects of having an erotic interest in him. She tells the Baroness to her face that she is against Hugo becoming her lover. The Baroness feigns ignorance, but promises Beate she will not encourage her son. Beate recalls a similar conversation she had with her husband's then-mistress, who was hoping to win him over and marry him.

Beate is desired by the married bank director Welponer, as well as a young doctor and an older lawyer. She enjoys their attentions, even though she rejects their advances, some subtle, some direct. Young Fritz, a school friend of Hugo's, arrives and is warmly invited by the Heinolds to stay at the villa. Fritz, too, desires Beate. During Hugo's night-time absence, Fritz, after Beate's initial resistance, ends up in her "desiring arms." Although she intends to end the affair quickly, she visibly blossoms. From Fritz, she learns that not only Hugo is apparently having a fling with the Baroness, but that her deceased husband is also rumored to have had an affair with the bank director's wife. She also has to admit to herself that she has been unfaithful to her husband, not physically, but in her mind. Alone, she wavers between erotic fantasies, thoughts of escape and death fantasies.

Some critics have identified a theme of incest in the novel, interpreting Beate's own son as the true object of her erotic interest, which casts the opening conversation between her and the Baroness in a new light, namely under the motive of jealousy. As in the first novel of the trilogy, Frau Berta Garlan (1900), there is the recurring theme of the power of sexuality, experienced by the protagonists and the resulting conflicts of norms that the women have to work through. Both narratives are also connected by the meticulous development of psychological conflict that often features prominently in many of the author's works. The implied story of incest, which originates with the mother, outraged Catholic readers at the time and made Schnitzler a controversial figure to many of his readers.

Schnitzler, close to the time of publication

PREFACE

Beatrice, written in 1913, but presented now in English for the first time, is the second of Schnitzler's woman trilogy, which includes Bertha Garlan (1900) and Fräulein Else (1925). The heroines of these novels spring from a common root — good Austrian upper middle-class, where situations such as they must face are entirely unprecedented. Intellectually these three women are strikingly similar — they are able to view their anguish with detachment, impersonally and without illusion.

In one particular Beatrice differs from her sisters. While they are partly the victims of circumstance, yet they have voluntarily chosen their careers. But Beatrice is driven on to her destruction, powerless to stem the tide which she sees engulfing her. Mother-love, so strong in her, only enhances her despair, but does not help her meet the onslaught of desire. The utter realization of her plight, coupled with a complete paralysis of will, is the root of Beatrice's tragedy. In Beatrice Schnitzler is a fatalist — here sex is an external force — relentless, uncontrollable, and overwhelming.

In his woman trilogy, the author is a different Schnitzler from the one to whom we have become accustomed through Anatol and Reigen and Liebelei. His prose is just as gracious, his wit as ironic, his portraiture of men and women, as cruelly frank. But to these qualities he has added a veil of sadness, a tenderness, an uncanny penetration into the finest shadings of feminine thought and emotion that will make these novels stand out long after the hard brilliance of Reigen will cease to dazzle the mind.

I should like to make acknowledgment to Miss Edna Staudinger for her invaluable assistance in the proof-reading and final revision of this book.

PART ONE

SHE THOUGHT SHE heard a sound in the next room. She left her half-finished letter, went softly towards the partly open door and peered into the darkened room, where her son lay fast asleep on the divan. As she stepped inside, she could see how Hugo's breast rose and fell regularly in the healthy sleep of youth. His soft, rather crumpled collar lay open at his throat; he was fully clothed, even to the heavy spiked boots which he always wore in the country. Obviously he had intended to lie down for just a short time during the heat of midday, and then to resume his studies, for his books and papers lay open around him. Now he threw his head from side to side as if trying to awaken, but he only stirred a little and slept on. The mother's eyes, by this time accustomed to the darkness, could no longer ignore the fact that the strange, painfully intent expression around the boy's lips that she had noticed again and again during the past days, did not leave him even in sleep. Beatrice sighed and shook her head. Then she went back to her room, shutting the door quietly behind her. She looked at the letter, but had no desire to go on with it. Dr Teichmann, for whom it was intended, was certainly not the man with whom she could speak unreservedly — in fact, she already regretted the all too friendly smile with which she had bidden him farewell from the train. For just now, during these summer weeks in the country, the memory of her husband, who had died five years before, was more than ever alive within her, and she laid aside all thoughts of the lawyer's wooing and the proposal of marriage — which he had not yet made, but which was bound to come — together with all similar thoughts concerning her own future. She felt she could speak of her concern for Hugo least of all with the man who would see in it not so much a proof of confidence as a definite sign of encouragement. Therefore she destroyed the letter and went irresolutely to the window.

The line of mountains across the lake dissolved in tremulous rings of air. Below, in the water, sparkled the reflection of the sun, broken into a thousand rays. Beatrice turned away her eyes, blinded by the light, after casting a fleeting glance over the narrow meadow land, the dust-exhaling country road, the blinking roofs of the villas, and the motionless field of young corn in her garden. Her glance rested on the white bench under her window — and she recalled the many times when her husband had sat there dreaming over some rôle, or dozing, especially when the air was so redolent of summer as it was to-day. She remembered how she would lean over the sill to stroke the grey-black curly hair and run her fingers tenderly through it, till Ferdinand, who though immediately awake, but feigning sleep so that he might not interrupt her caresses, would slowly turn around and look up at her with his bright child's eyes, which could look so heroic or heavy with death on those long ago, but never to be forgotten, magic evenings. She loved to think of those times, though she knew she should not, certainly not with those sighs which in spite of herself came from her lips. For Ferdinand himself — in the days that were past, he had made her swear to it — wanted his memory to be celebrated only by pleasant recollections, and by an untroubled acceptance of new happiness. And Beatrice thought: "How dreadful it is to think that we could speak of such horror in such bright times, jokingly and lightly, as if it concerned only others and could never fall upon us. And then when it really comes, we do not grasp it — and yet we endure it — and time passes, and we live on, and we sleep in the same bed that we shared once with our beloved, drink out of the same glass that he touched with his lips, pick strawberries in the shade of the same pine where we picked them with one who will never pick them again — and still we never quite understand either the meaning of death or life." She had often sat on this bench at Ferdinand's side, while the child, followed by the loving glances of his parents, had romped in the garden with ball or hoop. But as well as she knew in her mind that that Hugo who lay asleep there on the divan, with the new painful expression around his mouth, was the same child that played in the garden but a few years ago, in her heart she could not comprehend it any more than that Ferdinand was dead — more truly dead than Hamlet or Cyrano or King Richard in whose masks she had so often seen him die. But that she would probably never quite grasp, for between the bright full present and the dark mystery of death, there had not even elapsed weeks or days of suffering. Healthy and happy, Ferdinand had left the house one day to attend a theatrical performance, and within an hour they had brought him back from the railroad station, where the stroke had felled him.

While Beatrice clung to these memories, in her heart she felt all the time some other ghostly tormenting thing which awaited her solution. It was only after much meditation, that she knew that the last sentence in her unfinished letter, in which she had wanted to mention Hugo, would not leave her in peace, and that she must think it through to the end. It was clear to her that something either had happened or was about to happen to Hugo, something she had long awaited, but still had not considered possible. In earlier years, when he was still a child, she had dearly cherished the thought that later she would be not only mother, but friend and confidante to her boy — and till just recently, when he would come to her with his tales of school mishaps or to confess his first boyish love affairs, she dared imagine that her wish might be gratified. Had he not let her read those touching childish verses which he had written to little Elise Weber, the sister of a school friend of his, and which Elise herself had never seen? And even last winter, had he not told his mother that a little girl, whose name he gallantly kept secret, had kissed him on the cheek during a dance? And last spring, had he not come to her much disturbed to tell her of two boys in his class who had spent an evening at the Prater in questionable company, and who had boasted of coming home at three in the morning? And so Beatrice had dared hope that Hugo would choose her as confidante in his more serious emotional experiences, and that she would be able by encouragement and advice to keep him from the many sorrows and dangers of youth. But now she saw that these had been the dreams of an over-indulgent mother's heart, for at the first real conflict of the soul, Hugo showed himself strange and taciturn and his mother remained shy and helpless before these new events.

She shuddered, for at the first breath of wind, like a sneering confirmation of the fear in her heart, she saw down in the valley the hated white banner fluttering from the roof of the bright villa on the lake shore. Rippling jauntily, it waved the importunate restless greeting of a depraved woman to the boy whom she wanted to ruin. In spite of herself, Beatrice raised a menacing hand, then hurried back into the room in eager haste to see her son and have it out with him at once. She listened at the connecting door for a moment, for she did not want to awaken him from his good sleep, and she thought she heard his regular boyish breathing as before. Carefully she opened the door, intending to await Hugo's awakening, and then, sitting beside him on the divan, with motherly tact to win his secret from him. But, to her astonishment, she discovered that Hugo was no longer there. He had gone out without saying even adieu to his mother, as he had always done before, and without the accustomed farewell kiss — evidently he, too, feared the question which for days had been visible on her lips and which, as she knew now for the first time, she had expected to put to him at that moment. Was he already so far from her, already torn away by restless desire? That was what the first hand-clasp of that woman had made of him, when he met her recently on the wharf. That was what her look had done to him yesterday, when she smilingly greeted him from the gallery of the swimming pool, as his glowing boyish body had come swimming up out of the waves. Of course — he was more than seventeen, and she had never imagined that he would be spared for one certain girl who was destined for him from the beginning of time, and who would meet him as young and pure as he himself was. But only this had she wished for him: that his youth should not fall a victim to the lust of such a woman, who owed her half-forgotten stage reputation only to a glittering wantonness, and whose life and calling had not been changed even by her late marriage.

Beatrice sat on Hugo's divan in the half-darkened room, her eyes closed, her head in her hands, deliberating. Where might Hugo be? With the Baroness perhaps? That was unbelievable. These things could not develop so rapidly. But was there still any possibility of saving her beloved boy from this miserable affair? She was afraid not. For indeed she had forebodings: just as Hugo had the features of his father, so did his father's blood run through his veins, that dark blood of those men from a different world, a lawless world, where boys were inflamed with the dark passions of men, while their eyes even in maturity gleamed with childish dreams. Was it only the father's blood? Did hers run more coolly? Dared she say that, simply because since the death of her husband no temptation had come to her? And because she had never belonged to another, was what she had once told her husband therefore any less true: that he alone had filled her whole life for her, because when his features were veiled by night, he represented many different characters to her — because in his arms she was the beloved of King Richard and Cyrano and Hamlet and all the others whose rôles he played — the beloved of heroes and scoundrels, the blessed and the damned, the naive and the sophisticated. In fact, in her early girlhood had she not wished to be the wife of the actor because union with him offered the only possibility for her to live the decorous life which her bourgeois upbringing had intended her for, and at the same time to lead the wild adventurous existence for which she longed in her secret dreams? And she remembered how she had taken Ferdinand not only against the wishes of her parents, whose pious bourgeois minds could not quite overcome a slight repugnance at the thought of the actor, even after her marriage had been consummated, but how she had won him besides from a much more dangerous enemy. For at the time when she met Ferdinand, he was in the midst of a liaison (which was no secret in the town) with a not very young but wealthy widow, who had assisted him greatly in his early days and who had often paid his debts. It was only lack of will power that kept him bound to her. It was then that Beatrice had made the romantic decision to free her hero from such unworthy bondage and to dissolve the ties of a relationship which, owing to its unstable foundation, was bound to break sooner or later, but which she feared might come too late for the good of the artist and his art. It was a never-to-be-forgotten occasion for her, and although she received a half insulting and joking refusal which she never forgot, and though it was a whole year till Ferdinand was really finally freed, still she could not doubt that that conversation was the first step towards the break. In fact her husband did the story full justice and boasted of it proudly even to people who were not in the least concerned.

Beatrice removed her hands from her eyes, and stood up in sudden passion. Almost twenty years lay between that madly bold adventure and the present — but had she become a different creature since then? Did she not dare to trust herself to steer the course of one who was so dear to her, as she saw fit? Was she the woman to stand humbly by, while her son's young life was being besmirched and broken, instead of acting as she had formerly acted with the other? She would go to-day to the Baroness, who after all was only a woman and must have somewhere, though it be in the nethermost corner of her soul, some understanding of the meaning of motherhood. And happy in her sudden decision, which came to her like a beam of light, she went to the window, opened the blinds, and, full of new hope, she greeted as a good omen the charming landscape before her eyes. And she felt that she must carry out her sudden decision immediately, while her determination was fresh and strong. Without further hesitation, she went into her bedroom and rang for her maid, whom she bade be especially careful in helping her dress that day. As soon as this was done to her satisfaction, she put on her broad-brimmed panama hat with its narrow black band, over her dark-blonde, thickly waved hair, chose the freshest of three red roses from a vase on her night table, slipped it into her white leather belt, took her slender mountain cane in her hand, and left the house. She felt young, happy, and sure of the outcome of her mission.

As she stepped out of the door, she saw Herr and Frau Arbesbacher at the garden gate. He was in a waterproof shooting jacket and leather breeches; she wore a dark flowered cotton gown which, in style and cut, was too matronly for her rather careworn but still youngish face.

"Greetings, Frau Heinold," called out the architect, raising his green Tyrolean hat with its cockade of goat's hair, and holding it in his hand so that his white head remained uncovered for a moment. "We have just come to call for you." And to her inquiring look: "Have you forgotten that to-day is Thursday, the day of the tarock party at the Director's?"

"Yes, that is so," said Beatrice, remembering.

"We just met your son," remarked Frau Arbesbacher, and over her faded features passed a tired smile.

"He went up that way, with two thick books under his arm," finished the architect, pointing to the path which led over the sunny meadow, upwards toward the wood. "An industrious boy!"

Beatrice smiled in unrestrained happiness. "Next year he will finish the 'gymnasium,'" she said.

"How pretty Frau Heinold looks to-day," remarked Frau Arbesbacher naively, in a voice that was almost humble with surprise.

"Yes, how are we going to feel, Frau Beatelinde, when we suddenly find we have a grown son who fights duels and turns the heads of the women?"

"But did you fight duels?" interrupted his wife.

"Oh, well, I've had my little battles. Those things come of themselves. You get into trouble either way."

They walked along the road, which with its splendid view of the lake, led up past the town to the villa of Herr Welponer, Bank Director.

"Well — here I seem to be going along with you, when instead I should go down to the village first — to the post-office — in regard to a package which was sent from Vienna a week ago, and has not yet arrived. And it was sent special delivery too," she added naturally, as if she believed the story which she had so suddenly invented, she knew not why.

"Perhaps it will come on this train — your package," said Frau Arbesbacher, pointing down below where the little train came puffing pompously from behind the cliffs, up to the station, which was slightly elevated from the meadow land. Travellers put their heads out of the windows, and Herr Arbesbacher waved his hat.

"What are you doing?" asked his wife.

"There are surely friends of ours among them, and one must be polite,"

"Well, then, auf Wiedersehen," said Beatrice suddenly. "I'll come up directly, of course. Take them my greetings in the meantime."

She departed quickly and went down the road she had just ascended. She felt that the architect and his wife, who had remained standing on the road, followed her with their eyes almost to the villa which Arbesbacher had built for his friend and hunting companion, Ferdinand Heinold.

Here Beatrice took the narrow wagon road which led steeply past unassuming country houses to the town, but she had to wait before crossing the tracks, for the train was just leaving the station. Now she realized that she really had nothing to do at the post-office, but had much more important work — to speak with the Baroness. But now that she knew her son was in the woods with his books, that did not seem so pressing as it had seemed an hour earlier. She crossed the tracks to the station and found the usual excitement which follows the arrival of a train. The two omnibuses from the Lake Hotel and the Posthof were just rumbling away with their passengers. Other arrivals, high-voiced and excited, followed by porters, and happy-go-lucky picnickers, crossed Beatrice's path. She watched in amusement a whole family, father, mother, three children, nurse, and maid, trying to get into one cab, together with trunks, satchels, bags, umbrellas, and canes, and a snapping little fox-terrier. From another cab, a young married couple — friends of the year before — waved to her with the irresistible good spirits of summer resorters. A young man in a light grey summer suit, a very new yellow leather bag in his hand, raised his straw hat to Beatrice. She did not recognize him and greeted him coolly.

"How do you do, Frau Heinold," said the stranger, shifting his bag from one hand to the other and awkwardly offering Beatrice his free right one.

"Why, Fritzl!" cried Beatrice, suddenly recognizing him.

"Certainly, Frau Heinold, it's I — Fritzl himself!"

"Do you know — I really did not know you. You've become quite a dandy."

"Well, that's not so bad, is it?" answered Fritz, changing his bag back again to the other hand. "But didn't Hugo receive my card?"

"I don't know, but he told me recently that he was expecting you."

"Naturally, it was arranged in Vienna that I should come here for a few days from Ischl. But yesterday I wrote expressly that I expected to arrive this afternoon."

"In any case, he will be very happy. Where are you staying, Herr Weber?"

"No, no, please, Frau Heinold — don't say Herr Weber."

"Well then, where — Herr — Fritz?"

"I sent my trunk on in advance to the Posthof, but as soon as I have seen to my affairs, I shall be free to make my headquarters at the Villa Beatrice."

"Villa Beatrice? There is no villa by that name here."

"But what else can it be called when a person with such a charming name lives in it?"

"It has no name — I don't like such things — No. 7 Oak Road is its name — see — there it is — up there — with the green balcony—"

Fritz Weber looked thoughtfully in the direction designated. "The view must be delightful — But I shall not stop longer now. In an hour I shall find Hugo at home, I hope?"

"I believe so. Just now he is in the woods studying."

"Studying, is he? Well, we shall have to cure him of that habit as soon as possible."

"Oho!"

"You see, I want to take trips with him. Do you know that I climbed the Dachstein recently?"

"Unfortunately not, Herr Weber. It was really not in the newspapers."

"But, please — not Herr Weber."

"I'm afraid it will have to be that, since I'm neither your aunt nor governess."

"An aunt like you might not be a bad thing to have."

"Dear me, what a gallant gentleman he is — and at his age too." She laughed aloud; and instead of the well-dressed young man, the boy suddenly stood before her, the child whom she had known since he was twelve; and his little blonde moustache looked as if it were pasted to his lip. "Well, then, auf Wiedersehen, Fritzl," she said, holding out her hand. "This evening at supper you'll tell us about your Dachstein party, won't you?"

Fritz bowed a trifle stiffly, then kissed Beatrice's hand, which she allowed as if in submission to the quick passing of time. Then he went away with heightened self-respect, which was evident from his carriage and walk. "And he," thought Beatrice, "he is the friend of my Hugo. Of course he is a bit older — about a year and a half or two, at least. He was always in a higher class than Hugo at school," Beatrice remembered, "and he had to repeat one year." In any case, she was glad that he was there and expected to go on excursions with Hugo — if she could only send the two boys immediately on a two weeks' walking tour! Ten hours' walking a day, with the mountain wind blowing through one's hair — evenings to fall exhausted on a straw pallet, and in the morning to start again with the sun! How excellent and wholesome that was! She was tempted to go with them. But that would not do. The boys would not wish to have an aunt or governess with them. She sighed gently and passed her hand over her forehead.

She walked down the street which ran along the lake. The little steamboat had just left the landing and was floating sprucely and brightly across the water toward the place known as Grassy Meadow, where a few quiet houses lay almost hidden under the chestnut and fruit trees, and where it was already almost dark. On the diving-board over the swimming pool, a lonely figure in a white bath-robe bobbed up and down. There were still some swimmers in the lake. "They are enjoying themselves more than I," thought Beatrice, looking enviously at the water from which came a cool peace-bringing breath. But she quickly turned the temptation from her, and in firm determination continued on her way, until she unexpectedly found herself before the villa where Baroness Fortunata was living this summer. Through the commonplace garden of bright mallow and gillyflowers, she could see the veranda extending all along the front of the house, and she caught the shimmer of white dresses shining through. Her eyes fixed straight ahead, Beatrice walked on past the white fence. To her shame, she felt her heart beating wildly. The sound of women's voices came to her ear. Beatrice hastened her steps and suddenly found herself beyond the house. She decided to go first to the village grocery, where she usually had some purchases to make, and especially to-day, as she expected a guest for supper. In a few minutes she was in Anton Meissenbichler's shop, had bought cold meat, fruit, and cheese, and had given little Lisle the package and a tip with instructions to deliver it at once to Oak Road. "And now what?" she asked herself as she stood outside in the church square, facing the open cemetery gate, where the gilded crosses glimmered reddish in the afternoon sunlight. Should she let her plans fall through merely because her heart had begun to beat faster? Never would she be able to forgive such weakness. And the punishment of fate — she felt it — would be upon her. Then there was nothing left to do, but to go back — and without further delay — back to the Baroness.

In a few moments Beatrice was down at the lake shore. Now she passed by the Lake Hotel, on whose high terrace guests sat drinking coffee or ices, then past two huge modern villas that she detested — and two seconds later her eyes met those of the Baroness, who lay on the veranda on a chaiselongue under a white sun-shade trimmed in red. Leaning against the wall, stood another woman, like a statue, with an ivory yellow face, in a billowy white dress. Fortunata had been speaking gaily, but now she was suddenly silent, and her features hardened. But her look immediately softened again, and she broke into a smile of greeting that glowed with genuine friendliness and welcome. "You jade," thought Beatrice, a bit indignant at her own expression. And she girded herself for the struggle. Fortunata's voice rang too happy in her ears. "How do you do, Frau Heinold."

"How do you do," answered Beatrice in a voice that could scarcely be heard, and as if she cared little whether her greeting reached the veranda or not. Then she pretended to go on.

"Apparently you are out for a sun and dust bath to-day, Frau Heinold." Beatrice did not doubt that Fortunata had only said this in order to start a conversation with her. For the friendship between these two was so superficial, that the joking tone did not seem particularly in place. Many years ago Beatrice had met the young actress, Fortunata Schon, a colleague of Ferdinand's, at a theatre party, and in the good fellowship of that festive evening the young couple had sat at the same table with her and her lover of that time, and had had supper and drunk champagne together. Later, there had been fleeting meetings in the theatre or on the street, but these had never led to real conversation even of a moment's duration. Eight years ago, after her marriage to the Baron, Fortunata had left the stage and disappeared from Beatrice's vision until she had met her accidentally, here at the watering-place a few weeks ago; and after that meeting, since she could hardly avoid it, she had exchanged a few words with her on the street, in the woods, or while bathing. But to-day it pleased Beatrice that the Baroness herself seemed disposed to start a conversation and so she answered as indifferently as possible:

"A sun bath? — The sun has already set, and in the evening it's not as sultry near the lake as up above in the wood."

Fortunata had stood up; she leaned her slender, well-formed little figure over the railing and answered quickly that for her part she preferred walks in the wood, and that she found especially the one to the Hermitage quite impressive.

"What a stupid word," thought Beatrice, and asked politely why the Baroness had not taken a villa at the edge of the forest, since she preferred it.

The Baroness explained that she, or rather her husband, had rented the house from an advertisement, and that besides, she was quite well satisfied in every respect. "But why not end your walk, and drink a cup of tea with me and my friend?" And without awaiting an answer, she went toward Beatrice, gave her a smooth, white, somewhat restless hand, and led her with exaggerated friendliness to the veranda, where in the meantime, the other woman still leaned motionless against the wall in her billowy white muslin dress, in a sort of gloomy seriousness, that struck Beatrice as half sinister, half ridiculous. Fortunata presented her: "Fraulein Wilhelmine Fallehn — Frau Beatrice Heinold. You must know the name, dear Willy."

"I had the greatest regard for your husband," said Fraulein Fallehn, coolly and in a dark voice.

Fortunata offered Beatrice an upholstered wicker chair, and apologized as she stretched herself out again as comfortably as before. Never had she felt so tired and languid as here, especially in the afternoons. Most probably it was because she could not stand the experiment she was making of bathing twice a day and remaining in the water an hour each time. But when one knew so many waters as she — inland lakes, and rivers, and seas — one must finally discover that each water had its own definite character. So she continued, carefully and too elegantly as it seemed to Beatrice, while she stroked her red-dyed hair with one hand. Her long white dress, trimmed with crocheted lace, hung down over both sides of the low chair to the floor. Around her bare neck she wore a modest string of small pearls. Her pale narrow face was heavily powdered; only the tip of her nose showed pink, and her frankly painted lips were a dark red. Beatrice could not help thinking of a picture in an illustrated magazine, representing a Pierrot hanging on a lamp-post, an impression that was strengthened by the fact that Fortunata kept her eyes half closed while she spoke.

Tea and pastry were served and the conversation continued, with Wilhelmine Fallehn, who now leaned over the railing, her cup in her hand, joining in the talk even more informally than before. The subject changed from summer to winter; they spoke of the city, of the theatre, of the stupid disciples of Ferdinand Heinold, and about his unfortunate and premature death. Wilhelmine expressed in measured tones her surprise that a woman could survive the loss of such a husband, whereupon the Baroness, noticing Beatrice's surprise, smoothly remarked: "You must know, Willy, Frau Heinold has a son."

At that moment Beatrice looked at her with unbridled hostility in her eyes and she returned the look with the wicked slyness of a malicious water-sprite; in fact Beatrice imagined that Fortunata exhaled a damp breath like that from reeds or water-lilies. At the same time, she noticed that Fortunata's feet were bare in their sandals and that under her white linen dress she had nothing else on. In the meantime the Baroness continued speaking, incessantly, in her smooth and well-bred manner. She believed that life was stronger than death, and that therefore it must always win out in the end. But Beatrice felt that this was a creature who had never loved a soul, man or woman.

Wilhelmine Fallehn suddenly put down her cup. “I must finish packing,” she explained, said a curt farewell, and disappeared through the sun-porch.

“You see, my friend is going back to Vienna to-day,” said Fortunata. “She is engaged — so to speak.”

“Ah,” said Beatrice politely.

“What would you take her for?” asked Fortunata with half-closed eyes.

“She is evidently an actress.”

Fortunata shook her head. “She was in the theatre for a while. She is the daughter of a high official. Or rather — an orphan. Her father put a bullet through his head in grief over the life she was leading. That was ten years ago. Now she is twenty-seven. She can still go far — Will you have another cup of tea?”

“No thank you, Baroness.” She took a deep breath. Now the moment had come. Her face suddenly became so determined that Fortunata unconsciously half sat up. And Beatrice began with decision: “It is really not an accident that I was passing by your house to-day. I have something to say to you, Baroness.”

“Oh,” said Fortunata; and a faint red showed under the powdered Pierrot face. She threw one arm over the back of the chaise-longue and twisted her restless fingers.

“Please allow me to be very brief,” began Beatrice.

“Just as you wish. As brief or as lengthy as you like, dear Frau Heinold.”

Beatrice was provoked at these rather condescending words and said sharply: “To put it simply and briefly, it is this: Baroness, I do not wish my son to become your lover.”

She was very calm; yes, exactly so had she felt when, nineteen years before, she had taken her future husband from the elderly widow.

The Baroness returned Beatrice’s look no less calmly. “Oh,” she said, half to herself, “you do not wish it? What a pity — Really, to tell the truth, I had not yet thought of it myself.”

“Then it will be all the easier for you to grant my wish,” answered Beatrice, a bit more heatedly. “Certainly, if it depends on me alone.”

“Baroness, it depends only on you. You know that very well. My son is still only a child.”

A look of pain appeared around Fortunata’s painted lips. “What a terrible woman I must be,” she said thoughtfully. “Shall I tell you why my friend is leaving? She had intended to spend the whole summer with me — and her fiancé was to have visited her here. And imagine — suddenly she became frightened. Afraid of me. Yes, perhaps she is right. That is how I am. I cannot answer for myself.”

Beatrice sat motionless. She had not expected such frankness that was almost shamelessness. And she answered bitingly, “Then, Baroness, since you feel that way, it will mean very little to you to—”

Fortunata rested her childish glance on Beatrice. “What you are doing, Frau Heinold,” she said in a quiet new-found voice, “is touching indeed. But clever, on my soul, it is not. Besides, I repeat that I had not even entertained the thought. In truth, Frau Heinold, I believe that women like you have no conception of Women — of my kind. Look here — two years ago, for example, I spent three whole months in a Dutch fishing village — quite alone. And I believe I was never so happy in my whole life. And so it could have happened that this summer too — Oh, I want to think it possible — I never have schemed — never in my life. Even my marriage, I assure you, was a matter of pure chance.” And she looked up as if a sudden thought had come to her. “Or perhaps you are afraid of the Baron — are you afraid that there may be some unpleasantness for — ah — for your son on that score? As far as that is concerned—” And she smilingly closed her eyes.

Beatrice shook her head. “I had really not thought of anything of the sort.”

“Still, one might think of such things. There’s no telling what husbands will do. But look here, Frau Heinold,” and she opened her eyes again, “if that question has really played no part, then it is all the more incomprehensible to me — Seriously — if I had a son of the same age as your Hugo—”

“You know his name?” asked Beatrice severely. Fortunata smiled. “You told it to me yourself — recently at the pier.”

“Quite right. I beg your pardon, Baroness.”

“Well then, dear Frau Heinold, I wanted to say — that if I had a son and he were to fall in love with a woman like you, for example — I don’t know — but I think I could hardly picture a better debût for a young man.”

Beatrice moved in her chair, as if to stand up.

“We are just two women among ourselves,” said Fortunata soothingly.

“You have no son, Baroness — and then—” She stopped. “Ah, yes, you mean that there would be another very great difference. But that difference would make the affair — for my son — even more dangerous. For you, Frau Heinold, would probably take such an affair seriously. But I, on the contrary — I — Really, Frau Heinold, the more I think about it, the more it seems to me, it would have been wiser of you to come to me with the opposite request — if you had brought your son, so to speak, to my very arms.”

“Baroness!” Beatrice was dumbfounded. She could have screamed.

Fortunata leaned back, crossed her arms under her head, and completely shut her eyes. “Such things do happen—” And she began to tell a story. “Many years ago, somewhere in the provinces, I had a friend, an actress, who was at that time about as old as I am now. She played the heroic-sentimental rôles. One day a countess came to her — the name does not concern us — You see, her son, the young count, had fallen in love with a girl of the middle classes, of good but rather poor family — civil service, or something of the sort. And the young count wanted to marry the girl at once. Besides, he was under twenty. And the countess — do you know what that clever woman did? One fine day she appeared before my friend and spoke with her, and asked her — Well, to make it short — she arranged it so that her son forgot the girl in the arms of my friend and—”

“I beg you, Baroness, to desist from such anecdotes.”

“It is not an anecdote. It is a true story and a very moral one besides. A mésalliance was prevented, and an unhappy marriage, perhaps a suicide, or a double suicide.”

“That may be,” said Beatrice, “but all that does not concern us. In any case, I am different from the countess. And for me, the thought is simply unbearable — unbearable—”

Fortunata smiled and was silent for a while, as if she wished to force an end to the sentence. Then she said, “Your son is sixteen — or seventeen?”

“Seventeen,” answered Beatrice, and was immediately angry with herself for having given the information so meekly.

Fortunata half closed her eyes, as if she were seeing a vision. And she said as if out of a dream, “Then you must get used to the thought. If it is not I, it will be another — and who can tell you” — (out of the suddenly opened eyes came a green flash*)*— “that it will be a better one?”

“Will you have the kindness, Baroness,” answered Beatrice with laboured superiority, “to leave that problem to me?”

Fortunata sighed softly. Suddenly she seemed tired, and said: “Well, then, why talk of it any more? I am willing to be agreeable. Your son has nothing to fear from me — or as we might also put it — to hope — if you are not" — (and now her eyes were large, grey, and clear)— "entirely on the wrong track, Frau Heinold. For I — honestly, till now I had never thought that I had made any particular impression on Hugo." She let the name slip slowly out of her mouth. And she looked innocently into Beatrice's face. Beatrice had blushed darkly, and speechlessly pressed her lips together. "Then what shall I do?" asked Fortunata pitifully. "Go away? I could write my husband that the air here does not agree with me. What do you think, Frau Heinold?"

Beatrice shrugged her shoulders. "If you really are willing, I mean if you will really have the kindness not to concern yourself with my son, it will not be so very hard, Baroness — your word will suffice."

"My word? Don't you think, Frau Heinold, that in such affairs words and oaths — oh, even of women different from myself — mean very little?"

"You do not love him at all," Beatrice suddenly cried, losing all her self-control. "It would have been a whim, no more. And I am his mother. Baroness, you will not permit me to have made this step in vain."

Fortunata stood up, looked long at Beatrice, and offered her hand. She seemed suddenly to admit defeat. "Your son, from this hour, does not exist for me," she said earnestly. "Forgive me for having caused you to wait so long for this self-evident answer."

Beatrice took her hand and at that moment felt a sort of sympathy, even of pity, for the Baroness. She almost felt as if she owed her an apology. But she restrained this impulse, even avoided saying anything that might be taken as thanks, and said instead, rather lamely, "Then the affair is in order, Baroness." And she stood up.

"Must you go?" asked Fortunata in her most proper voice.

"I have detained you long enough," answered Beatrice equally politely.

Fortunata smiled, and Beatrice felt rather stupid. She allowed the Baroness to accompany her to the garden-gate, and gave her her hand once more. "Thank you for your visit," said Fortunata cordially, and added: "If I shall not be able to return it in the near future, I hope you will not take it amiss."

"Oh," said Beatrice and returned again from the street the friendly nod of the Baroness, who remained standing at the gate. Involuntarily Beatrice walked more rapidly than usual and kept to the level road. She could turn off later to the narrow forest path that led steep and straight to the Director's villa. "How do matters really stand?" she asked herself excitedly. "Am I the victor? She gave me her word. Yes. But did she not herself say that the promises of women did not mean much? No, she will not dare. She has seen to what lengths I can go." Fortunata's words kept ringing in her ears. How queerly she spoke of that summer in Holland! As if of a peaceful respite from a wildly sweet, but very difficult time. And she imagined Fortunata in a white linen dress over her naked body, running along the seashore, as if pursued by evil spirits. Perhaps it was not always pleasant, the life that was Fortunata's lot. In a way, as was the case with women of her sort, she was probably half-insane and hardly answerable for the harm that she did. Well, she could do what she wished, only she must leave Hugo in peace. Why did it have to be just he? And Beatrice smiled as she thought that she could have offered the Baroness as compensation a handsome young man, newly arrived, named Fritz Weber, with whom she would surely be just as well satisfied. Yes, she should have made the proposal. Truly, that would have put the proper spice into the conversation. What women there were! What a life they led! So that they had to go to Dutch fishing villages from time to time to recuperate. For others all life was just such a fishing village. And Beatrice smiled, but without real joy.

She stood before the gate of Welponer's villa and entered. From the tennis court, which was quite near the entrance, Beatrice could see white figures shimmering through the thin shrubbery and could hear familiar voices. As she came closer, she saw two couples standing facing each other. On one side stood the son and daughter of the house, nineteen and eighteen years of age, both resembling their father in their dark eyes and heavy brows, and betraying by features and bearing, the Italian-Jewish stock from which they came. On the other side played Dr Bertram and his slender little sister, Leonie, the children of a well-known physician, who also had a home in the vicinity. At first Beatrice stood off a little to enjoy the strong free movement of their young bodies and the sharp flight of the balls. The fresh grace of the battle refreshed and pleased her. In a few moments the set was ended. Both couples met at the net, racquets in hand, and stood there, chatting. Their features, earlier made tense by the excitement of the game, now melted into vacuous smiles; their eyes, which before had followed the spring of the balls so keenly, now met dreamily. Beatrice realized this with strange uneasiness: it was as if the atmosphere, formerly so clean and pure, had suddenly become stormy and misty, and she could not help thinking: "How well this evening would end if suddenly, by some magic, all the inhibitions of society should be done away with, and these young people might follow without hindrance the secret, perhaps even unsuspected urge which impels them." And suddenly she realized that there was a lawless world — that she had just stepped out of such a one, and that its breath still hung around her. It was only because of that, that she saw to-day what otherwise would have escaped her innocent eyes. Only because of that? — Had she not herself secretly desired these worlds? Was she not herself once the beloved of the blessed and the damned, the naïve and the sophisticated, of scoundrels and heroes?

She was seen. They waved their hands to her in greeting. She went closer to the wire-netting and the others walked towards her. She heard their light chatter around her. But she felt as if both young men looked at her in a new way. Especially young Dr Bertram had a sort of superior scorn about his mouth and looked her up and down as he had never done before, or at least in a way that she had never before noticed. And when she left them to go at last up to the house, he jokingly caught her finger through the net and kissed it long, as if he could never stop. And he laughed insolently as a dark look of displeasure appeared on her face.

Up above, on the roofed, almost too handsome balcony, Beatrice found both couples, the Welponers and the Arbesbachers, playing tarock. She would not let them be disturbed, pushed the Director back into his chair when he tried to lay aside his cards, and then sat down between him and his wife. She said she wanted to look on at their game, but she hardly did — her glance soon wandered over the stone balustrade far over the hills which the sun was gilding. Here a feeling of security and fitness came over her that she had not felt out there among the young people — a feeling that rendered her calm, but at the same time sad. The Director's wife offered her tea in her rather condescending manner to which one had to become accustomed. But Beatrice thanked her: she had just had some. Just! How many miles away lay that house with its insolently fluttering flag? How many hours, or days ago, had she left that place for this? Shadows sank upon the park, the sun suddenly disappeared behind the mountains; from the street below, invisible from here, came indefinite sounds. Beatrice suddenly felt so alone as she had only felt in twilight hours in the country immediately after Ferdinand's death and never since. Even Hugo seemed suddenly to disappear into unreality and to be unattainably far away. She wanted him urgently and hastily took her leave of the party. The Director insisted on accompanying her. He went down the broad staircase with her, then along the pond, in the centre of which the fountain was now silent, then past the tennis court, where the two couples, in spite of the falling evening, still played so eagerly that they did not notice them as they went by. Herr Welponer threw a troubled look towards them, which Beatrice had noticed on his face before. But she felt that to-day she understood him for the first time. She knew that in the midst of the strenuous powerful life of a keen financier, the Director was disturbed by the melancholy fear of advancing age. And while he walked at her side, his tall figure bent forward slightly as if only in affectation, and while he conversed lightly with her about the wonderful summer weather, and about the excursions which they really must undertake, but for which the energy always failed them, Beatrice felt that they were both being enmeshed in an invisible net. And when he kissed her hand at the gate of the park, he left a feeling of gentle sadness upon her, that accompanied her all the way home.

At the door, the maid told her that Hugo and another young man were in the garden, and besides, that a package had been left by the postman. Beatrice found it in her room, and smiled with pleasure. Was it not a good omen that fate had made the truth out of her unnecessary small lie? Or should it be taken as a warning: this time you were lucky. The package was from Dr Teichmann. It contained books that he had promised to send her, the memoirs and letters of great statesmen, of people, therefore, whom the little lawyer tremendously admired. Beatrice merely looked at a title-page, took off her hat in her bedroom, threw a shawl around her shoulders and went into the garden. She saw the boys below near the hedge. Without noticing her, they continued to jump high up in the air like madmen. When Beatrice came nearer, she saw that both had taken off their coats. Now Hugo ran towards her and kissed her for the first time in weeks, childishly and stormily on both cheeks. Fritz quickly slipped his coat on, bowed, and kissed Beatrice's hand. She smiled. It seemed to her that he wanted to wipe away that other melancholy kiss by the touch of his young lips.

"What are you children doing there?" asked Beatrice.

"Contest for the world's championship in high-jumping," exclaimed Fritz.

The high cornstalks on the other side of the hedge moved in the evening breeze. Below lay the lake, dull grey and misty. "You might put on your coat too, Hugo," said Beatrice, gently pushing his damp blonde hair off his forehead. Hugo obeyed. Beatrice thought that her boy looked rather unkempt and childish next to his friend, but it pleased her at the moment.

"Just think, mother," said Hugo, "Fritz wants to take the half-past nine train back to Ischl."

"But why?"

"There are no rooms to be found, Frau Heinold. There may be one in two or three days at the earliest."

"But you are not going away just because of that, Herr Fritz? We have room for you."

"I have already told him, mother, that you certainly would not object to his staying."

"Why should I? Certainly you shall spend the night here, in the guest room. What is it for, if not for just such occasions?"

"Frau Heinold, I shouldn't like to inconvenience you in any way. I know that my mother is always much upset when we have unexpected house guest? in Ischl."

"Well, that is not the case here, Herr Fritz." They finally agreed that Herr Webers baggage should be sent for from the Posthof where it had been checked, and that he should live from that time on in the attic bedroom, in exchange for which Beatrice solemnly promised to call him plain "Fritz" without the "Herr."

Beatrice gave the necessary orders in the house, and feeling it more fitting that the young friends be left to themselves for a while, did not appear until supper was served on the sun-porch. For the first time in many days, Hugo was in the best of spirits, and Fritz, too, had given up playing the grown-up man. Two school boys sat at the table, and as usual began first to criticize all their teachers, and then to discuss the outlook for their last year in school and plans for the more distant future. Fritz Weber, who wanted to be a physician, had already visited the dissecting room one day last winter, and he implied that no one else could have had such impressive experiences as he. Hugo, for his part, had long ago decided to dedicate his life to archaeology. He already had a small collection of relics — a Pompeian lamp, a piece of mosaic from the Baths of Caracalla, a pistol lock from the French invasion, and a few other things. He was planning to excavate here at the lake shore, and of course, over in Grassy Meadow where the remains of lake dwellings had been found. Fritz did not conceal his suspicions as to the authenticity of Hugo's museum pieces — above all he had always been doubtful of the pistol lock which Hugo had found in the Turkish entrenchments. Beatrice said that Fritz was too young for such scepticism, whereupon he answered that it had nothing to do with age — it was just his natural tendency. “I prefer my Hugo to this precocious cub,” thought Beatrice, “but in truth, life will be much more difficult for him.” She looked at him. His eyes were staring far off into the distance, whither Fritz surely could not follow him. Beatrice thought further: “Naturally he has no suspicion as to the kind of person this Fortunata really is. Who knows what he imagines about her? Perhaps to him she is a sort of fairy princess whom a cruel wizard holds in captivity. How he sits there, with his ruffled blonde hair and his untidy neck-tie! He still has the child’s mouth’ — the sweet red child’s mouth — It is his father’s — the same mouth and eyes.” And she looked out into the darkness that hung so heavy and black over the meadow that it seemed as if a deep forest stood around the windows.

“May I smoke?” asked Fritz. Beatrice nodded, whereupon Fritz took out a silver cigarette case with a golden monogram and offered it politely to his hostess. Beatrice took a cigarette and let him light it for her, and was informed that Fritz got his tobacco directly from Alexandria. Hugo smoked to-day too. It was, he said, the seventh cigarette of his life. Fritz had given up counting his long ago. Besides, he announced that these cigarettes were given him by his father, who, he said, had excellent business prospects for the next year. Then he told the latest news — that his sister was going to finish her “gymnasium” in three years, and then would probably study medicine just as he himself was going to do. Beatrice glanced quickly at Hugo, who blushed slightly. Was it perhaps still the love for little Elise that he had in his heart, and which caused the painful look about his mouth?

“Couldn’t we go for a little row?” asked Fritz. “It’s such a beautiful night, and so warm.”

“Why not wait for moonlight,” said Beatrice. “It’s gloomy, floating around out there on such a dark night.”

“I think so too,” said Hugo. Fritz’s nostrils twitched contemptuously. But then the boys decided to celebrate the day by having an ice on the terrace of the Lake Hotel.

“You young scamps,” said Beatrice smilingly as they left.

Then she looked over the attic room to see that everything was in order, and attended to all her final housewifely duties before going to bed. She went to her room, undressed, and lay down in bed. Soon she heard voices outside — evidently those of the porters who were bringing Fritz’s trunk, which was now being carried up the wooden steps. Then followed a conversation between the porter and maid that lasted longer than was absolutely necessary — and then — all was silent. Beatrice took up one of the books of heroes that Dr Teichmann had sent her and began to read the memoirs of a French general. But her mind was not on it — she was restless and tired, and she felt as if the very stillness around would not let her sleep. After some time she heard the front door open, then footsteps, whispering, and laughter. The boys! They tiptoed upstairs as quietly as possible. Then from above came sounds of movement, a clatter, a murmur — then footsteps descending the stairs. That was Hugo going down to bed. Now all was quiet in the house. Beatrice put aside her book, turned out the light, and fell asleep, calm, and almost happy.

PART TWO

THEY HAD AT length reached their goal. As all had prophesied, the journey lasted longer than the architect had said. But he countered with: "Well, what did I say? Three hours from Oak Road. It's not my fault if we started at nine instead of eight."

"But now it's half-past one," remarked Fritz. "Yes," said Frau Arbesbacher sadly, "that's always how he measures time."

"When there are women about," answered her husband, "you always have to add fifty per cent. It's an old, old story, especially when you go shopping with them." And he laughed dully.

Young Dr Bertram, who since the beginning of the excursion had steadily kept near Beatrice, spread his green coat out on the grass. "Please, Frau Heinold," he said, pointing to it with a gentle smile. His words and looks had been full of meaning ever since the day two weeks ago, when he had kissed her finger through the tennis net.

"No, thanks," answered Beatrice, "I have my own, you see." And at a glance from her, Fritz flung open her Scotch plaid, which he had been carrying on his arm. But the wind was so strong up there on the mountain side, that the blanket flapped like a giant veil until Beatrice caught it at the other end, and with Fritz's help, spread it out on the ground.

"There's always a nice little breeze blowing up here," said the architect. "But what a pretty sight, eh what?" And he made a sweeping gesture over the whole landscape. They were on a broad, closely cropped meadow that sloped gently and left the view free on all sides. All of them contemplated the scene for some time in silent pleasure. The men had taken off their waterproof hats. Hugo's hair was more untidy than ever, the bristling white hair of the architect was stirred too by the wind, even Fritz's well-combed crop underwent some damage, and it was only Bertram's straight blonde hair that the wind could not disturb, though it blew so steadily over the height. Arbesbacher named several of the mountain peaks across the lake, together with their respective heights, and pointed out one peak which, he said, had never been reached from the north. Dr Bertram said this was a mistake, for he himself had climbed it last year.

"Then you were the first," said the architect.

"That's possible," answered Bertram, nonchalantly, and called attention immediately to another mountain that looked much less formidable, but that he had never dared climb. He knew just how much he dared attempt. Above all, he was not foolhardy, and had no especial fondness for death. He pronounced the word "death" very lightly, in the voice of the expert who disdains to speak seriously of his specialty before the layman.

Beatrice had stretched out on the plaid and looked up at the dull, blue sky over which thin white summer clouds were passing. She knew that Dr Bertram was speaking only to her — that he was placing at her disposal all his most interesting qualities — pride and knowledge, contempt of death, and love of life — to choose from as she would. But it had not the slightest effect on her.

The youngest members of the party — Fritz and Hugo — had brought the lunch in their packs. Leonie helped them unpack and then buttered the bread in her graceful, motherly way, not forgetting to take off her tan gloves and to slip them into her brown leather belt. The architect uncorked the bottles, Dr Bertram poured the wine and offered the full glasses to the ladies, looking past Beatrice with deliberate indifference, towards the mountain tops across the lake. They all found it delightful to be partaking of bread and butter sandwiches and tangy Terlan wine up there, with the mountain wind blowing around them. To finish off the lunch, there was a large cake that Frau Director Welponer had sent to Beatrice that morning, together with an apology for herself and her family, because they were unable to join them, although they would have enjoyed it so much. Their refusal was not unexpected. To pry the Welponer family loose from their garden was no easy task, as Leonie said. The architect took the liberty of reminding the honourable ones present that they too could not boast much of their enterprise. How had they been spending these beautiful summer days?—" lackadaisied, "as he put it, around on the forest paths, or bathed in the lake, or played tennis and tarock — but how many plans and preparations had been necessary before they finally decided to undertake even this little excursion — which, all told, was but a short walk?

Beatrice thought to herself that she had only been here once before — with Ferdinand — ten years ago — the same summer, therefore, when they had moved into their new home. But it was hard to realize that it was the same meadow where she was to-day — in her memory it had been so different — so much broader and lighter. A soft melancholy crept into her heart. How alone she was amongst all these people! What did the happy chatter all around mean to her? There they all sat on the meadow, letting their glasses clink! Fritz touched his glass to Beatrice's; but after she had long emptied hers, he still stood motionlessly holding his in his hands and staring at her. "What a look," thought Beatrice. "Even more enraptured and thirsty than those that he has been directing towards me for the past few days — or do I just imagine it, because I have drunk three glasses of wine in such quick succession?" She stretched out again on her plaid beside Frau Arbesbacher, who had fallen fast asleep, and looked blinkingly into the air, where she saw a tiny smoke cloud rising gracefully — probably from Bertram's cigarette, though she could not see him. But she felt his glance running along the whole length of her body to the nape of her neck, until she almost thought she felt his touch, but realized that it was only the long grass that was tickling her.

The voice of the architect came to her as if from a great distance, as he told the boys of the time when the little train did not yet come to the village below. And although hardly fifteen years had gone by, he tried to spread an atmosphere of grey antiquity over that period. Among other stories, he told one of a drunken coachman who had once driven him right into the lake and whom he had thrashed almost to death for it. Then Fritz related the following heroic anecdote in his best manner: once in the Wiener Wald, he had made a very timid boy take to his heels by merely putting his hand into his pocket as if he had a revolver there. For it was a question, as he took care to explain, not of the revolver, but of presence of mind. "It's a pity," said the architect, "that one does not always have a six-barreled, loaded presence of mind about one." The boys laughed. How well Beatrice knew that laugh, that double laugh, that she could now enjoy so often at home during meal times and in her garden; and how happy she was that the boys got along so well together! Recently they had gone away together lor two days, fully equipped, on an excursion to Gosauseen, as a preparation for the September tour that they were planning. Besides, they had been better friends in Vienna than Beatrice had known. She had learned from others something that Hugo had stubbornly kept silent — that some evenings, after an hour in the gymnasium, both would go to a coffee house on the other side of the village to play billiards. But in any case, she was deeply grateful to Fritz for coming to them at that time. Hugo's mood had become again as fresh and untroubled as ever, the painful look had left his face, and surely he did not think of the terrible woman with the Pierrot face and the red-dyed hair. And Beatrice could not deny that she had comported herself blamelessly. Just a few days ago she had by chance been standing near her on the gallery of the bath house, just when Hugo and Fritz had come racing in as usual from the open lake. They reached the slippery steps simultaneously, and, supporting themselves with one arm, they had splashed each other's faces, dived and appeared again far out in the open lake. Fortunata, in her white bath-robe, had looked on carelessly with an absent smile, as at the play of children, and then had looked again out over the lake with lost sad eyes, so that Beatrice in mild discontent, and with an almost guilty feeling, recalled the talk in the white-flagged villa, that was ever becoming dimmer and less important to her, and that the Baroness herself seemed to have long forgiven and forgotten. One evening Beatrice had seen the Baron seated on a bench in the wood. He evidently had come for a short visit. He had light blonde hair, a beardless, wrinkled, and yet young-looking face with steel-grey eyes, wore a light blue flannel suit, smoked a short pipe, and had beside him on the bench, a sailor's cap. He looked to Beatrice like a captain who had come from a distant land, and who must immediately go back to sea. Fortunata sat beside him, small and well-bred, her nose pinkish as usual, with tired arms, like a doll that the distant captain could take out or put back into its case according to his pleasure.

All of this went through Beatrice's mind as she lay on the meadow, while the wind blew and grassblades tickled her neck. Around her now everything was silent; all of them seemed to be asleep; only at a short distance away somebody was whistling. Unconsciously Beatrice looked with blinking eyes for the small smoke cloud, and immediately saw it rising thin and silver-grey into the air. Beatrice raised her head slightly — she saw Dr Bertram leaning his head on both arms, his eyes fastened on the low-cut neck of her dress. He was speaking and it was quite possible that he had been speaking for a long time, in fact that his speech had awakened her out of her half-sleep. Now he asked her whether she would be interested in a mountain climbing party, in a real climb, or whether she were afraid of dizziness — it didn't have to be a peak, it could be a plateau as well; only he wanted to go higher than the others, so much higher, that they could not follow. To look with her from a high peak into the valley — that would be divine. When he got no answer, he said: "Well, Frau Beatrice?"

"I'm asleep," answered Beatrice.

"Then allow me to be your dream," he began, and continued — he could picture no more beautiful death than to jump into the deep — one's whole life would rush by in such frightful clearness, and it would naturally be more pleasant in proportion as to how one had lived, and if one had not the slightest fear, only a never before experienced thrill, and a sort — yes, a sort of metaphysical curiosity. And he buried his burned-out cigarette stub in the ground with quick fingers. Besides, he continued, he was not particularly interested in such an end. On the contrary, even if he were obliged to see so much misery and horror in his work, for that reason, he treasured everything light and pure in life all the more. Wouldn't Frau Beatrice like to see the hospital garden? There was a very curious and charming atmosphere about it, especially on autumn evenings. You see, he was now living in the hospital. And if Beatrice would like to take tea with him at the same time —

"You're quite mad," said Beatrice, sitting up and looking with clear eyes into the blue-gold atmosphere which the dull mountain-peaks seemed to absorb. Drunk with the sun, a little weak, she stood up, shook out her dress, and noticed, how, quite against her will, she looked wearily down at Dr Bertram. She quickly looked away towards Leonie, who stood quite alone at some distance from them, like a picture, a fluttering veil thrown about her head. The architect sat with crossed legs on the grass, playing cards with the boys.

"I say, Frau Beatrice, soon you won't have to give Hugo any more pocket money," he called out, "he can support himself comfortably out of today's winnings in tarock."

"Then it would be wise for us to start homeward before you are completely ruined." Fritz looked at Beatrice with glowing cheeks. She smiled at him. Bertram stood up, looked at the sky, and then down over her bit by bit. "What is the matter with you all?" she thought. "And what is the matter with me?" For suddenly she noticed that she allowed the lines of her body to play as alluringly as possible. Seeking assistance, she turned her look toward her son, who was playing out his last card, his childish face aglow, his clothes unspeakably untidy. He won the game and proudly collected one crown and twenty heller from the architect. They got ready for the descent, all except Frau Arbesbacher, who was still asleep. “Let her lie,” joked the architect. But at that moment, she stirred, rubbed her eyes, and was ready for the homeward journey long before the others. For a while the path led sharply downhill, then it ran almost level through young forests; at the next bend, they could see the lake which disappeared at once. Beatrice, who at first had joined Hugo and Fritz and had run ahead with them, soon remained behind; Leonie came up to her and spoke of a sailing regatta that was to take place soon. Beatrice still remembered clearly the race seven years ago in which Ferdinand had won second prize in his boat, the “Roxana.” Where was she now? After so many triumphs she led a lonely inglorious life down there in the boat-house. The architect took advantage of this opportunity to say that this year boating was as much neglected as all other sports. Leonie expressed the opinion that there was some enervating influence coming from the Welponer house, whose effect no one could escape. The architect, too, believed that the Welponers were in no way suited to agreeable society, and his wife said it was due most of all to Frau Welponer’s arrogance and because she had not the slightest need for amusement. They suddenly were silent, as they saw the Director sitting on a worm-eaten, broken-down bench at the turn in the road. He stood up; and his monocle on its narrow silk ribbon hung down over his white piqué vest. He said that he had taken the liberty of coming to meet them and invite them in the name of his wife to partake of a small “Jause,” which was awaiting the tired wanderers on the shady veranda. At the same time, he looked wearily at them all, and Beatrice noted that when he looked at Bertram, his face darkened; and she suddenly knew that the Director was envious of the young man. But she was immediately ashamed of such a foolish assumption. She lived on in the present, quietly and unquestioningly, in undisturbed faithfulness to him alone whose voice even now rang clearer in her memory than all the voices of the living, and whose eyes still shone brighter than all those living ones.

The Director remained behind with Beatrice. First he talked of various unimportant events of the day, of some friends who had recently arrived, of the death of the miller, aged ninety-five, about the ugly house that a Salzburg architect was building in Grassy Meadow, and then, as if by accident, reminded her of the time when neither his house, nor the Heinold house had yet been built, and when both families had lived all summer in the Lake Hotel. He recalled several trips they had taken together on the then little known roads, and one sailing party in the “Roxana,” which ended in a terrible storm; spoke of the housewarming party at the Heinold house when Ferdinand had made two of his fellow-actors dead drunk, and finally, of Ferdinand’s last rôle in a modern, rather tragic play, in which he had so perfectly played the part of a youth of twenty. What an inimitable artist he had been! And what an excellent man! A man of eternal youth, one might say. A wonderful contrast to that class of people in whose numbers he must unfortunately include himself, of people who were not made to bring either themselves or others happiness. And as Beatrice looked at him questioningly, he said: “I, dear Frau Beatrice, I was born old, so to speak. Do you know what that means? I shall try to explain. You see, we who were born old — during our lives we let one mask after another fall from us, until, at the age of eighty or thereabouts, sometimes sooner, we show our real faces to the world. The others, the youthful ones — and such a one was Ferdinand (quite contrary to his habit he called him by his Christian name) — they always remain young, remain children, and therefore are obliged to put on one mask after another if they do not wish to astonish other people too much. Perhaps these masks come of themselves over their faces, and they do not know that they wear them, and only have a strange dark feeling that something does not fit in their lives — because they always feel young. Such a man was Ferdinand.” Beatrice listened to the Director in surprise and with rising defiance. She could not help feeling that he had conjured up Ferdinand's shadow intentionally, as if he had been assigned to guard her honour, to warn her of some near danger, and to protect her. Really, he might have spared himself the trouble. What gave him the right, what grounds had he for appointing himself the representative and guardian of Ferdinand's memory? What was there in her actions that aroused such insulting suspicions in his mind? If she could play and laugh to-day and wear bright colours again, could any unprejudiced onlooker interpret it as anything but the necessity of living on in conformity with the others? But the thought that she might ever be really happy again, or might belong again to any man, filled her with disgust and horror; and that horror, as she learned in many sleepless nights, became only deeper, when some inexplicable flashes of longing rushed through her blood and passed by unfulfilled. And again she glanced quickly at the Director, who now walked silently beside her. But she was terrified to discover the smile on her lips, that in spite of herself, came from the depths of her soul, and that unerringly, almost shamelessly, said more plainly than words: "I know that you desire me, and I am glad." She saw his eyes suddenly flare up into a burning question, which he immediately controlled and quieted. And he addressed an indifferent polite word to Frau Arbesbacher, who was just a few steps ahead of them, for the small party, now that they were nearing their goal, had all come together again. Suddenly young Dr Bertram was at Beatrice's side, and by his bearing, look, and speech, implied that the relations between him and Beatrice had become more closely bound on this picnic, and that she must admit the fact that she was beginning to yield to his graces. But she remained cool and distant and grew more distant at each step. And when they reached the gate of Welponer's Villa, she announced, to the surprise of everyone, including herself, that she was tired and would prefer to go home. They tried to dissuade her. But since the Director himself expressed only mild disappointment, they did not insist. She was undecided as to whether she would return for supper, which they had agreed to take together at the Lake Hotel, but had no objections to Hugo's joining them in any case. "I'll take good care," said the architect, "that he does not drink himself silly." Beatrice took her leave. A feeling of great relief came over her as she took the road homewards and she was happy in the prospect of the few undisturbed hours that were to be hers.

At home she found a letter from Dr Teichmann, and was mildly surprised, not so much that he again gave a sign of life, as that she had almost forgotten his existence in the excitement of the past days. It was only after she had removed the dust of the day's journey and was sitting before her toilet-table in a comfortable house gown, that she opened the letter about whose contents she was not in the least bit curious. The letter opened, as usual, with reports on business matters, for Dr Teichmann believed it his duty to serve Beatrice first of all as her solicitor, and he informed her with misplaced humour of the success of a little venture of hers in which he was able to gain quite a sum of money for her. Finally, he told her, in an elaborately casual tone, that his vacation journey that year would take him past Oak Road, and that he dared hope — as he wrote — that through the bushes he might catch sight of a gay garment, or that a friendly eye might smile at him and might invite him to linger, even though it be for just a moment's chat. He did not forget to send regards to the Arbesbachers and the "noble Lord and Lady of the castle, together with their worthy offspring," as he expressed it, and the other friends, whose acquaintance he had made last year when he spent three days at the Lake Hotel. Beatrice found it strange that last year seemed so far away and like a different period of her life, although it had been hardly any different from this summer. Even the flirtations on the part of the Director and young Dr Bertram had not been wanting. It was only that she herself had gone on unperturbed amongst all their looks and words; yes, that she had hardly noticed them, and was only now conscious of them in reminiscence. This might be due to the fact that she had very little to do with all these summer acquaintances in the city. Since the death of her husband, after she had broken connections with the circle of artists and theatrical people, she had led a retiring and monotonous life. Only her mother, who lived in a suburb in an old mansion near the factory that her father had once managed, and a few distant relatives, found their way to her quiet home which had become quite bourgeois and commonplace again. And when Dr Teichmann would appear lor tea and a little chat, it meant a diversion to her, that gave her real pleasure, she realized now with surprise.

Thoughtfully shaking her head, she laid the letter down and looked into the garden over which the early August twilight was spreading. The comfortable feeling of solitude had gradually left her and she wondered whether it would not be wiser to go back to the Welponers, or later to go to the Lake Hotel. But then she restrained the impulse, a little ashamed that she should have succumbed so completely to the allurement of society and that the pensive magic of such solitary summer evenings that formerly had so charmed her, should have disappeared forever. She threw a thin shawl over her shoulders and went into the garden. Here the melancholy she had been seeking came over her, and she knew in the depths of her soul that she could never walk up and down these paths that she had so often walked with Ferdinand, on the arm of another man. At this moment, one thing above all was clear to her: if Ferdinand in those distant days had made her swear not to cast aside any opportunity for happiness, certainly he had not pictured a marriage with such a man as Dr Teichmann; any passionate, though perhaps merely passing adventure would be much more likely to win his approval in his celestial realm. And with horror she realized that a picture had sprung up in her mind: she saw herself up on the meadow in the twilight in the arms of Dr Bertram. But she merely saw the picture, no wish accompanied it; cool and distant, it hung in the air like a vision and disappeared.

She stood at the lower end of the garden, leaned her arms on the fence, and looked downwards to the lights of the town blinking below. The voices of an evening boating party, singing out on the lake, came to her with startling clearness through the quiet air. The clock in the church tower struck nine. Beatrice sighed softly, then turned around and slowly went back across the lawn to the house. On the veranda, she found the table set with the usual three places. She let the maid bring her her supper and ate it without any particular relish, feeling a useless, aimless sadness. While eating, she picked up a book — it was the memoirs of a French general, which interested her to-day even less than usual. The clock struck half-past nine, and, loneliness depressing her more every moment, she decided to leave the house after all, and to find the party at the Lake Hotel. She stood up, put her long silk coat over her house gown, and started out. As she went past the Baroness's house at the lake, she noticed that it was completely dark; and she remembered that she had not seen Fortunata for several days. Had she gone away with the distant Captain? But as Beatrice looked back again, she thought she saw a light behind one of the closed blinds. Why did it trouble her? She didn't care any more. On the high terrace of the Lake Hotel, whose electric arc lights were already out, she found her party, seated around a table, in the faint light of two wall brackets. Conscious suddenly of the too serious expression on her face, she forced an empty smile to her lips. She was greeted warmly, shook hands with all of them in a row, the Director, the architect, their wives, and young Fritz Weber. There was no one else present. "Where is Hugo?" she asked, somewhat perturbed.

"He left this very moment," answered the architect. "Queer that you didn't meet him."

Unconsciously Beatrice glanced at Fritz, who with an embarrassed, stupid, childish smile, twirled his beer glass and averted his eyes with obvious intent. Then she sat down between him and Frau Welponer, and in order to overcome the menacing thoughts that were arising in her, she began to talk with exaggerated cheerfulness. She was very sorry that Frau Welponer had not been with them on the charming picnic; she asked about the brother and sister, Bertram and Leonie; and finally related that at supper she had read some French memoirs and letters of great men. She found no pleasure in novels and such things any more. It seemed that the others agreed with her. "Love stories are only for young folks," said the architect— "I mean for children, for in a way, we are all still young folks." Fritz too said that he preferred scientific works, or especially books on travel. While he spoke, he moved quite close to Beatrice, and pressed his knee against hers as if by accident; his napkin fell down, he bent down to pick it up, and tremblingly stroked her ankle. Was the boy mad? And he continued speaking, excitedly, with glowing eyes: as soon as he was a doctor, he would join some large expedition, perhaps to Tibet or darkest Africa. The others smiled indulgently at his words; only the Director — Beatrice noted it well — looked at him with sullen envy. As the party arose to go home, Fritz said that he would first take a solitary walk on the lake shore. "Alone?" asked the architect, "that isn't so easy to believe." But Fritz answered that walking alone on summer evenings was one of his particular passions; just recently he had come home about one in the morning, and in fact with Hugo, who at times accompanied him on these nightly jaunts. And as he saw the restless, questioning glance that Beatrice turned to him, he added: "It is quite possible that I shall meet Hugo somewhere down at the lake to-night, if he hasn't gone rowing as he sometimes does."

"This is interesting news," said Beatrice, shaking her head doubtfully.

"Yes, these summer evenings," sighed the architect.

"What have you to say about it?" asked his wife enigmatically.

Frau Welponer, who had gone down the steps of the terrace ahead of the others, remained standing for a moment and looked at the heavens, as if seeking something. Then she let her head sink again in a strange hopeless way. The Director was silent. But in his silence, burned hatred of summer nights, youth, and happiness.

They had hardly reached the lake shore, when Fritz slipped away, as if in fun, and disappeared into the dark. The two couples accompanied Beatrice home. Slowly and with difficulty, they climbed the steep road up the hill. "Why did Fritz rim away so suddenly?" Beatrice wondered. "Will he find Hugo at the shore? Did he ever go rowing with him in the evening? Is there a compact between them? Does Fritz know where Hugo is at this moment? Does he know?" And she had to pause a moment, for it seemed to her that her heart had suddenly stopped beating. "As if I did not know where Hugo is! As if I had not known it for days! "...

"I rather wish somebody would build a railway up this hill," said the architect.' He had taken his wife's arm, which, as far as Beatrice could remember, he had never done before. The Director and his wife walked together, in step, both bent and silent. As Beatrice stood before her door, she suddenly knew why Fritz had stolen away down there. He had wanted to avoid going alone into the house with her at night, in the presence of all the others. And she was grateful for the wise gallantry of the young man. The Director kissed Beatrice's hand. "Whatever may happen to you," he murmured, half trembling, "I shall understand, and you will have a friend in me."

"Let me alone," answered Beatrice as silently as he. The two couples parted. The Director and his wife disappeared with strange suddenness into the darkness, where wood, mountains, and heaven all ran together. The Arbesbachers took the road towards the other side, where the path was more open, and over which the soft, blue, starry night spread on high.

When the door had closed behind her, Beatrice thought: "Shall I look in Hugo's room? What for? I know that he is not at home. I know that he is there where the light shone from behind closed blinds." And she remembered that just now, on her return walk, she had again passed the house, and that it had seemed a house in the dark to her, like the others. But she did not doubt any more that at this hour her son was in the villa that she had passed thoughtlessly, and yet full of foreboding. And she knew too that she was to blame — yes, she alone — for she had let it happen. With that one visit to Fortunata, she had imagined that she had fulfilled all her motherly duties; after that she had let it go on as it would — out of laziness, out of weariness, out of cowardice — she had seen nothing, known nothing, thought nothing. Hugo was at Fortunata's at this moment, and not for the first time. A picture came to her, that made her shudder and she hid her lace in her hands as if to banish it in that way. Slowly she opened the door to her bedroom. A sadness came over her, a feeling that she had taken leave of something that would never return. The time was past when Hugo was a child, her child. Now he was a young man, one who lived his own life, of which he could no longer tell his mother. Never more would she stroke his cheeks and hair — never more could she kiss his sweet child's mouth as before. Now for the first time, since she had lost him, she was alone.

She sat on her bed and slowly began to undress. How long would he stay away? Probably the whole night. And in the grey of early morning, very quietly, in order not to awaken his mother, he would slip through the hall into his room. How often had it happened already? How many nights had he been with her? Many? No, not many. For a few days he had been on a walking tour through the country. Yes, if he had spoken the truth! But he had not been telling the truth lately. Not for a long time. In the winter he played billiards in a coffee house in the suburbs, and where else he might have been, who knew? And suddenly a thought made the blood run faster through her veins: Was he perhaps even then Fortunata's lover: On the day when she had paid her ridiculous visit to the villa down near the lake? And had the Baroness played a shabby trick on her, and then, heart to heart with Hugo, had she scoffed and laughed at her? Yes — even that was possible. For what did she know to-day of her boy who had grown to manhood in the arms of a wanton? Nothing — nothing.

She leaned on the sill of her open window, and looked into the garden and far away to the dark mountain peaks on the other side of the lake. Sharply outlined, towered the one that Dr Bertram had never dared attempt to climb. How did it happen that he was not there at the hotel? If he had guessed that she might return, he would surely have been there. Was it not strange that they should still desire her, who was the mother of a boy who already spent his nights with a mistress? Why strange? She was as young, perhaps younger than, Fortunata. And all at once, she felt the outlines of her body under her light garment, with agonizing distinctness, and even a sort of painful pleasure. A noise outside on the path made her jump. She knew it was Fritz coming home. Where could he have been all this time? Did he, too, perhaps have his little adventure here in the country? She smiled wearily. No, surely not he. For he was a little in love with her. And really — no wonder. She was just at the age that would appeal to so green a youth. Evidently he had wanted to cool his longing out in the night air; and she was a little sorry for him because just to-night the heavens hung so heavy and misty over the lake. And suddenly she remembered such a sultry summer night a long time ago, when her husband had forced her against her will to go with him from the soft privacy of their chamber into the garden, and there, in the dark black shadows of the trees, to exchange wild and tender caresses. Then she thought of the cool morning when a thousand birds had awakened her to a sweet, heavy sadness, and she trembled. Where was all that now? Did it not seem that the garden into which she was looking had preserved the memory of that night better than she herself, and that it might be able in some wonderful way to betray her to those who understood the language of the dumb? And she felt as if night in person stood out in the garden, ghostly and mysterious — yes, as if each house, each garden, had its own night, that was quite different from, deeper and more trustworthy than, that meaningless blue darkness that spread above the sleeping world, unattainably far away. And that night that belonged to her, stood full of secrets and dreams before her window, and stared into her face with blind eyes. She unconsciously put out her hands as if to ward off the vision; then she returned to her room, went slowly to her mirror, and with a tired droop of the shoulders, began to take down her hair. It must be past midnight. She was very tired, and at the same time far too wide awake. Of what use were all her meditations, all her memories, all her dreams? Of what use were all her fears and hopes? Hopes? Where was there any hope for her? She went again to the window and carefully pulled the blinds. “Even from here, it shines out into the night, into my night,” she thought. She locked the door leading to the hall; then, according to her old careful habit, she opened the door into her little parlour for a last look. She drew back, frightened. In the semi-darkness, she saw the figure of a man, standing upright in the middle of the room. “Who is there?” she asked. The figure moved. She recognized Fritz. “What are you doing here?” she asked.

He rushed to her and snatched both of her hands. Beatrice pulled them away. “You are not in your right mind,” she said.

“Pardon me, dear Frau Heinold,” he whispered, “but I — I don’t know what to do any more.”

“That is very simple,” answered Beatrice. “Go to bed.” He shook his head. “Go, go,” she said, and turned back to her room, and was about to lock the door behind her. Then she felt his arms thrust gently but awkwardly around her neck. She shrank away, but turned around involuntarily and put out her arm, as if to push Fritz back. He took her hand and put it to his lips. “But, Fritz,” she said, more mildly than had been her intention.

“I shall go quite mad,” he whispered.

She smiled. “I believe you are already mad.”

“I should have waited here all night,” he whispered again. “I had not dreamt that you would open this door. I just wanted to be here near you.”

“Now, go to your room at once. Do you hear me? Or you will make me really angry.” He had taken both her hands.

“I beg you, Frau Heinold.”

“Don’t be ridiculous, Fritz! That’s enough. Let go my hands. That’s right. And now, go.” He had let her hands drop; and then she felt the warmth of his lips on her cheek. “I’m going mad. I’ve been in this room before.”

“What?”

“Yes, I spent half of the night here recently, until it was almost light. I couldn’t help it. I should like always to be near you.”

“Don’t say such foolish things.”

He stammered on: “I beg of you, Frau Heinold, Frau Beatrice — Beatrice!”

“That’s enough — really you are — what is the matter with you? Shall I call? But for God’s sake! Think then — think of Hugo.”

“Hugo is not at home. No one hears us.” Quickly that burning pain again rose within her. Then suddenly, with shame and fright she realized that she was glad of Hugo’s absence. She felt Fritz’s warm lips on hers, and a longing sprang up in her which she had never felt to such an extent before, not even in those far-off days. “Who can blame me for it?” she thought. “To whom am I accountable?” And with desirous arms, she drew the glowing boy to her.

PART THREE

AS BEATRICE CAME out of the dark shadow of the forest into the open, the gravel road stretched out before her, white and burning hot, and she was almost sorry that she had left the Welponers so early in the afternoon. But since Frau Welponer had departed for her usual after dinner nap as soon as they left the table, and since her son and daughter had also disappeared without any apology, Beatrice would have been obliged to remain alone with the Director, a thing that she must avoid at all events, after the occurrences of the past few days. His attempts to win her favour had become altogether too open; in fact, he had dropped certain hints that gave her to believe that he would be ready to leave his wife and children at her will — and not only that, but that union with her would mean above all that wished for flight from unbearable household ties. For, with her lately acquired painful insight into the relationships of man, Beatrice had realized that that marriage had been deeply undermined, and that a collapse could follow at any time, unexpectedly and without any special reason. She had often noticed the exaggerated care with which the husband and wife spoke to each other, as if the hatred which lowered quiveringly in the hard lines around their mouths might break out at any moment into words that could never be made good again. But not until Fritz had told her last night of the almost incredible rumour, which she still did not believe — of a love affair between her dead husband and Frau Welponer, did she allow herself to take part with any real interest in the cause for the disturbance. And although the rumour had been troubling her even during dinner, while indifferent conversation went on around the table, now as she walked homewards down the path through the glittering summer air, from whose burning breath every living being seemed to have fled to the shelter of closed rooms, Fritz's rude intimations began to work with painful activity on her mind. Why, she asked herself, had he spoken of it, and especially that night? Was it in revenge because she had told him jokingly that he had better remain at Ischl with his parents, whom he was going to visit in the morning, instead of coming back the same evening as he had intended? Had a jealous suspicion awakened in him, that with all the charm of his youth, still he meant nothing to her but a handsome young boy, whom she could send home without further ado, when the game was at an end? Or had he only succumbed to his inclination to indiscreet talk, which she had been obliged to curb several times before, and even quite recently, when he evinced a desire to tell her about Hugo's relations with Fortunata? Or was the conversation between Fritz's parents, that Ee said he had recently overheard, just a child of his fanciful brain — just as his visit to the dissection room, of which he had told her on the day of his arrival, had recently turned out to be empty boasting? But although he had undertaken to tell of the talk of his parents in good faith, might he not have heard wrongly, or misunderstood? This last idea was all the more probable, since not the slightest whisper of that rumour had come to Beatrice before. Busied with such thoughts, Beatrice reached her villa. Since Hugo had ostensibly gone on a tour, and the maid was having the day off, Beatrice found herself alone in the house. She undressed in her room, and submitting to the heavy weariness that often came over her these summer afternoons, she stretched out on her bed. Consciously enjoying the solitude, the peace, the very faint light, she lay there a while with open eyes. In the large mirror that hung opposite her, she could see the life-size bust-portrait of her husband reflected in faint outline from the wall over her bed. She could see clearly only a red spot that she knew represented the carnation in his button-hole. In the early days after Ferdinand's death, this picture had continued to lead a strangely personal life for Beatrice. She saw it smiling or sad, happy or distressed — in fact, at times, she imagined that in some way the painted features expressed unconcern or despair over their own death. In the course of years, however, it had become dumb and silent, and remained a piece of painted canvas and nothing more. But at this hour, it seemed to want to live again. And although Beatrice could not see very clearly in the mirror, it seemed to her that it sent an ironic look down over her; and memories awoke within her that, though they had seemed harmless, or even gay before, now came to her mind with a new bitter meaning. And in place of the one on whom her suspicions had been fastened, a whole row of women went by, whose features she had forgotten, but who, as she suddenly realized, had all been Ferdinand's loves — admirers who wanted his autograph or photograph, young actresses who took lessons from him, society women whose salons he and Beatrice had often frequented, fellow-actresses who had fallen into his arms as wives, brides, or betrayed ones. And she asked herself whether it were not his consciousness of guilt that had made him so mild and so wisely indifferent, as it seemed, to any unfaithfulness that Beatrice might commit against his memory. And all of a sudden, as if he had thrown aside the useless, uncomfortable mask that he had worn long enough, both alive and dead, he stood before her mind with his red carnation and all — a silly comedian for whom she was nothing but an industrious housewife, the mother of his son, and a woman whom one embraced once in a while when, on a mild summer evening, the magic of propinquity so disposed one. And like his picture, his voice suddenly changed mysteriously. It no longer had the noble ring that sounded more beautiful in her memory than the voices of all the living. It rang empty, affected, and false. But at once she knew that it was not really his voice that she now heard, but that of another who recently had ventured — here in her own house — had ventured to ape the voice, intonation, and actions of her dead husband.

She sat up in bed, threw one arm over the pillow, and stared in horror into the darkness of her chamber. Now for the first time, in this peaceful hour, she recalled that event in all its atrocity. It had happened a week ago, on a Sunday as to-day — she was sitting in the garden with her son and — she thought the word with a grimace — her lover. Suddenly a young man had appeared, tall and dark, with shining eyes, in a sports outfit, with a yellowish-red tie. She did not recognize him until the cheerful greeting of the others informed her that Rudi Beratoner stood before her, the same young man who had visited Hugo several times the past winter to borrow books from him, and who, as she knew, was one of the two who Hugo had told her had spent that spring night in the Prater with the girls of questionable repute. He was just coming from Ischl, where he had looked for Fritz in vain at his parents' home. Naturally he was invited to dinner. He accepted gladly, a little too boisterously, and proved to be indefatigable in relating hunting stories and all sorts of anecdotes; and his younger friends, who seemed like children in comparison with his precociousness, looked at him in astonishment. He also showed a capacity for drink that was far beyond his years. Since the boys did not want to remain behind him, and since even Beatrice allowed herself to drink more than usual, the spirit in the house was much easier than was usual. Beatrice, who noticed with gratitude and emotion that in spite of all the gaiety her guest acted with great respect for her, imagined, as she often did in these days, that all that had happened recently, the truth of which she could not doubt, was only some sort of dream that could be repaired. For a moment, as formerly, she had put her arm around Hugo's shoulders and played with his hair, but she looked coquettishly at Fritz at the same time, and forthwith felt strange emotions over her own fate and the world. Later she noticed that Fritz was whispering very eagerly to Rudi and seemed to be persuading him to do something very important. She asked gaily what terrible thing the two young men were plotting; Beratoner did not want to answer, but Fritz explained — there was no reason for keeping it a secret — the fact was commonly known that Rudi could impersonate actors remarkably well, not only the living, but even the — but now he stopped. But Beatrice, very much excited and already slightly intoxicated, turned quickly to Rudi Beratoner, and asked somewhat hoarsely: "Then you can impersonate Ferdinand Heinold too?" She pronounced the famous name as if it belonged to a stranger. Beratoner did not want to hear of it. He did not understand Fritz at all — formerly he had practised such tricks, but not for a long time now; besides, he naturally could not recall the voices of those he had not heard for a long time, and if he had to do something, he preferred to sing a couplet in the style of any comedian they might choose. But Beatrice would not allow any evasion. She wanted nothing more than to take advantage of this opportunity. She trembled with longing to hear the beloved voice, at least in reflected splendour. That that desire might mean something blasphemous did not strike her in her befogged state of mind. At last Beratoner let himself be persuaded. And with beating heart, Beatrice heard at first Hamlet's monologue, "To be or not to be," ringing through the free summer air in Ferdinand's heroic sounding voice, then verses from Tasso, then some long forgotten words out of a long-forgotten play — she heard the beloved voice, deeply booming and melting softly away. With closed eyes, she drank it in, full of wonder, until suddenly she heard, still in Ferdinand's voice, but now in his familiar everyday tone: "Grüss Gott, Beatrice!" Then she opened her eyes in great fright and saw before her an insolent, spoiled face, around whose lips there still remained fading traces, like ghostly reminders, of Ferdinand's smile; she met Hugo's wandering glance and the half tragic, half stupid simper on Fritz's face; and heard herself saying as if from afar, a polite word of thanks to the wonderful mimic. The silence that followed was dark and oppressive; they could not bear it very long and soon gay words about summer weather and picnics were flying back and forth. But Beatrice soon arose and went back to her room, where she sank wearily into her armchair and then fell into a sleep from which she awoke hardly an hour later as if from an abysmally deep night. When she walked later in the garden, in the cool of evening, the young people had gone away. They came back soon without Rudi Beratoner, whom they took elaborate pains not to mention further, and it was deeply consoling to Beatrice to see how her son and lover tried with unusual consideration and delicacy to wipe away the distressing impression of the afternoon.

And now, in the quiet solitude of twilight, when Beatrice tried to recall the real voice of her husband, she could not do it. It was always the voice of that unwelcome guest that she heard, and she realized more deeply than ever what a crime she had committed against the dead man, worse than any that he could have committed during his life-time against her, more cowardly and inexpiable than unfaithfulness and betrayal. He was rotting deep in the ground and his widow allowed stupid boys to make fun of him, of that wonderful man who had loved her — her alone, in spite of everything that had happened, just as she had loved no other but him, and would never love any other. Now she knew it for the first time — since she had a lover. A lover! Oh, if he would never come back, that lover of hers — if he would only go away forever out of her sight and out of her blood, and if she could live again in her villa with Hugo in the quiet peace of summer, as before! As before? And if Fritz were no longer there, would she have her son back. Did she still have the right to expect it? Had she troubled much about him recently? Had she not been much happier that he went his own way? And she remembered how, recently, when she had been walking in the wood with the Arbesbachers, she had seen her son, hardly a hundred steps away, together with Fortunata, Wilhelmine Fallehn, and a strange man; and she had hardly been ashamed, only had talked more eagerly with her friends so that they might not notice Hugo. And in the evening of the same day, yesterday — yes, certainly it was only yesterday — how slowly time went by — she had met Fräulein Fallehn and that strange man, who, with his black shiny hair, his sparkling white teeth, his moustache cut English fashion, his pongee silk suit, and his red silk tie, looked like a circus-rider, a swindler, or a Mexican millionaire. When Wilhelmine nodded in greeting with her never-changing deep solemnity, he had taken off his hat, bared his white teeth, and looked at Beatrice with an insolent smile that made her blush even in recollection. What a pair they were! She believed them capable of any vice, any crime. And these were the friends of Fortunata, these were people with whom her son now went walking and whose company he now frequented! Beatrice covered her face with her hands, sighed and whispered to herself: “Away, away, away!” She said the word without really knowing what it meant. Gradually she began to realize its full meaning and thought that perhaps in it lay her and Hugo’s salvation. Yes, they must go away, both of them, mother and son, and as quickly as possible. She must take him with her — or he must take her. Both of them must leave this place before something would happen to them that could never be repaired, before she would lose all rights of motherhood, before her son’s youth would be completely ruined, before fate would fall crashing down upon them both. There was still time. No one knew of her own adventure, otherwise she would have noticed it in some way, at least in the actions of the architect. And the adventure of her son was doubtless also not yet known. And if they did know it, they would excuse it in so inexperienced a youth; and they could not even reproach a mother who had been so careless up to this time, if she should flee with him now, as if she had just discovered it. Therefore it was not too late. The difficulty lay elsewhere: to persuade Hugo to under take such a sudden journey. Beatrice could not guess how far the power of the Baroness extended over Hugo’s heart and mind. She knew nothing, nothing about him, since she had her own love affairs to worry over. But Hugo was clever, and he would not deceive himself into thinking that his adventure with Fortunata was to last forever, and so he could easily see that a few days more or less did not matter. And in her thoughts, she spoke to him: “We cannot go directly to Vienna. Oh, we can’t think of it, my child. We will go South. We have been planning that for a long time. To Venice, to Florence, to Rome. Just think, you will see the old palaces, and St. Peter’s! Hugo, let’s go to-morrow! You and I alone. Another journey like that one two years ago in the spring. Do you remember? Over Murrensteig by carriage to Mariazell. Wasn’t it beautiful? And this time it will be still more beautiful. And if it’ll be hard at first, oh, God, I’ll understand, and I’ll not ask you anything and you’ll not have to tell me anything. But seeing so much beauty and novelty, you’ll forget. You’ll forget very soon. Much sooner than you think—”

“And you, mother — you?” She heard Hugo’s voice saying it. She shuddered. And she dropped her hands from her eyes as if to assure herself that she was alone. Yes, she was alone, quite alone in the house in the half-darkened room; outside, the summer day breathed heavily and sultrily; no one would disturb her. She had plenty of quiet and time to plan what to say to her son. Of one thing she was certain: she need not fear a response such as she had imagined in her excitement: “And you, mother?” That he could not ask. For he knew nothing — he could know nothing. And he would never know. Even if some suggestive whisper should come to his ear, he would not believe it. He would never believe anything like it of his mother. On that score she could be quite at ease. And she saw herself wandering with him through some fantastic landscape that she remembered from a painting — a greyish-yellow road with a town all in blue and with many towers swimming in the distance. Then she saw themselves walking in a large square under arched passages — strange people met them and looked at her and her son. They looked at her meaningly with bold teethy smiles, and as if they thought: “Ah, she has brought a nice youth with her on her journey! She might be his mother.” What? Did the people take them for lovers? Well, why not? They could not know that the boy was her son, and they would know her for one of those over-ripe women who desire such young blood. And there they would be, walking around a strange city among strange people and he Would think of his beloved with the Pierrot face, and she, of her sweet blonde boy. She groaned aloud. She wrung her hands. Whither? Whither? All of a sudden, one of the love-words with which she had held him to her bosom last night slipped treacherously from her lips — the boy whom she would bid farewell forever and whom she would never — never see again. Yet, just once more, if he came back to-day. Or to-morrow morning. But to-night her door would be locked. It was over forever. And she would say at parting that she had loved him very much — with a love that he would never meet again. And with that proud feeling, he would realize all the more his gallant duty to eternal silence. And he would understand that it must be thus, and he would kiss her hand once more and would go. Would go. And then what? Then what? And she lay there with parted lips, her arms outstretched, her body trembling, and she knew that if he would come at that moment into the door, young and full of longing, she would not be able to resist him and would again belong to him with all the ardour that was now awakened in her like something long forgotten, in fact, like something that she had never before known. And now she knew too, in simultaneous agony and ecstasy, that the youth to whom she had given herself would not be her last lover. Already hot curiosity raged within her: who would the next one be? Dr Bertram? She remembered an evening — was it three or eight days ago? — she did not know — time dragged so — went by so quickly — the hours melted into each other and meant nothing — it happened in Welponer's garden — Bertram had suddenly run up to her on a dark path, had drawn her to him, and embraced and kissed her. And even though she had angrily pushed him away, what did that matter to him, who in spite of that must Save felt the submissive pressure of her lips, so accustomed to kisses? That was why he had immediately become so quiet and patient, as if he well knew just where he stood, and she could read in his look: "Winter belongs to me, dear lady. We have been in agreement for a long time. We both know that death is bitter and virtue only an empty word, and that one should let nothing go by." But it was not Bertram who spoke to her. Suddenly, while she lay there with closed eyes, another face had pushed Bertram's out of the way, that of the circus-rider or gambler or Mexican who had recently looked at her so boldly, just as Bertram had done and every one else. They all had the same look — all — and that look always said and wished and knew the same thing; and if one gave in to one of them one was lost. They took the one who happened to please them, and threw her away again. Yes, if one let herself be taken and thrown away. But she was not of that class. No, it had not gone that far with her. Passing adventures were not her style. If she had been created for that, how could she take the affair with Fritz so much to heart? And if she suffered such pangs of remorse and fear, it was only because that which she had done was so much against her nature. She hardly understood that it all had happened. There was no other way to explain it, than that it had come over her like a disease in these unbearably hot summer days, and had left her defenceless and weak. And just as the disease had come, so it would leave her again. Soon, soon. She felt in all her pulses, all her senses, in her whole body, that she was not the same as she had been formerly. She could hardly collect her thoughts. How feverishly they ran through her mind! She did not know what she wanted, what she hoped for, what she regretted, hardly knew if she were happy or unhappy. It could only be a disease. There were women in whom such a condition lasted a long time, and would hardly ever improve; such a one was Fortunata and that marble-white Fräulein Fallehn. There were others again whom it invaded or attacked and left soon after. That was her case. Most certainly. How otherwise could she have lived all these years since Ferdinand had gone, as chaste as a young girl and without desire? It only came over her this summer. All the women looked differently this year; the girls too — their eyes were brighter and bolder, and their behaviour was lighter, more enticing and seductive. And one heard such stories! What was that one about the doctor's young wife, who went out on the lake evenings with an oarsman and did not come home till the next morning? And about the two young girls who lay naked on the meadow just as the little steam-boat went by, and suddenly, before anyone could recognize them, had disappeared into the forest? Really, it was in the air this year. The sun had unusual strength, and the waves of the lake caressed her body more tenderly than ever before. And when that secret curse was lifted, would she again be as she had been, and could she slip through the hot adventures of these days and nights as if through an easily forgotten dream? And if she felt it coming again as she had felt it coming on this time, far in advance, when longing began to rage in her blood with dangerous intensity, she would be able to choose a much better and cleaner salvation than this time — she would marry again as other women did when they felt as she did. Then an ironic smile came to her lips, as if taken unawares. She thought of some one who had recently been there, one whom she credited with the most honourable intentions, the lawyer, Dr Teichmann. She saw him before her in a brand new green and brown sports suit, with a plaid tie, his green hat with the fur cockade placed dashingly on his head — in short in an outfit by which he openly wanted to show that he knew how to look very fetching, even though he, a very serious man under ordinary circumstances, placed no worth upon such superficialities. Then she saw him sitting at dinner on the veranda between her son and her lover, addressing now one, now the other, with the seriousness of a senior assistant master, and saw him in his ridiculous innocence which had tempted her to exchange hand-clasps playfully with her Fritz under the table. He had left the same evening, since he was to meet friends in Bozen, and although Beatrice had not invited him to remain, he seemed very much puffed up and full of hope on leaving, for in the gay mood of that summer day she had not deprived even him of encouraging and exciting looks. Now she regretted it as she regretted so much else; and her next conversation with him appeared all the more uncertain because in the complete relaxation of that hour, she was more painfully conscious of the gradual weakening of her will-power. With a similar feeling of shame, she recalled the feeling of helplessness that had at times come over her during her last talks with Director Welponer, and then it seemed to her that if she were to choose, she could sooner think of herself as the wife of the Director — yes she must admit that the notion did not lack charm for her. To-day she felt as if this man had interested her from earliest times. The things that the architect had told her about the grandiose speculations and battles of the Director, in which he had been victor over ministers and members of the court, were especially well calculated to arouse Beatrice's curiosity and admiration. Besides, Dr Teichmann, too, had called him a genius when speaking of him, and had compared him in the daring of his undertakings, which always meant everything to Teichmann, to a valiant cavalry-general. And so it flattered Beatrice a little that just this man seemed to want her, apart from the satisfaction that it would offer her of taking the husband away from the woman who had once robbed her of hers. "Has robbed me of mine?" she asked herself in confused surprise. "What is wrong with me? What am I thinking of? Do I believe it, then? It may not be true. Everything else, but not that. I should have noticed something of it. Noticed something? Why? Wasn't Ferdinand an actor, and a great one too? Why couldn't it have happened without my noticing it? I was so trusting, that it was not difficult to betray me. Not difficult — but that does not mean that it actually happened. Fritz is a gossip, a liar, and these rumours are false and stupid. And even though it did happen, it happened long ago. And Ferdinand is dead. And she who was once his love is an old woman. What does all the past mean to me? What is going on now between the Director and me is a new story, which has nothing to do with the past."

And she thought further, that in truth it wouldn't be so bad to retire some day into the noble villa with its great park. What wealth, what glamour! What an outlook for Hugo's future! Truly, he was no longer young, and that must be considered to some degree, especially when one was as pampered as she had been recently. Yes, during this very summer, during these last weeks, he seemed to be aging more rapidly than ever. Was not perhaps his love for her to blame? Well, what was the difference? There were others, younger ones, and he would be betrayed anyhow: it was evidently his lot. She laughed dryly: it sounded ugly and mean, and she jumped up as if out of a wild dream. "Where am I, where am I?" she asked herself. She wrung her hands entreatingly. "How deeply shall you let me sink? Is there no halting any more? What is it then that makes me so wretched and so contemptible? What makes me reach out into space, and to be no better than Fortunata and other women of her sort?" And suddenly, with a failing heart, she knew what made her so wretched: the foundation on which she had rested in certainty for years was trembling, and the Heavens were darkening over her: the only man she had ever loved, her Ferdinand, had been a liar. Yes — now she knew it. His whole life with her had been fraud and hypocrisy: he had betrayed her with Frau Welponer and with other women, with actresses, and countesses, and prostitutes. And when, on sultry nights, the languid charm of propinquity had driven him into Beatrice's arms, then it was the worst and lowest of all his lies, for she knew that on her breast he had thought of the others, all the others, in lust and malice. But why did she know it all of a sudden? Why? Because she was no different, no better than he. Was it Ferdinand whom she held in her arms, the comedian with the red flower, who often enough came home from the public-house at three in the morning, smelling of wine, swaggering, and babbling empty and unclean things, the one who as a young man had subordinated his higher passions to the favour of an old widow, and who in gay company read tender little notes that love-sick fools had sent to his dressing-room? No, that one she had never loved. She would have fled from that one in the first month of her marriage. He whom she loved was not Ferdinand Heinold: he was Hamlet and Cyrano and King Richard, and this one and that one, heroes and scoundrels, conquerors and martyrs, the blessed and the damned. And he who with strange fire had lured her into the summer night out of the secret darkness of their chamber to unutterable ecstasy, was not really he, but some sort of spirit full of hidden power out of the mountains, whose part he was playing without knowing it — for he always played a part, because he could not live without a mask, because he was afraid to see his real features reflected in her eyes. And so she had always betrayed him just as he had betrayed her and had constantly lived a life lost from the beginning, a life of fantastically wild lust — except that no one could have suspected it, not even she herself. But now it was revealed. She was destined to sink lower and lower, and some day — who knew how soon — it would be clear to the whole world that all her bourgeois respectability was a lie, that she was no better than Fortunata, Wilhelmine Fallehn and all the others whom till to-day she had despised. And her son would know it too; and if he did not believe the affair with Fritz, he would believe a next one — would have to believe it — and suddenly she saw him vividly before her with eyes wide open and full of pain, his arms outstretched in repulsion; and when she wanted to come near him, he turned around in horror, and hurried away with the fleetness of a dream. And she groaned aloud, suddenly wide awake. To lose Hugo? Everything, but not that. Better to die than to have her son no more. To die — yes. For then she would have him again. Then he would come to his mother's grave and kneel down and deck it with flowers and fold his hands in prayer for her. With that thought an emotion crept into her heart that was sweet and at the same time repulsive, and falsely peaceful. Still, deep within her, she heard a murmur: "Have I the right to rest? Haven't I much more to think about? Certainly — to-morrow we shall start out on our journey. To-morrow — how much there is to do — so much — so much—"

In the quiet dusk that surrounded her, she felt that outside, the world, people, and the landscape had awakened from their afternoon drowsiness. All sorts of distant sounds, indefinite and confused, came to her ears through the closed blinds. And she knew that people were already wandering on the roads, were rowing on the lake, were playing tennis, and drinking coffee on the hotel terrace — yes, in her still half dreaming condition, she saw swarms of happy summer-resorters, like tiny puppets, but real as life, bobbing up and down before her. The ticking of her watch on the night table sounded too loud in her ears, and like a warning. Beatrice was curious to know how late it was, but she still lacked the strength to turn her head or even to turn on the light. Some new, nearer sound, evidently from the garden, had become gradually more audible. What could it be? The voices of men, without a doubt. So near? Voices in the garden? Hugo and Fritz? How was it possible that they should both have returned so soon? Well, it was already evening, and Fritz had evidently been drawn back by his love. No doubt they had first rung the bell, and she had not heard it because she was asleep. Then they must have climbed over the fence; naturally they could not suspect that the mistress of the house was at home. Now one of the two was laughing out there. What laugh was that? It was not Hugo's laugh. But Fritz did not laugh like that either. Now the other was laughing. That was Fritz. Now again, the first one. That was not Hugo. He spoke. It was not Hugo's voice. Then Fritz was in the garden with someone else? They were quite near. It seemed as if both had sat down on the bench, on the white one under the window. And now she heard Fritz calling the other one by name. Rudi — Well, then, it was he who was sitting with Fritz under her window, But that was not so astonishing. Recently they had arranged in her presence that Rudi Beratoner should come back very soon. Perhaps he had been there earlier, had seen no one and then had met Fritz, whom love had brought back so soon from Ischl, at the railroad station or somewhere else. In any case, there was no reason why she should rack her brains about it. There they were, the two young men, sitting on the white bench under the window of the adjoining room. Now she must get up, dress, and go out into the garden. Why? Did she really have to go into the garden? Had she such a pressing desire to see Fritz again, or was she the least bit anxious to greet the shameless youth who recently had aped her dead husband's voice and facial expression with such disgraceful facility? Still there was nothing else for her to do, but to bid the young people good-evening. She couldn't keep so still for all the time that they remained out there gossiping about everything they pleased. That it could not be a very pure conversation, she could not doubt. Well, that did not concern her. They could say what they wished.

Beatrice had gotten up and was sitting on the edge of her bed. Then she heard a word with perfect clearness, the name of her son. Naturally, they were talking about Hugo, and what they were saying was not difficult to guess. Now they laughed again. But she couldn't understand the words. If she were very near the window, she might be able to understand the conversation, but perhaps it were better to forego that. She might experience some unpleasant surprises. In any case, it would be wisest to get ready as quickly as possible, and to go into the garden. But Beatrice was impelled to slip first very quietly to the closed blinds. She looked out through a small crack and could see nothing but a strip of green; then through another crack, a blue strip of sky. But now, she heard all the better what was being said on the bench. First, it was only the name of her Hugo that she could make out. Everything was so whispered and hushed, as if both of them had in mind the possibility of being overheard. Beatrice put her ear to the crack and smiled with a sigh. They were talking about school. Very clearly, she heard: "That horrid chap would have liked to flunk him." And then: "A mean dog." She slipped back, dressed quickly in a comfortable house gown; and then, driven by her uncontrollable curiosity, she went back to the window. And now she remarked that they were not talking any more about school. "A Baroness, is she?" That was Rudi Beratoner's voice. And now — pah — what a disgusting word— "He's with her all day long, — and to-day—" That was Fritz's voice. Against her will, she put her fingers to her ears, went away from the window and made up her mind to go immediately into the garden. But before she had reached the door, she was again driven to the window; she knelt down, put her ear to the crack, and looked out with wide-open eyes and burning cheeks. Rudi Beratoner was telling a story — at times he lowered his voice to a whisper, but from the single words that Beatrice gathered here and there, it became gradually dear to her what the affair was about. It was a love adventure of which Rudi was telling; Beatrice could make out French pet names which he pronounced in a sweet, gentle voice. Ah, evidently he was copying the manner of that person. He did that thing so remarkably well. Who slept in the adjoining room? His sister. Ah, it was the governess — More — more — how did it work? When the sister slept, the governess came to him. And then — and then —? Beatrice did not want to hear it, and yet she listened on and on, with growing eagerness. What words! What a tone! So this was how these boys spoke about their sweethearts! No, no, not all, and not about all. What a woman that must be! Surely she deserved it, that they should speak like that about her and not otherwise. But why did she deserve it? After all, what crime had she committed? It was only loathsome when they spoke about it. When Rudi Beratoner held her in his arms, he was surely very tender and had pure loving words for her — as they all had at those moments. If only she could see Fritz's face! Oh, she could picture it. His cheeks would burn and his eyes would glow. Now there was silence for a while. Evidently the story was finished.

And suddenly she heard Fritz's voice. He was asking: "What, must you know everything so exactly?" A heavy feeling of envy stirred in Beatrice. "What, do you want an answer to that?" Yes, Rudi Beratoner was speaking. Well, then, speak louder at least. I want to hear what you are saying, you rogue, who have insulted my husband in his grave, and who now are betraying and reviling your beloved. Louder! Oh, God, it was loud enough! He was not saying anything now — He was asking a question — he wanted to know — if Fritz — had here in town — yes, you blackguard — run riot with your own profane words! It will not help you. You shall not learn anything. Fritz is hardly more than a boy, but he is nobler than you. He knows what he owes a respectable woman who has shown him her favour. Isn't that so, Fritz, my sweet Fritz? — You'll not say anything, will you?

What held her so firmly rooted to the floor, that she could not get up, hurry out, and put an end to the shameful conversation? But what would it have helped? Rudi Beratoner was not the man to be so easily satisfied. If he did not get his answer to-day at this time, then he would repeat his question on the following day. It was best to remain there and continue to listen — then one knew where one was, at least. Why so softly, Fritz? Speak out. Why should you not glorify your happiness? A respectable woman like myself — that's quite different from a governess. Beratoner spoke louder.

Beatrice heard him say quite distinctly: "Then you must be a regular idiot." Ah, let them take you for an idiot, Fritz. Accept the title. What, you do not believe him, you rascal? You want to worm his secret out of him at all costs? Have you any suspicions? Has anyone told you already? And again she heard Fritz's whispering, though it was quite impossible to understand the words. Now again, Beratoner's voice, deep and coarse: "What, a married woman? Go on — would such a one ever—" Will you not keep still, you wretch? She felt that never in her life had she hated anyone as she hated this youth who insulted her without knowing that it was she whom he was insulting. What, Fritz? For heaven's sake, louder! "She has already gone away." Ah, excellent, Fritz, you want to protect me from insulting suspicions. She listened. She drank in his words. "A villa near the lake — her husband is a lawyer." What a rogue! How deliciously he lied! She might really have enjoyed it, if not for the fear that agitated her. What? The husband was horribly jealous? He had threatened to kill her if he discovered anything? What? Till four o'clock this morning? Every night — every — night — Enough, enough, enough! Will you not be still? Aren't you ashamed? Why do you defile me? If your fine friend does not know that it is I of whom you are speaking, still you do know it. Why don't you lie instead? Enough, enough! And she wanted to stop her ears, but instead of doing so, she listened all the more attentively. Not a syllable escaped her any more. And in despair, she heard from the lips of her boy the detailed description of those holy nights that he spent in her arms, heard it in words that beat down upon her like the lashes of a whip, in expressions that she heard for the first time, but that were quickly understood, and that brought bloody shame to her brow. She knew that everything that Fritz was saying out there in the garden was nothing but the truth, and yet she felt that it had already ceased to be the truth, that this contemptible chatter had turned what had been his and her happiness into filth and lies. And to him, she had belonged! He was the first to whom she had given herself since she was free! Her teeth chattered, her cheeks and brow burned, her knees sank weakly to the floor. Suddenly she drew back — Rudi Beratoner wanted to see the house. And how did it happen that the people had already gone away in the finest part of the summer? "I don't believe a single word of your story. A lawyer's wife? Ridiculous! Shall I tell you who it is?" She listened with her ears, with her soul, with all her senses. But no word came. But without looking, she knew that Beratoner was indicating the house with his eyes; he was pointing exactly to the window behind which she was kneeling.

And now came Fritz's answer: "What's the matter with you? You are quite crazy." Then the other one: "But you needn't say any more. I have already noticed it. Congratulations! Yes, not everyone has it so convenient. Yes — the — but il I wanted—" Beatrice could not hear more. She hardly knew how it happened. Perhaps it was the blood roaring in her brain that had drowned out Beratoner's last words. For a long time, the conversation outside was lost in this roaring, until she could again understand Fritz's words:

"Well, then, keep still. What if she's at home!" It's a little too late to think of that, my dear boy.

"Well, what if she is?" said Beratoner loudly and insolently. Then Fritz was whispering again in quick excitement, and suddenly Beatrice heard both of them getting up from the bench. For heaven's sake, what now? She threw herself flat on the floor, so that it would be impossible to espy her through the crack in the blind. Shadows passed before the blinds, steps crunched on the gravel path, a couple of muffled words, then a faint laugh farther away — and then nothing more.... She waited. Nothing stirred. Then she heard their voices dying away farther out in the garden — then nothing — for a long time — nothing, until she was certain they both were far away. They might have climbed over the fence as they had come, and might be telling each other their stories outside. Was there anything left to tell? Had Fritz forgotten anything? He would make up for it now. And in his delightful way, he would find a few more things to add in order to impress Rudi rightly. Why not? Yes, that was the gaiety of youth. One had his sister's governess, the other, the mother of his school friend, and the third, a Baroness, who formerly had been in the theatre. Yes, they had enough to say, these young men — they knew women and could rightly say that one was like the other.

And Beatrice wept silently to herself. She still lay outstretched on the floor. Why get up? Why get up now? When she would finally make up her mind to get up, it would be only to put an end to it all. Oh, to meet Fritz again, and the other one — She could spit in their faces, beat them with her fists. Wouldn't that be a solace and a joy? — to rush after them, to scream in their faces: "You boys, you wretches, aren't you ashamed, aren't you ashamed?" But at the same time, she knew that she would not do it. She felt that it was not worth the trouble, since she had decided and must remain decided to go on a path on which no scolding and no derision could follow her. Never, never, could she in her disgrace look anyone in the eyes again. She had but one more thing to do on this earth: to take leave of the one who was dear to her — her son! Of him alone! But naturally, without his noticing it. Only she would know that she was leaving him forever — that she was kissing the brow of her dear child for the last time — How strange it was to think such thoughts, lying stretched and motionless on the floor. If someone were to come into the room now, she would be taken for dead without fail. "Where will they find me?" she thought. "How shall I do it? How shall I arrange it, that I shall be lying here senseless, never to awaken again?"

A noise in the front room made her start. Hugo had come home. She heard him going down the hall, past her door, and opening his — and now there was silence again. He had returned. Now she was not alone any more. She got up slowly, with aching limbs. It was almost completely dark in the room and the air suddenly seemed unbearably sultry. She did not understand why she had been lying so long on the floor like that, and why she had not opened the blinds much sooner. She quickly did so now, and before her eyes spread the garden, the towering mountains, and the heavens darkening above her, and she felt as if she had not seen all this for many days and nights. The small world spread out in the evening light, so wonderful and peaceful that even Beatrice felt its calm. At the same time, however, she felt a fear creep gently into her mind. She must not let herself be deceived and confused by this peace. And she said to herself: "What I have heard, I have heard; what has happened, has happened. The quiet of this evening, the peace of this world, are not for me:

morning will come, the noises of the day will recommence; people will remain malicious and mean, and love, a filthy joke. And I am one who can never forget it, not in the daytime or in the night, not in solitude, or in new pleasure, not at home or abroad. And I have nothing more to do in this world than to place a farewell kiss on the brow of my beloved son, and go — What can he be doing there alone in his room?" From his open window a faint light shone out over the gravel and turf. Was he already in bed — weary after the joy and exertion of his trip? A shudder ran through her body, strangely composed of fear, horror, and longing. Yes, she longed for him, but for a different one than the one who lay in his room and who had the breath of Fortunata's body about him. She longed for the former Hugo, for the fresh, clean boy, who had once told her about the kiss of a little girl at the dance, for the Hugo who had driven with her one beautiful summer day over the country-side — and she wished for that time to return, when she herself was different — a mother, worthy of that son, and not a good-for-nothing woman, about whom spoiled boys dared gossip lewdly, as about any wanton. Ah, if there were only miracles! But there were none. Never could that hour be unmade when, with burning cheeks, on aching knees, with thirsty ears, she had listened to the story of her disgrace — and her happiness. Even in ten, in twenty, in fifty years, as an old man, Rudi Beratener would still remember this hour, when in his youth he had sat on a white bench in the garden of Frau Beatrice Heinold, and his school friend had told him how night after night, until early morning, he had lain in bed with her. She shuddered, she wrung her hands, she looked up to the heavens, whose clouds remained still as death and showed no surprise at her lonely agony. All sorts of noises from the street and lake came up to her in faint confusion; the mountains rose up darkly to the beckoning night, the yellow fields lay dully glowing in the twilight that was creeping in all around. How long would she remain here so motionlessly? What was she awaiting? Had she forgotten that Hugo might disappear out of the house just as he had come, to one who meant more to him than she? There was not much time to lose. Quickly she unbolted her door, went into the small salon, and stood before Hugo's room. For a moment she hesitated, listened, but heard nothing; then she opened the door hastily.

Hugo Was sitting on his divan and stared up at his mother with wide eyes, as if he had been frightened out of a restless sleep. Over his face played strange shadows from the uncertain light of the electric lamp, standing with its green shade on the table in the centre of the room. Beatrice remained for a moment at the door, Hugo threw his head back; it seemed as if he wanted to get up, but he remained seated, his arms extended, his hands resting flat on the divan. Beatrice felt the tension of this moment with heart-rending pain. An unequalled fear gripped her soul; and she said to herself, "He knows all.... What will happen?" she thought in the same breath. She went to him, forced herself to look happier, and asked: "Were you asleep, Hugo?"

"No, mother," he answered, "I was just lying down." She looked into a pale, miserable, childish face; unutterable sympathy, in which her own suffering was buried, arose within her; still trembling, she laid her hand on his tangled hair, then put her arm around him, sat down beside him, and gently began: "Well, my child—" Then she did not know what to say next. His face was violently distorted; she took his hands, he pressed hers distractedly, stroked her fingers and looked away; his smile was like a mask, his eyes reddened, his breast began to heave, and suddenly he slipped from the divan, lay at his mother's feet, put his head in her lap, and wept bitterly. Beatrice, shaken to the very depths, and yet happy in a way, for she felt that he had not become estranged from her, at first did not say a word, let him weep while she played quietly with his hair, and asked herself in terror:

"What can have happened?" And she comforted herself immediately: "Perhaps nothing unusual. Perhaps nothing except that his nerves are giving way." And she remembered very similar convulsive attacks that her dead husband had suffered for seemingly negligible reasons — after the excitement of a great rôle, after an experience that had wounded his artistic vanity, or entirely without ground, at least without any that she could discover. And suddenly she began to wonder whether Ferdinand did not sometimes cry out on her lap the disappointments and griefs that he had suffered at the hands of some other woman. But why did that trouble her? What he had done, he had expiated, and all that was far away, so far away! To-day it was her son who wept in her lap, and she knew that he wept because of Fortunata. With what pain did that realisation grip her heart! Into what depths did her own experience sink when she found herself in the presence of her son's mental agony! Whither did her disgrace and pain and desire for death flee, before the burning wish to help her dearly beloved child, who wept in her lap? And in overflowing desire to aid him, she whispered: "Don't cry, my boy. Everything will be all right again." And when he shook his head, as if in denial, she repeated in a firmer tone: "It will be all right again, believe me." And she realised that she had directed these words of consolation not only to her son, but to herself. If it were in her power to help her son out of his despair, to fill him with new courage for life, that promise and strength must arise out of this knowledge alone, and even more from his gratitude and the feeling that he could belong again solely to her. And suddenly the picture rose up before her of that fantastic landscape in which she had dreamed she was walking with Hugo, and a thought full of promise came to her: "If I were to undertake the voyage with Hugo, that I had been planning before that dreadful hour — and if we were never to return home from that journey? — And if out there, in foreign lands, far from all whom we know, in a purer atmosphere, we were to begin a new, a better life?—"

Then he suddenly raised his head from her lap — his eyes wandered, his mouth was distorted, and he cried hoarsely: "No, no, it will never be all right again!" And he got up, looked absently at his mother, took a few steps towards the table as if he were seeking something there, then walked up and down the room a few times with sunken head, and finally remained standing motionless at the window, his eyes turned to the night outside. "Hugo," called his mother, who had followed him with her eyes, but did not feel capable of getting up from the divan. And again, imploringly: "Hugo, my boy!" Then he turned to her again with that forced smile that was more painful than his weeping. And tremblingly she asked again: "What has happened?"

"Nothing, mother," he answered in a sort of exaltation.

Now she stood up decidedly and went over to him. "Do you know why I came to you?" He merely looked at her. "Well, guess." He shook his head. "I wanted to ask you if you wouldn't like to go on a short trip."

"A trip," he repeated, seeming not to understand.

"Yes, Hugo, a trip — to Italy. We have time; school does not open for three weeks. We can be back long before that. Well, what do you think of it?"

"I don't know," he answered. She put her arms around his neck. How much like Ferdinand he looked! Once he had played the part of such a young boy and had looked exactly like him. And she joked: "Well, if you don't know, Hugo, I do know very well that we are to take a journey. Yes, my boy, there's no more to say about it. And now dry your eyes, cool your forehead, and we'll go out together."

"Go out?"

"Yes, certainly. This is Sunday and there is no supper at home. Besides, we are to meet the others down at the hotel. And the moonlight party on the lake, don't you know that it is to take place to-day too?"

"Won't you go alone, mother? I could come for you later."

An extravagant fear suddenly seized her. Did he want her out of the way? Why? For pity's sake! She forced back the frightful thought. And controlling herself, she said: "Aren't you hungry?"

"No," he answered.

"Neither am I. How would it be to go first for a little walk?"

“For a walk?”

“Yes, and then take the little detour to the hotel.”

He hesitated for a while. She stood there in strained expectation. Finally, he nodded. “Good, mother, get ready.”

“Oh, I’m ready, I only need to get my coat.” But she did not budge. He seemed not to notice this, went to his wash basin, poured water out of the pitcher into his hands, and cooled his forehead, eyes, and cheeks. Then he ran his comb quickly through his hair a few times. “Yes, make yourself handsome,” said Beatrice. And she remembered sadly how often she had said these words in long past times to Ferdinand when he was preparing to go out — God knew where —

Hugo took his hat and said smilingly: “I am ready, mother.”

She hurried into her room, got her coat, and didn’t fasten it until she was again in Hugo’s room. “Now, come,” she said.

As both were leaving the house, the maid was just returning from her Sunday holiday. But although she greeted her mistress obsequiously, Beatrice noticed from the almost imperceptible way in which that person lowered her eyes, that she knew all that had been happening during the past weeks in this house — Still she cared little about that. Everything was indifferent to her now, next to the feeling of happiness, the long lost feeling, that she had Hugo at her side.

They walked on through the meadows under the mute blue night of the sky, close to each other, and as rapidly as if they had a goal. At first they said nothing. But before they entered the darkness of the forest, Beatrice turned to her son and said: “Won’t you take my arm, Hugo?” Hugo took her arm and she felt better. They walked on in the heavy shadows of the trees, through whose thick branches the light from some villa lying in its depths broke from place to place. Beatrice let her hand slip over to Hugo’s, she fondled it, lifted it to her lips, and kissed it. He did not hinder her. No, he knew nothing about her. Or was he just making the best of it? Could he understand it, though she was his mother? Soon they arrived at a broad, greenish-blue strip of light that lay before the gate of Welponer’s villa. Now they could see each other face to face, but they looked ahead into the dark that immediately swallowed them up again. In this part of the forest, the darkness was so thick, that they had to slow their steps in order not to stumble. “Look out,” said Beatrice from time to time. Hugo only shook his head and they held firmly on to each other. After a while they reached a path that, as they well knew from happier hours, led down to the lake. They turned down this path and again came into a faintly lighted place where the trees stood back and left an open meadow over which hung the still, starless sky. From here, a weather-beaten wooden stairway, on one side of which an unsteady hand-railing offered some support, led down to the road below, that to the right lost itself in the night, but to the left led again to the town from which countless lights shone up to them. In mute agreement, Beatrice and Hugo turned their footsteps in this direction. And as if their walk together through the dark, though speechless, still brought her closer to him, Beatrice said in a light, almost joking tone: “I don’t like it when you cry, Hugo.” He did not answer, but looked absently away from her over the steel-grey lake that now seemed to extend like a narrow strip beneath the mountains. “Formerly,” began Beatrice again, and there was a sigh in her voice, “formerly you told me everything.” And while she said that, she felt again as if she were saying these word to Ferdinand and as if she would learn all the secrets of her dead husband, that he had so disgracefully kept from her, when he was yet on earth. “Am I becoming insane?” she thought. “Am I already mad?” And as if to recall herself to the present, she snatched Hugo’s arm with such force, that he drew back frightened. But she went on: “Wouldn’t it be easier for you, Hugo, if you were to tell me about it?” And she clung to him again. But while her own question continued to sound within her, she felt that it was not only the wish to relieve Hugo’s soul that put this question into her mouth, but that a peculiar kind of curiosity had begun to rage in her, of which she was deeply ashamed in her heart. And Hugo, as if he guessed the secret disgrace of her question, answered nothing, and in fact, let his arm slip out of hers again, as if by accident. Disappointed and left alone, Beatrice walked beside him along the gloomy street. “What good am I on this earth,” she asked herself, “if I am not his mother? Is to-day the day to lose everything? Am I nothing more than a loose word in the mouths of spoiled boys? And that feeling of belonging to Hugo, of our common safety up there in the gracious dark of the forest, was all that only an illusion? Then life is no longer bearable, then everything is really over. But why does the thought frighten me? Was it not long ago decided? Did I not make up my mind earlier to put an end to it all? And did I not know that nothing else remained for me to do?” And trailing behind her, like jeering ghosts, hissed the terrible words that she heard to-day through the crack in the blind, and that meant her love and her shame, her happiness and her death. And for a moment, she thought in sisterly fashion of that other one, who once had run along the sea-shore pursued by evil spirits, weary with tormenting lust.

They were nearing the village. The light that now fell over the water just a few hundred feet away came from the terrace where the lively party were eating their evening meal and waiting for them. To enter once more into such a gay circle seemed madness to Beatrice; yes, entirely out of the realm of possibility. Why was she walking down this road? Why did she still remain at Hugo’s side? What cowardice had it been, that had made her wish to bid him farewell, him, to whom she was no more than a tiresome old woman who wanted to force herself in on his secrets? Then, suddenly, she saw his eyes again turned on her with a look of entreaty, that awakened new fears and hopes in her.

“Hugo,” she said.

And in tardy response to a question that she herself had already forgotten, he said: “It cannot be all right again. Telling will not help. It cannot.”

“But, Hugo,” she cried, as if newly emancipated, now that he had broken his silence. “Surely it will be all right; we are going away, Hugo, far away.”

“What good will that do us, mother?” Us? — Does that include me too? But isn’t it better that way? Aren’t we nearer to each other that way? He walked faster; she kept at his side — suddenly he stopped, looked out at the lake, and sighed deeply as if consolation and peace came to him from the solitude over the water. A few lighted row-boats were gliding out there. “Might that already be our party?” thought Beatrice casually. Certainly to-night they would have no moonlight. And suddenly an idea came to her: “How would it be, Hugo,” she said, “if we were to go out rowing alone?” He looked up at the sky, as if seeking the moon. Beatrice understood the look and said: “We don’t need the moon.”

“What are we going to do out there on the dark water?” he asked weakly. She took his head in her hands, looked into his eyes, and said: “You shall tell me about it. You shall tell me what has happened to you, as you always have done formerly.” She guessed that out in the friendly silence of the dark lake, his shyness, that now kept him from telling his mother what had happened, would leave him. Since she felt no resistance in his silence, she turned in decision towards the boathouse where her boat lay. The wooden door was not locked. She went into the dark boat-house with Hugo, unchained the boat hastily, as if there were no time to lose, then she swung over into the boat, and Hugo followed her. He took one of the oars, pushed away with it, and a second later, the open sky was over them. Now Hugo took the other oar and rowed along the shore, past the Lake Hotel, so near, that they could hear voices on the terrace. It seemed to Beatrice that she could hear the voice of the architect above the others. But she could not discern single figures or faces. How easy it was to flee from humanity! “What do I care what they are saying about me, what they think, or know —?

You simply push your boat away from the shore, you go so near to people that you can hear their voices, and — it already makes no difference! When one is not coming back—" It sounded deep within her, and she trembled a little — she sat at the rudder and steered the boat towards the middle of the lake. The moon had not yet come up, but the water around them surrounded the boat with a dull circle of light, as if it had preserved the sunlight within itself. At times a ray came from the shore, in which Beatrice imagined she saw Hugo's face becoming steadily fresher and freer from care. When they were quite far out, Hugo let the oars drop, took off his coat, and opened his collar. "How much like his father he looks," thought Beatrice in painful surprise. "But I did not know him when he was so young. And how beautiful he is. His features are nobler than Ferdinand's — and yet I never knew his real features, nor his voice. They were always the voices and faces of others. Am I seeing him to-day for the first time?" And she shuddered violently. But Hugo's features, now that the boat was entirely in the black shadow of the mountains, began gradually to grow hazy. He began to row again, but very slowly, and they hardly moved at all. "Now is the time," she thought, but she did not know for a moment for what it was time, until suddenly, as if awakened out of a dream, the burning wish returned to her mind to know Hugo's experience. And she asked: "Well, then, Hugo, what has happened?" He merely shook his head. But with growing excitement, she felt that he was no longer so firm in his refusal to speak. "Just speak to me, Hugo," she said. "You can tell me everything. I already know so much. You can hardly imagine—" And as if she might banish the last trace of the spell, she whispered into the night: "Fortunata." Through Hugo's body went a shudder, so powerful that it seemed to break the boat in two. Beatrice asked further: "You were with her to-day — and is this how you come back? What did she do to you, Hugo?" He was silent, rowed on rhythmically, and gazed into space. Suddenly, Beatrice was enlightened. She pressed her hands to her forehead, as if she did not understand why she had not guessed it earlier, and bending closer to Hugo, she whispered quickly: "The distant captain was there, was he not? And he found you with her?"

Hugo looked up. "The captain?"

Now for the first time, she realised that the man whom she meant was not a captain. "I mean the Baron," she said. "Was he there? He found you? He insulted you? He beat you, Hugo?"

"No, mother, the one you mention was not there. I do not know him at all. I swear it to you, mother."

"Then, what is it?" asked Beatrice. Doesn't she love you any more? Is she tired of you? Did she laugh at you? Did she show you the door? Is that it, Hugo?"

"No, mother." And he was silent.

"Well, then, Hugo, what is it? Do tell me."

"Don't ask me, mother, don't ask me any more. It's too horrible."

Now her curiosity burst into flame. She felt that from somewhere in the confusion of this day so full of puzzles, so full of old and new questions, she must find the answer. She groped in the air with both hands, as if she wanted to gather something that was scattered there. She slipped down from the seat at the rudder, and sat at Hugo's feet. "Now, then, speak," she began. "You can tell me everything. You need not be shy. I understand everything. I am your mother, Hugo, and I am a woman. Can you realise that? You must not be afraid that you can wound me, or offend my modesty. I have experienced much these past days. I am still not an — old woman. I understand everything. Too much, my son — you must not think that we are so far apart, Hugo, and that there are things that you must not say to me." She felt in her confusion how she was giving herself up, how she was decoying him. "Oh, if you knew, Hugo, if you only knew—"

And the answer came: "I know, mother."...

Beatrice trembled. Yet she felt no shame, only a relieved consciousness of being nearer to him and belonging to him. She sat at his feet at the bottom of the boat and took his hands in hers. "Tell me," she whispered.

And he spoke, but told her nothing. With heavy incoherent words he merely declared that he could never be seen among people again. What had happened to him to-day threw him forever out of the realm of the living.

"What has happened to you?"

"I was not in my right mind — I don't know what happened. They made me drunk."

"They made you drunk? Who, who? You were — not alone with Fortunata?" She remembered that she had seen him recently in the company of Wilhelmine Fallehn and the circus-rider. Then were they there? And with choking voice, she asked again, "What has happened?" But without Hugo's answer, she already knew. A picture painted itself before her eyes in the night, from which she wanted to turn in horror, but it followed her relentlessly and insolently behind her closed eyes. And in new, frightful suspicion she opened her eyes again, and turning them directly to Hugo sitting there in the darkness with tightly pressed lips, she asked: "Is it only since to-day that you know? Did they tell you over there?" He made no answer, but a shudder ran through' his body, so wild that it threw him weakly to the bottom of the boat beside Beatrice. She groaned aloud once in despair; and trembling forlornly, she grasped Hugo's feverishly shaking hands that he had stretched out to her. Now he left them in hers, and that did her good. She drew him nearer to her, pressed against him, and an agony of longing came from the depths of her soul and flowed mystically over to him. And both of them felt as if their boat, though it stood almost still, were moving on and on in growing speed. Whither was it taking them? Through what dream without aim? To what world without law? Did it ever have to go back to land? Dared it ever? Together they were bound on their everlasting journey; Heaven held no promise of morning for them in its clouds; and weakly succumbing to the anticipation of everlasting night, they gave each other their dying lips. The boat glided on, oarless to farther shores, and Beatrice felt that she was kissing one whom she had never known before, one who was her husband for the first time.

As she felt consciousness returning, she had enough strength of mind left to beware of a complete awakening. Holding both Hugo's hands tightly in hers, she stepped to the side of the boat. As it listed, Hugo's eyes opened in a look touched with a fear that bound him for the last time to the common lot of man. Beatrice drew her beloved, her son, her partner in death, to her breast. Understanding, forgiving, emancipated, he closed his eyes. But hers took in once more the grey bank rising up in the menacing dusk, and before the indifferent waves pressed between her eyes, her dying look drank in the shadows of the fading world.

Translated by Robert A. Simon, 1927

The final part of Schnitzler's 'Woman' trilogy, Fräulein Else was written as an interior monologue and first published in 1924. The protagonist is the daughter of a Viennese lawyer, who is spending a few days' vacation in the Trentino spa town of San Martino di Castrozza, financed by her aunt Emma. After finishing a game of tennis with Cissy and her cousin Paul, she receives a hurried letter from her mother, requesting that she ask the wealthy art dealer Dorsday for a desperately needed loan, as Else's father has embezzled funds belonging to his ward and is about to be arrested. Else approaches Dorsday and explains the difficult family situation to him.

He agrees to provide the necessary 30,000 guilders, but demands in return permission to view Else naked. Of course, she reacts with outrage to this request, but as the evening progresses, she recognises the dilemma she faces. Caught between unconditional loyalty to her father and a powerful longing for autonomy and self-determined womanhood, she cannot commit to either alternative. Rejecting the offer would mean abandoning her father to his fate; but accepting Dorsday's advances would amount to self-prostitution and thus relinquishing control over her own body.

Throughout this conflict, as Else constantly revisits her options, further aspects of her desires emerge, including a death wish and exhibitionistic urges, a need for love and a barely acknowledged striving for emancipation. In Else's pleasurable imagining of public exhibition and simultaneous shameful resistance to forced exposure before Dorsday, the recurring connection between male dominance over the feminine and a female striving for emancipation against it becomes strikingly apparent. Ultimately, however, it becomes clear that Else is unable to stand up to her father's demands and assert her own integrity.

Fräulein Else is a typical work of Viennese literary modernism, also known as aestheticism. It depicts the romantic and existential problems of the upper middle class. Schnitzler's work is permeated by the attempt to find adequate linguistic means of expression for the inner psychological processes of his characters, represented as actual real living beings. In Fräulein Else, this is achieved through the narrative form of the interior monologue. This gives the reader the impression that they are participating in the story, reacting directly to Else's thoughts from the protagonist's inner perspective. Schnitzler thus creates both identification with and distance from the heroine. The monologue-style reflection of inner reality is only occasionally interrupted by the direct depiction of external dialogues. In this way, Schnitzler succeeds in capturing a peculiar contrast between inner and outer reality.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

THE WORD "FILOU," which occurs frequently in this novel, is, originally, French argot, and cannot be translated literally. It has been carried into German, and it may mean anything from "flirt" to "roué," depending on the inflection of the voice. When the first syllable is accented, as in French, the word carries a playful implication; when the second is stressed, as in German, the expression is one of contempt. "Filou," as employed by Fraulein Else, may be approximated by the slang terms of "sheik" and "slicker," but as the word has no English equivalent, no attempt has been made to supply one.

Similarly, a few colloquialisms, such as "gnâdige Frau," and the greeting "Kuss die Hand" are also retained in the original.

FRÄULEIN ELSE

"So you really don't want to play any more, Else?"— "No, Paul, I really can't play any more. Adieu. — Auf Wiedersehen, gnadige Frau."— "Oh, Else, why don't you call me Frau Cissy — or better yet, just plain Cissy?"— "Auf Wiedersehen, Frau Cissy"— "But tell me, why are you going already? Dinner won't be ready for at least two hours."— "Please go ahead, Frau Cissy, and finish at singles with Paul. Really, it's no fun playing with me today."— "Leave her alone, dear lady. She's in one of her moods today. — As a matter of fact, Else, being moody is most becoming to you. — And as for the red sweater you're wearing — that's even more so."— "Well, Paul, I do hope you'll find me sweeter tempered in blue. Adieu."

That was rather a good exit. Here's hoping Paul and Cissy don't think me jealous. — I'll swear there's something between the two, but nothing in the world worries me less. — I think I'll turn around again and wave to them. Wave to them and smile. Now, don't I look gracious? — Oh, Heavens, they're playing again. As a matter of fact, I play a much better game than Cissy; and Paul really isn't exactly a champion. — But he is handsome with his open collar and that naughty look. If only he weren't so affected. Don't worry, Aunt Emma, so far as I am concerned....

What a perfectly wonderful evening! This should have been the right sort of weather for a trip to the Rosetta Camp. How gorgeously the Cimone towers up into the sky! — We should have started at five o'clock in the morning. Of course, I would have felt miserable, as usual, when we began — but that feeling soon wears off. — There's nothing more divine than wandering through the gray of the morning. — That one-eyed American at the Rosetta looked like a prize-fighter. Perhaps someone knocked his eye out in a fight. I'd rather like to be married in America, but not to an American; or perhaps it would be pleasant to marry an American, and then live in Europe. A villa on the Riviera with marble steps going into the sea. — How long is it since we were in Mentone? It must be seven or eight years. I was thirteen or fourteen at the time. Ah, yes, those were the days when we were in better circumstances. — It really was silly to postpone the outing. We'd have been back by now. — At four o'clock, as I was going out to play tennis, the special delivery letter about which Mother telegraphed hadn't arrived. Perhaps it's here now. I might just as well have played another set. — Why are those two young people greeting me? I don't know them. They've been living here at the hotel since yesterday and have been taking their meals at the left side in the dining room, where the Dutchmen used to sit. Did I nod back ungraciously or haughtily? I didn't mean to act that way. What did Fred call me on the way home from "Coriolanus"? High-spirited. No, disdainful. You're disdainful, not high-spirited, Else. — Those are nice words. He's always finding nice words. — Why am I walking so slowly? Can it be that I'm afraid of the news in Mother's letter? Well, I can't expect anything very pleasant. Why a special delivery letter? Perhaps she wants me home again. Ah me, what a life — in spite of the silk stockings and the silk sweater. I have three pair — I, the poor relative, invited out by her rich aunt. I'm sure she's already sorry she invited me. Dear Auntie, shall I put it in writing for you that I don't love Paul — even in my dreams? Oh, Lord, I don't dream about anybody. I'm not in love and I never have been. I wasn't even in love with Albert, though I may have imagined so for days and days. I think that I just can't fall in love with anyone. That's really remarkable, for I'm certainly a sensualist. But still, I'm proud and haughty. Thank Heaven for that! The first time I really was in love was when I was thirteen. I was in love with Van Dyck and still more in love with the Abbé des Grieux and also with Renard. And at the Worthersee when I was sixteen years old. — Well, no, that really wasn't anything. Oh, why am I reminiscing about all these things? I'm not writing my memoirs. I don't even keep a diary like Bertha. Fred rather attracts me — nothing more. Perhaps, if he had a little more swank. There; I have it. I'm a snob. Father knows it and always laughs at me. Oh, dear Father, you worry me a great deal. I wonder whether he has ever deceived Mother. Has he? Of course, he has. Often. Mother's rather stupid. She really knows nothing about me at all. Neither do other people. As for Fred — well, yes, but only very slightly. — Perfectly heavenly evening. The hotel's all gayly bedecked. One gets the impression of many prosperous care-free people. Me, for instance. Ha ha. It's too bad, because I really was born for a care-free life. It might have been so wonderful. It's a pity. — Now there's a red glow over the Cimone. Paul might look at it and call it an Alpine glow. As a matter of fact, that's far from an Alpine glow. It's beautiful enough to make you weep. Oh, why does one ever have to return to the city!

"Good evening, Fräulein Else."— "Küss' die Hand, gnädige Frau."— "Back from tennis?" — She can see I'm back from tennis. Why does she ask me? "Yes, indeed, we played almost three hours. Are you taking a walk?"— "Yes, the usual evening constitutional down the lane. There's such a beautiful path between the two meadows, but during the daytime it's almost too sunny."— "Yes, the meadows here are gorgeous, especially so from my window by moonlight."— "Good evening, Fräulein Else"— "Küss' die Hand, gnädige Frau."— "Good evening, Herr von Dorsday."— "Back from tennis, Fräulein Else?"— "How observant you are, Herr von Dorsday."— "Please don't make fun of me, Else." — Why doesn't he call me "Fräulein Else"?— "Anyone who looks so beautiful with a tennis racket is justified in carrying it for decorative purposes." — The ass! I just won't answer that at all. "We were playing all afternoon. There were only three of us, Paul, Frau Mohr and myself."— "I was a ranking tennis player in my day."— "And aren't you any longer?"— "No, I'm too old for that now."— "Old? Why, in Marienlyst there was a Swede who was sixty-five years old. He played every evening from six to eight, and the year before that he played through a whole tournament."— "Well, I'm neither sixty-five as yet, thank Heaven, nor, unfortunately, a Swede." — Why unfortunately? I suppose he thinks that's funny. The best thing for me to do is to laugh politely and just leave. "Küss' die Hand, gnädige Frau. Adieu, Herr von Dorsday." What a deep bow he makes and what calves' eyes! I wonder whether I insulted him by referring to the sixty-five-year-old Swede. That doesn't matter. Frau Winawer must lead an unhappy life. She's fifty, at least. Those tear sacs of hers — as though she had wept a great deal in her day. How terrible it must be to be so old! Dorsday is walking over toward her. There he is walking along at her side. He still looks rather well with his grayish Van Dyke beard. But I can't feel at all attracted to him. He's only a social climber. What good does your first-class tailor do you, Herr von Dorsday? — Dorsday, rather. I'm sure your name used to be something else. — Here comes that sweet young girl of Cissy's with her Fräulein. "God bless you, Fritzi. Bon soir, mademoiselle. Vous allez bien?"—'

'Merci, Mademoiselle. Et vous?"— "Well, Fritzi, I see you're carrying an Alpine stick. Are you going to climb to the top of the Cimone?"— "No, I'm not allowed to climb as high as that."— "Perhaps you'll be allowed to next year. Good-bye, Fritzi. A bientôt, Mademoiselle."— "Bon soir, Mademoiselle."

A most attractive person. I wonder why she ever became a nurse girl — and why did she ever work for Cissy? It must be a mean life. Oh, Heavens, just to think that the same thing might happen to me! But of course it wouldn't, for I'm very accomplished. — Accomplished? — What a priceless evening! "The air is like champagne." That's what Dr. Waldberg said yesterday. And the day before yesterday somebody else said it. — I wonder why people will stay indoors in wonderful weather like this. I just can't understand it. Or is everyone waiting for a special delivery letter? The porter has just seen me. If there had been a special delivery letter he would have brought it to me immediately. Well, thank God, there's none there. I'll lie down a while before dinner. Why does Cissy say "dîner"? That's a stupid affectation. They're just like one another, Cissy and Paul. — Oh, I wish the letter were here already. It'll probably show up at "dîner," and if it doesn't show up then I'll have a restless night. I slept so miserably last night. I'll take my veronal today. But I'll get used to that. No, my dear Fred, you mustn't worry about me. In my thoughts I'm always with you. — One ought to try everything, even hashish. I think that Ensign Brandel brought some with him from China. Is hashish drunk or smoked? It's supposed to give you marvelous visions. Brandel invited me to drink — or smoke — hashish with him. — Rather impertinent on his part — but he is handsome.

"Please, a letter for you, Fraulein — So it's the porter. — I'm turning toward him quite casually. Perhaps it's only a letter from Caroline, or from Bertha, or Fred or Miss Jackson. "Many thanks." It's a special delivery letter from Mother. Why didn't he tell me immediately that it was a special delivery letter? "I see it's a special delivery letter." I shan't open it until I get to my room and then I'll read it all by myself. — There goes the Marchesa. Doesn't the dusk make her look young! I'm sure she's forty-five. I wonder where I'll be at forty-five. Possibly dead. — I hope so. She's smiling at me just as pleasantly as always. I'll pass by, nodding a little, and show her that the smile of a Marchesa doesn't make too much of an impression on me. "Buona sera." — She bids me buona sera. Well, now I really must bow slightly. I wonder whether I bowed too deeply. She really is ever so much older. What a wonderful walk she has! I wonder if she's divorced. My walk is beautiful, too, but — I'm aware of it. That's the difference. — An Italian might be dangerous for me. It's a pity that the good-looking dark one with the Roman head left so soon. Paul said he looked like a Filou. My goodness, I've nothing against Filous! In fact, quite the opposite. — So, here I am at Number Seventy-seven. Seventy-seven really is a lucky number. Beautiful room. The pine wood is lovely. — Now we have a real Alpine glow. Even so, I shan't admit it to Paul. Paul's really rather shy. He's a doctor and a woman's specialist as well. Perhaps he's shy for that very reason. The day before yesterday when we were walking in the forest we were so far away from everyone that he might have been a bit more forward, only it would have done him no good. As for being forward, no one ever has tried it with me. Oh, possibly when we were swimming three years ago in the Wörthersee. But, forward: no, he was just plain indecent — handsome as he was.

He was a real Apollo Belvedere, though I didn't realize it at the time. But still I was only sixteen. There's my heavenly meadow. My —! Oh, I wish I could carry you back with me to Vienna. What beautiful mist! Is it really autumn? Of course it is. Today's the third of September and we are high up in the mountains.

Well now, Fräulein Else, will you finally make up your mind to read that letter? It doesn't necessarily concern Father. Couldn't it possibly contain some news about my brother? Perhaps he's engaged to one of his old flames. Perhaps to a chorus girl or a shop girl. Oh, no, he'd be too clever to do that. I really know nothing about him at all. When I was sixteen and he twenty-one he confided a great many of his affairs to me, especially as they concerned a certain Lotte; but all of a sudden he stopped. Lotte must have done something to him. And since then he's confided no more. — Well, here I've opened the letter without even noticing it. I'll sit down on the window sill and read it. I must take care that I don't fall out. According to advices from San Martino, a lamentable accident happened at the Hotel Fratazza. Fräulein Else T. a beautiful nineteen-year-old girl, daughter of the well-known lawyer... Of course, they'll say that I committed suicide over an unhappy love affair, or worse. Unhappy love affair? I should say not.

"My dear child". — I'll look at the end first. "So again, do not be angry with us, my dear, good child, and be a thousand times—" For Heaven's sake, they haven't killed themselves!! No; in that case there'd be a telegram from Rudi. "My dear child, you can believe me how sorry we are that into your pleasant weeks of vacation" — as though I didn't always have a vacation, unfortunately— "we must intrude with such unpleasant news." — Mother has a fearful style. "But after mature consideration nothing else remains for me. Briefly and to the point, Father's situation has become acute. I don't know what to think or do." — Why so many words?— “It involves a comparatively ridiculous sum — thirty thousand gulden,” — ridiculous?— “which must be obtained in three days, else all is lost.” — For Heaven’s sake, what does that mean?— “Think of it, my dear child, the Baron Honing” — who, the district attorney?— “summoned Father to his office today. You know, of course, how the Baron respects Father. Yes, even loves him. A few years ago, when matters also hung by a hair, he spoke personally to the chief creditors and put affairs in shape at the last moment. But this time nothing can be done if the money is not forthcoming. Besides the fact that we shall be ruined, there will be a scandal, the like of which there has never been. Think of it. A lawyer, a famous lawyer — who — no, I cannot write it down. I fight constantly against tears. You know, child, for you are intelligent, we have been, God help us, several times in similar situations and the family has always helped us out. Last time, one hundred twenty thousand were involved. But that time Father had to sign an agreement that he never would approach our relatives again, especially Uncle Bernhard.” — Well, go on, go on. What’s the point? What can I do about it?— “The only one of whom I could think as a last resort would be Uncle Victor, but he, unfortunately, is on a journey to the North Cape or Scotland” — yes, he’s well off, the nasty fellow— “and he is absolutely unreachable, at least for the time being. Among Father’s colleagues, especially, Dr. Sch. who frequently has helped out Father” — good Lord, how do we stand there?— “is no longer to be thought of, now that he has married again.” — Well, what then? What do you want me to do?— “And now a letter has come, my dear child, in which you mention among others, Dorsday, who is also staying in Fratazza, and that seems like a stroke of Fate. You know how often Dorsday came to visit us in former years.” — Well, not so often. “It is sheer accident that we have seen him less frequently in the last two or three years; he is supposed to be deeply entangled — between you and me, nothing very fine.” — Why “between you and me”? — “At the Residenzklub Father plays whist with him every Thursday and in the past winter he saved him a pretty piece of money in an action against another art dealer. Furthermore, why should you not know it? He came to your father’s assistance before.” — I thought so. “That time only a mere bagatelle was involved — eight thousand gulden — but after all, thirty isn’t a great sum for Dorsday. So I wondered whether you could not do us a favor and speak to Dorsday.” — What?— “He always liked you particularly.” — Never noticed it. He stroked my cheeks when I was twelve or thirteen years old. “Quite a young lady already.”— “And as Father, luckily, has not approached him again since the eight thousand, he probably will also not decline this favor. He is supposed to have made eighty thousand a few days ago on a Rubens which he sold to America. Naturally, you may not mention this.” — Do you think I’m a goose, Mother?— “But otherwise you can talk to him quite frankly. You might also mention, if occasion arises, that Baron Honing has summoned Father, and that with thirty thousand the worst will be averted, not only for the time being, but, God willing, forever” — do you really believe that, Mother?— “for the Erbesheimer case, which seems to be brilliantly promising, will surely bring Father a hundred thousand. But, of course, he cannot demand anything from Erbesheimer in this instance. So I beg of you, my child, speak to Dorsday. I assure you there is no harm in it. Father could simply have telegraphed him — we discussed it seriously — but it is something quite different, my child, when one speaks face to face with a person. The money must be here on the fifth, at noon. Dr. F.” — Who is Dr. F.? Oh, yes, Fiala. “is implacable. Of course, there is also personal ill-feeling in the matter, but as, unfortunately, it concerns trust funds” — for Heaven’s sake, Father, what have you done?— “we can do nothing. And if the money is not in Fiala’s hands by twelve noon on the fifth, he will ask an order of arrest. Baron Honing will restrain him that long. So Dorsday would have to transfer the amount by telegraph through his bank to Dr. F. Then we are saved. Otherwise, God knows what will happen. Believe me, you will not reproach yourself in the least, my dear child. Father was doubtful at first. He even made efforts in two directions, but he came home quite in despair,” — can Father ever be in despair?— “perhaps not so much because of the money, but because people have acted so shamefully toward him. One of them was once Father's best friend. You can imagine whom I mean." — I can imagine nothing at all. Father has had so many best friends and actually none at all. Possibly Warnsdorf?— "Father came home at one o'clock and now it is four o'clock in the morning. He is sleeping at last, thank God." — It might be best for him if he never woke up. "As soon as possible I shall post this letter myself, special delivery, so that you will receive it on the morning of the third." — How did Mother think that possible? She never knows her way about in these things. "So speak at once with Dorsday, I beseech you, and telegraph at once how it came out. Do not, for God's sake, let Aunt Emma notice anything. It is sad enough that in a case like this one cannot turn to one's only sister, but one might just as well speak to a stone. My dear, dear child, I am so sorry that you must live through such things in your youth, but believe me, Father is only in the smallest way at fault." — Who then, Mother?— "Now we hope to God that the Erbesheimer case will, in every respect, mark a change in our affairs. Only, we shall have to survive these few weeks. It would surely be irony if a catastrophe occurred over the thirty thousand gulden." — She doesn't mean seriously that Father will commit — But would not the other be even worse?— "Now I close, my child. I hope that in any circumstance" — in any circumstance?— "you will be able to remain in San Martino at least until the ninth or tenth. You must not return, in any case, for our sake. Remember me to your aunt — continue to be nice to her. So again, do not be angry with us, my dear good child, and be a thousand times" — Yes, I know that already.

So, I am to solicit Herr von Dorsday.... Idiotic. What does Mother take me for? Why didn't Father simply hoard a train and come up here immediately? — He would have arrived at the same time as the special delivery letter. But perhaps they might have caught him at the station — that would have been terrible. I'm sure no one will help us out with thirty thousand gulden. Always the same story for the last seven years. No, even longer than that. Who would believe it to look at me? No one would believe it to look either at Father or at me, and yet everybody knows it. It's a miracle that we still can keep our heads up. One becomes used to things quickly. As a matter of fact, we're living quite well. Mother's really an artist. It seems inconceivable that we had a dinner for fourteen people last New Year's — but the two pair of party gloves I had — oh, they were a sad affair. And when Rudi wanted three hundred gulden recently, Mother almost wept. But Father's always good-natured. Always? No, not always. When we heard "Figaro" recently, a look came over his face suddenly that really frightened me. — In a moment he seemed to become an altogether different man. — But after the opera we dined at the Grand Hotel and then he was just as brilliant as ever.

And now I'm holding the letter in my hand. The letter's altogether idiotic. I'm to speak to Dorsday. I'd just die of shame. — Shame? Why, what have I to be ashamed of? I'm not to blame. — If I only could speak to Aunt Emma. But that's nonsense. She probably hasn't as much money as all that to give away. And Uncle is nothing more than a miser. O God, why haven't I any money? Why haven't I ever earned anything? Why didn't I ever study? Oh, I've learned something. No one can say that I'm altogether unaccomplished. I play the piano; I can speak French, English and a little Italian; I've attended lectures. — Haha! And even if I had done more worth-while things than that, what good would they do me now? Certainly I couldn't have saved thirty thousand gulden by this time. —

The Alpine glow has died out. The evening's no longer wonderful. The surroundings seem sad. No, not the surroundings, but life itself is sad, and here I'm sitting quietly on the window sill, and Father is to be locked up. No, never, never! It mustn't be! I'll save him! Yes, Father, I'll save you! It's very simple. Just a few nonchalant words in my best manner. — Haha. I'll treat Herr Dorsday as if it were an honor for him to lend us money. And it is an honor. — Herr von Dorsday, possibly you have a few moments' time for me. I've just received a letter from Mother. She's temporarily embarrassed — rather, Father— "Why, certainly, my dear lady, with the greatest of pleasure. How much is involved?" — I wish he didn't have this revolting effect on me. And the manner he has of looking at me! No, Herr Dorsday, I'm not taken in by your elegant manner and your monocle and your air of nobility. You might just as well be an old-clothes man as an art dealer. — But, Else, Else, what makes you say a thing like that? — Oh, I can permit myself a remark of this sort. Nobody notices it in me. I'm even a blonde, a strawberry blonde, and Rudi looks absolutely like an aristocrat. Of course, one can notice it easily in Mother, especially in her speech, but not at all in Father. Really they ought to notice it in me. More than that — let them notice it. I don't deny it and certainly Rudi doesn't. Quite the contrary. I wonder what Rudi would do if Father were put in jail. Would he shoot himself? What nonsense! Shooting and jail — all these things don't happen. They just appear in the newspapers. —

The air is like champagne. In an hour we'll have dinner— "dîner." I just can't bear Cissy. She doesn't care the least bit about her little girl. What shall I wear? The blue or the black one? Black seems to be the right color for today. Too décolleté? Toilette de circonstance, as they say in French novels. At all events, I must look seductive when I interview Dorsday. After the dîner, I'll act nonchalantly. He'll stare his eyes out. Odious fellow. I hate him. I hate all people. Must it be Dorsday? Is Dorsday really the only person in the whole world who has thirty thousand gulden? Suppose I tell Paul about it. If he told Aunt that he had gambling debts he'd certainly be able to get the money. — It's almost dark now. Night. Deathly night. Oh, I wish I were dead. — It just can't be true. Couldn't I go down right now and speak to Dorsday before dinner? Oh, how terrible! — Paul, if you give me thirty thousand you may have anything of me that your heart desires. No, that speech also comes out of a novel. The noble daughter sells herself for the sake of her beloved father and ends up by finding great joy in it. Oh, that's terrible. No, Paul, you can't have me even for thirty thousand. But for a million? — Or for a palace, or for a pearl necklace? If I marry some day I'll probably do it cheaper. Is it actually so bad? Fanny really sold herself. She told me that her husband makes her shudder. How would you like it, Father, if I auctioned myself off this evening just to save you from prison? It would make a sensation. —! I have fever, I'm sure of it. Perhaps it's the air, like champagne. — If Fred were only here he could advise me. I need no advice. There's no advice to give. I'll talk to Herr Dorsday of Eperies and I'll appeal to him, I, the haughty, the aristocrat, the Marchesa, the beggar-maid, the embezzler's daughter. How have I come to this? No one is a better climber than I am; no one has so much spunk. I'm a sporting girl. I should have been born in England, or else been a Countess.

There are my clothes hanging in the closet. I wonder whether the green felt has already been paid for, Mother. Only one installment, I think. I'll wear the black one. They all stared at me yesterday, even the pale little man with the golden pince-nez. I don't look exactly beautiful today but I do look interesting. I should have gone on the stage. Bertha already has had three lovers and no one thinks less of her for it. In Düsseldorf it was the manager. In Hamburg she lived with a married man at the Atlantic Hotel — rooms with bath. I'm sure she's proud of it. They're all stupid. I'll have a hundred lovers, a thousand; why not? Is the décolleté deep enough? If I were married it could be even deeper. — How fortunate, Herr von Dorsday, that I meet you here. I've just received a letter from Vienna... I'll take the letter with me in case of emergency. Shall I ring for the maid? No, I'll dress myself alone. I need no one to help me with the black gown. If I were rich I'd never travel without a personal maid.

I'd better turn on the light. It's getting cool, so I'll close the window. — It won't be necessary to pull down the shade. Nobody's standing over there on the hill with a telescope. — Herr von Dorsday, I've just received a letter. — Oh, perhaps it'll be better to do it all after dinner when both of us will be in a lighter mood. It might do me good to drink a glass of wine first. On the other hand, dinner would prove very much more appetizing if I finished the whole business beforehand. — All these wonderful dishes: Pudding à la merveille, fromage et fruits divers. Yes, but what if Herr von Dorsday should say No? — And suppose he grew impertinent. Oh, no, nothing like that could happen. No one ever has been impertinent with me. Of course, Brandel, the young marine lieutenant, went a little too far, but he was so good-natured about it all. — I am getting thin again. That's becoming to me. — Darkness is peering in again — peering in like a ghost — like a hundred ghosts. Ghosts are rising up out of the meadow. How far away is Vienna? How long ago did I leave it? Oh, I feel so all alone! When will I marry? Who would marry the daughter of an embezzler? — Herr von Dorsday, I've just received a letter. "Oh, Fräulein Else, pray don't waste your breath talking to me about it. Just yesterday I sold a Rembrandt. Pray, Fräulein Else, don't shame me by mentioning it." And now he's tearing a page out of his check book and signing it with his golden fountain pen; and tomorrow morning I'll take the train to Vienna. Oh, yes, I'll do that in any case, check or no check. I can't stay here any longer. I can't, and I won't. I'm living here as a smart, elegant young woman, while Father is back there in Vienna with one foot in the grave — or rather in jail. — Well, so this is the last pair of silk stockings. But nobody can notice the little rip under the knee. No one? Who can tell? Don't be frivolous, Else, — Bertha's nothing but a hussy. But is Christine even the least bit better? Her future husband has a pleasant prospect ahead of him. I'm sure Mother was always a faithful wife. But I'll never be faithful. I'm haughty, but I'll never be faithful. Filous attract me too much. I am sure that the Marchesa is in love with a Filou. If Fred knew me as I really am, his veneration for me would disappear at once. "Everything would have been possible for you, Fräulein. You could have been a pianist, or a bookkeeper, or an actress. There is no end of possibilities in you, but you have always been too well off." Too well off. Haha. Fred overestimates me. As a matter of fact, I've no talent at all. — Who knows, I might have gone as far by this time as Bertha, but I lack energy. A young woman of good family. — Haha, good family! And the father embezzles trust funds. Why did you do this to me, Father? If only you had something to show for it — but gambling on the exchange! Is the effort worth it? And the thirty thousand won't help you, either. It might for three months. But in the end you'd be ruined. A year and a half ago you were almost in the same position as you are now. Help came then, but some time help won't come, and then what will happen to us? Rudi'll go to the Vanderhulst bank in Rotterdam, but what'll become of me? A wealthy husband. Oh, if I could only concentrate on that! Today I'm really beautiful. It's probably because I'm excited. For whom am I beautiful today? Was I happier while Fred was here? Oh, Fred isn't really the right man for me. He isn't a Filou, but I'd marry him if he had money. And then, no doubt, a Filou would come along — and the fun would begin. — Herr von Dorsday, wouldn't you like to be a Filou? — At a distance you sometimes look like one. Just like a dissipated vicomte, like a Don Juan — with your stupid monocle and your white flannel suit. But, really, you aren't a Filou at all. — Have I everything? Am I ready for dinner? — But what is there to do for a whole hour in case I don't meet Dorsday? What if he's walking with Frau Winawer? She really isn't unhappy at all. She doesn't need thirty thousand gulden. Well, then I'll sit down in the hall, look magnificent in a fauteuil, skim over the Illustrated News and the Vie Parisienne, cross my legs, — no one will notice the rip under the knee. Perhaps a millionaire has just arrived. — I'll take along the white shawl. It's becoming to me. I'll throw it carelessly over my gorgeous shoulders. For whom have I gorgeous shoulders? I could make a man happy, if the right man for me only existed. But I'll not have children. I'm not maternal. Marie Weil is maternal. So is Mother. Aunt Irene is maternal. I have a noble brow and a beautiful figure. "If I only were permitted to paint you as I want to, Fräulein Else." — Yes, that would please you. I don't even remember his name. I know that it wasn't Titian; therefore, it was just plain impertinence. — I've just received a letter, Herr von Dorsday. — I need a bit more powder on my throat and neck, a drop of Verveine in my handkerchief. So; I'll lock the cabinet, open the windows. Oh, it's too marvelous for tears! I'm nervous. Hasn't one the right to be nervous under circumstances like these? I'll put the box with the veronal in it under my chemises. I need new chemises too. That'll be another nuisance. Oh, Lord!

It's uncanny, that enormous Cimone, as if it were ready to fall down on me. Not a star yet in the sky. The air is like champagne! And the perfume from the meadows! I'll live in the country. I'll marry a landowner and have children. Possibly the only man with whom I might have been happy was Dr. Froriep. What wonderful evenings those two were — first at Kniep and then at the Artists' Ball. Why did he disappear so suddenly? Perhaps because of Father. Yes; that's probably it. I'll blow a kiss up into the air before I go downstairs to that rabble. But to whom shall I send my greeting? I'm all alone. No one can imagine how terribly alone I am. Good evening, my lover! Who? Good evening, my bridegroom! Who? Good evening, my friend! Who? — Fred? — Hardly. I'll keep the window open even if it is growing cool. I'll turn on the light.

So. — Yes, that's right. Here's the letter. I'll take it with me to be prepared for any emergency. I'll keep the book there on the table. No matter what happens I'll read further tonight in "Notre Cœur." Good evening, lovely lady of the looking-glass. Think well of me. Farewell....

Well, why do I lock the door? Nothing will be stolen here. I wonder whether Cissy leaves her door open at night, or does she open it only after he knocks? I wonder whether it's quite safe. Oh, certainly it is. — The stairs are altogether empty. They always are at this time. My steps are echoing. I've been here three weeks now. I left Gmunden on the twelfth of August. Gmunden was a bore. I wonder where Father got the money to send Mother and me to the country. And even Rudi traveled for four weeks. God knows where he traveled. He didn't write twice during the whole time. I just can't understand our way of living. Mother no longer has any jewelry. — I wonder why Fred was in Gmunden for only two days. I'm sure he has a mistress there, though it doesn't seem possible. Nothing seems possible. He hasn't written to me for a whole week. He writes lovely letters. — Who's that sitting over there at the little table? No, it isn't Dorsday. Thank God for that. It would be impossible to talk to him now before dinner. — Why is the porter looking at me so curiously? I wonder whether he read Mother's special delivery letter. Am I going crazy? I must give him a tip soon again. — The blonde over there is already dressed for dinner. How can anybody be as fat as that? — I'll go out in front of the hotel and stroll up and down a bit, or shall I go into the music room? Isn't someone playing there? It sounds like a Beethoven Sonata. How can anyone play a Beethoven Sonata in this place? I've neglected my piano playing. As soon as I return to Vienna I'll practice regularly again. In fact, I'll start an entirely new life. We all must do that. Nothing like this must ever happen again. I'll talk to Father in all seriousness — if there's still time for it. There'll be time. There certainly will. Why haven't I done it already? Everything at home is settled in a jesting manner and yet none of us is really gay at heart. Each is really afraid of the other and each is all alone, by himself. Mother's alone just because she isn't bright enough and doesn't know anything about anyone. She knows nothing about me, nor about Rudi, nor about Father. But she doesn't know that she doesn't know and neither does Rudi. He's really a good, handsome fellow, but he gave promise for more when he was twenty-one. It'll do him good to go to Holland, but where shall I go? I'd like to travel and do just exactly as I please. If Father runs away to America I'll go with him. I feel all confused.... The porter probably thinks me insane — the way I sit here on the bench, staring into space. I'll light a cigarette. Where's my cigarette case? Upstairs. But where, upstairs? I put the veronal in with the underwear but where did I put the cigarette case? Here come Cissy and Paul. She's evidently decided she must get dressed for dinner, otherwise they would have kept on playing in the dark. — They don't see me. I wonder what he's saying to her. Why does she laugh so inanely? It would be amusing to write an anonymous letter to her husband in Vienna. Would I do such a thing? Never. But, who knows? They've just seen me. I'm bowing to them. She's piqued that I'm looking so well. She certainly seems embarrassed.

"Dressed for dinner so soon, Else?" — Why "dinner" this time, instead of "dîner"? She's never consistent. "As you notice, Frau Cissy."— "You really look ravishing, Else. It would give me the greatest pleasure to make love to you.". "Don't trouble to, Paul. I'd rather have a cigarette."— "With pleasure."— "Thank you. How did your singles match come out?"— "Frau Cissy beat me three times in succession."— "He was absent-minded. By the way, Else, do you know that the Crown Prince of Greece is expected here tomorrow?" — What's the Crown Prince of Greece to me? "Oh, really!" — Heavens! There's Dorsday with Frau Winawer. They're bowing to me. Now they're going on. I returned the bow too politely. Not as I usually do. Oh, what a strange person I am!— "Can't you light your cigarette, Else?"— "Oh, give me another match, please. Thank you."— "Your shawl is very pretty, Else. It looks perfectly marvelous with the black dress. And now I must change my clothes." — I'd rather she stayed. I'm afraid of Dorsday. "And I've ordered the hairdresser for seven o'clock. She's excellent — spends the winter in Milan. Well, adieu, Else, adieu, Paul."— "Küss' die Hand, gnädige Frau."— "Adieu, Frau Cissy." — She's gone. I'm glad that Paul, at least, is staying. "May I sit with you a moment, Else, or am I intruding on your reveries?":— "Why on my reveries? Perhaps on my realities." That really means nothing. I'd rather he left me. I must speak to Dorsday. There he is, still standing with the unhappy Frau Winawer. He's bored. I can see it. He'd like to come over to me. "Then there are realities on which I may not intrude?" — What is he saying? He can go to the devil! Why do I smile at him so coquettishly? I don't mean it for him at all. Dorsday's leering at me. Where am I? Where am I?— "What's the matter with you today, Else?"— "What do you think is the matter?"— "You're secretive, devilish, misleading."— "Don't talk nonsense, Paul."— "One could go mad looking at you." — What is he thinking of? What sort of nonsense is he talking? He's good-looking. The cigarette smoke catches in his hair. But I can't make use of him now. "You're looking past me in such a peculiar way. Why, Else?" — I won't answer. I can't make use of him now. I'll look as disagreeable as possible. No conversation now. "Your thoughts are somewhere else."— "That's quite possible." He's nothing to me. Does Dorsday know that I'm waiting for him? I don't see him but I know that he's looking at me. "Well then — goodbye, Else" — Thank God! He's kissing my hand. He's never done that. "Adieu, Paul." Where did I acquire that melting voice? He's leaving — the fraud! Probably he has to arrange details about tonight with Cissy. I wish him great joy. I'll draw the shawl about my shoulders and rise and go out in front of the hotel. Probably it'll be a trifle cool now. Too bad that my coat — ah, I hung it in the porter's office this morning. I can feel Dorsday's gaze on my back, piercing through the shawl. Frau Winawer is going up to her room now. How do I know that? Telepathy. "I beg your pardon, Mr. Porter."— "Fräulein wishes her coat?"— "Yes, please."— "The evenings are beginning to be cool. It comes on suddenly here." —

"Thank you." Ought I really to go in front of the hotel? Surely. Why not? At least to the door. Now they're passing by, one after the other. The gentleman with the golden pince-nez; the tall, blond one with the green vest; they all look at me. The little Geneva girl is pretty. No; she's from Lausanne. It really isn't so cool.

"Good evening, Fräulein Else" — Heavens! It's Dorsday. I won't mention Father. Not a word. Only after dinner. Or, I'll go to Vienna tomorrow. I'll go to Dr. Fiala myself. Why didn't I think of that immediately? I'm turning about, looking as though I didn't know who was standing behind me. "Ah, Herr von Dorsday."— "Would you still like to take a little stroll, Fräulein Else?"— "Well, not exactly a stroll. Just a few turns before dinner."— "We have almost half an hour"— "Really." It really isn't so cool. The mountains are blue. It would be jolly if he suddenly proposed to me.

— "There surely isn't a prettier spot in the world than this."— "You find it so, Herr von Dorsday. But please don't tell me that the air is like champagne."— "No, Frâulein Else. I only say that when we reach two thousand meters. And here we are hardly sixteen hundred and fifty above sea level."— "Does that make such a difference?"— "Certainly. Were you ever in the Engadin?"— "No, never. Is the air there really like champagne?"— "One might almost say so. But champagne is not my favorite beverage. I prefer this vicinity for its wonderful forests." How tiresome he is! Doesn't he realize it? He obviously doesn't know what to say to me? It would be simpler with a married woman. A slightly indecent remark and the conversation is well under way. "Will you stay a while here in San Martino, Fräulein Else?" Idiotic. Why do I look at him so coquettishly? He's already smiling knowingly. Oh, how stupid men are! "That depends partly on my aunt." That isn't really true. I could go alone to Vienna. "Probably until the tenth."— "Your mother is still in Gmunden?"— "No, Herr von Dorsday. She's been back in Vienna for three weeks. Father is also in Vienna. This year he's taken a vacation of less than a week. I believe the Erbesheimer case is making a lot of work for him."— "I can imagine that. But your father is probably the only one who can save Erbesheimer. Success is already indicated by the fact that it has become a civil action." — That's good. That's good. "I'm pleased to hear that you have so favorable a premonition."— "Premonition? How so?"— "That Father is to win the case for Erbesheimer."— "I shouldn't assert that too confidently." — How? Is he retreating? That won't do him any good. "Oh, I believe in premonitions and fancies. Think of it, Herr von Dorsday, just today I received a letter from home." That was not so good. He looks rather astonished. But go on. Don't hesitate. He's a good old friend of Father's. Go on. Go on. Now or never! "Herr von Dorsday, you just spoke so well of Father that it would be downright wrong if I weren't completely honest with you." What calves' eyes he is making at me! Oh, dear, he notices something. Go on. Go on. "For there was talk of you in that letter, Herr von Dorsday. It is, in fact, a letter from Mother."— "So."— "Really a very sad letter. You know our circumstances, Herr von Dorsday.", — For Heaven's sake, I really have tears in my voice. Go on. Go on. There's no retreat now. Thank God! "To be short and to the point, Herr von Dorsday, we are once more in — in the usual situation." — Now he'd like to disappear. "It involves — a small amount. Really only a bagatelle, Herr von Dorsday. And yet, so Mother writes, everything depends on it." I ramble on as stupidly as a cow. "Please calm yourself, Fräulein Else." — He said that nicely. But he needn't pat my arm on that account.

— "What, then, really is the trouble, Fräulein Else? What is in that sad letter from Mother?"— "Herr von Dorsday, Father" — My knees are trembling. "Mother writes that Father"— "But for goodness' sake, Else, what's wrong? Wouldn't you rather — here's a bench. May I put your coat about you? It's rather cool."— "Thanks, Herr von Dorsday. Oh, it's nothing. Nothing special." So — suddenly I'm sitting on the bench. Who's the lady coming this way? I don't know her at all. If only I didn't have to say more. How he stares at me! How could you ask this of me, Father? That wasn't right of you, Father. But now it's happened. I should have waited until after dinner. "Well, Fräulein Else." — His monocle's dangling. That looks silly. Shall I answer him? I must. Quickly now, and have it over with. After all, what could happen to me? He's a friend of Father's. "Oh, Lord, Herr von Dorsday, after all, you're an old friend of our family." I said that very well.

"And probably you won't be surprised when I tell you that Father is once again in a very dangerous position." How remarkable my voice sounds! Is it I speaking? Am I perhaps dreaming? I certainly must have an entirely different voice than usual. "It certainly does not surprise me completely. You are right about that, dear Fräulein Else — even though I regret it deeply." — Why do I look at him so pleadingly? Smile. Smile. It will work. "I feel most friendly towards your Father — towards all of you." — He oughtn't to look at me that way. It's indecent. I'll speak differently and stop smiling. I must act more worldly. "Well, Herr von Dorsday, now you will have an opportunity to demonstrate your friendship for my father." Thank Heavens, I have my old voice again. "It seems, Herr von Dorsday, that among all our friends and relations — most of them are not yet back in Vienna — otherwise Mother probably wouldn't have hit on the idea. — The other day in a letter to Mother, I casually mentioned your presence here in San Martino — among others, of course."— "I took it for granted, Fräulein Else, that I wasn't the exclusive theme of your correspondence with Mother." — Why does he press his knee against mine? Oh, I'll put up with it! What's the difference, once you've sunk so low? — "The matter's simply this: It's Dr. Fiala who seems to be causing particular trouble for Father this time."— "Oh, Dr. Fiala." — He evidently knows what kind of person Fiala is. "Yes, Dr. Fiala. And the sum involved is due on the fifth — that is, the day after tomorrow — at twelve noon — or rather, it must be in his hands, for if it isn't, Baron Honing — yes, think of it, the Baron summoned Father to him privately. He likes him so much." Oh, why am I speaking of Honing? That wasn't necessary. "You mean, Else, that otherwise an arrest would be inevitable?" — Why does he put it so severely? I won't answer.

I'll merely nod. "Hm. That is really — bad. That is truly very — this greatly gifted, brilliant man. — And how much is really involved, Fräulein Else?" — Why does he smile? He finds it "bad," and he smiles. What does his smile mean? Is the amount of no consequence to him? And if he says No! I'll do away with myself if he says No! So — I'm to name the sum. "What, Herr von Dorsday? Haven't I told you the amount? One million." Why did I say that? This is no time for joking! But then, when I tell him how much less it really is, he'll be pleased. How he'll open his eyes! Does he really think it possible that Father could be involved in a million— "Pardon me, Herr von Dorsday, for joking at a time like this. I can assure you that I'm not gay at heart." Yes, yes, press your knee against mine. You may take that liberty. "Of course, a million isn't involved. All in all, the amount runs to thirty thousand gulden, Herr von Dorsday, which must be in the hands of Dr. Fiala by noon of the day after tomorrow. Yes. Mother writes that Father made every possible effort, but, as I said, the relatives we sought were not in Vienna." — Oh, Lord, how I've debased myself! "Otherwise, Father naturally wouldn't have thought of turning to you, Herr von Dorsday. Much less, ask me —" Why is he silent? Why doesn't he say Yes? Where's the check book? And the fountain pen? For Heaven's sake, he isn't going to say No! Shall I go down on my knees before him? Oh, God! Oh, God!— "On the fifth, you say, Fräulein Else?"

— Thank God! At least he's saying something. "Yes indeed. At noon of the day after tomorrow, Herr von Dorsday. Therefore, it'll be necessary to — I don't believe it could be done so late by letter."— "Of course not, Fräulein Else. We'll have to telegraph."— "We" — that's good. That's very good. "Well, that would be the least of it. How much did you say, Else?" — He's heard me say it. Why does he torture me? "Thirty thousand, Herr von Dorsday. Really an absurdly small amount." Why did I say that? How stupid! But he's smiling. Stupid girl, he thinks. He's smiling quite amiably. Father is saved. He'd as soon lend me fifty thousand and then we could get ourselves all kinds of things. New chemises for me. How selfish I am! One gets that way. "Not quite so absurd, my dear child—" Why does he say "dear child"? Is it a good sign or not? " — as you imagine. Even thirty thousand gulden have to be earned."— "Pardon me, Herr von Dorsday. I didn't mean it that way. I thought only how sad it was that Father — because of such a small amount—" Oh, Lord, I'm bungling it again! "You can't imagine, Herr von Dorsday, even if you have some knowledge of our circumstances, how terrible it is for me, and more especially for Mother." — He's putting a foot on the bench. Is that supposed to be good form, or what?— "Oh, I can imagine it easily, dear Else." — How his voice sounds! Altogether different. Remarkable. "And I've often thought: a pity about this brilliant man" — Why does he say "a pity." Won't he give the money? No; he's merely generalizing. Why doesn't he say "Yes" once and for all — or does he take that for granted? How he stares at me! Why doesn't he say more? Oh, because the two Hungarian ladies are passing by. At least he's resumed a decent attitude now. The foot's no longer on the bench. The cravat's too bright for an elderly gentleman. Does his mistress select them for him? Nothing very fine, "between you and me," Mother writes. Thirty thousand gulden. But I'm smiling at him. Why am I smiling? Oh, I'm so cowardly!— "If one really could take it for granted that something might be done with this amount. Bui — you're a clever creature, Else. What would thirty thousand gulden be? A drop in the bucket." — Oh, heavens! Doesn't he want to give the money? I mustn't look so frightened. Everything depends on this. Now I must say something intelligent and convincing. "Oh, no, Herr von Dorsday, this time it would be no mere drop in the bucket. The Erbesheimer case is at hand. Don't forget that, Herr von Dorsday, and today it's as good as won. And Father has other cases, too. Furthermore, I intend — you mustn't laugh, Herr von Dorsday — to talk very seriously to Father. He takes me seriously. I may say that if there's one person who can influence him, it is—"

"You certainly are a delightful creature, Fräulein Else." — His voice has that ring again. How disagreeable it is when men begin to "ring" this way. I don't like it in Fred, either. "A delightful creature, upon my word." — Why does he say "upon my word"? It's banal. It sounds like a small-town theatre. "But gladly as I would share your optimism — once the cart has gone astray."— "Not this time, Herr von Dorsday. If I didn't believe completely in Father, if I weren't completely convinced that these thirty thousand gulden—" I don't know what to say now.

I can't exactly beg. He's thinking it over. Obviously. Perhaps he doesn't know Fiala's address. Nonsense. The situation is impossible. I sit here like a poor sinner. He stands before me and puts his monocle into his eye and says nothing. I'll leave now. That'll be best. I won't be treated this way. Father may kill himself. I'll kill myself, too. It's a shameless life. It would be best to jump from that cliff and have it over with. It would serve everyone right. I'll go. "Fräulein Else."— "Pardon me, Herr von Dorsday, for bothering you at all. Everything considered, I can readily understand your inclination to refuse." So. I'm through. "Stay, Fräulein Else" — Stay? Why should I stay? He'll give the money. Yes, of course. He must. But I won't sit down again. I'll remain standing as though I were going in half a second. I'm a little taller than he is. "You haven't waited for my answer, Else. Once before — pardon me, Else, for referring to it in this connection—" He needn't say "Else" so often— "I've been in a position to help your father out of a difficulty. To be sure, that was an — even more absurd sum than the present one — and I didn't flatter myself with the hope of ever seeing the money again. So there really seems to be no reason for refusing my assistance this time — and especially when a young girl like you, Else, comes in person as an intermediary." — What is he driving at? His voice "rings" no longer. Or it has a different "ring." How he stares at me! He'd better be careful!— "And so, Else, I'm prepared — Dr. Fiala shall have thirty thousand gulden at noon of the day after tomorrow, on one condition.". — He shouldn't say more. He's said quite enough. "Herr von Dorsday, I, I personally will guarantee that my father will return this sum as soon as he receives his fee from Erbesheimer. So far, Erbesheimer has paid nothing. Not even a retainer. Mother herself wrote that to me."— "Let it be, Else. One never should undertake a guarantee for another. Not even for one's self." — What does he want? His voice "rings" again. Never has anyone stared at me so! I suspect his intentions. He'd better be careful!— "Could I have thought it possible an hour ago that I'd ever be in a position to dictate terms! And now I'm doing it. Yes, Else, after all, I'm only human and it isn't my fault that you're so beautiful, Else." — What does he want? What does he want?— "Perhaps I might have asked of you today or tomorrow what I ask of you now. Even if you hadn't sought a million — I beg your pardon, thirty thousand — gulden from me. But really, if things had been otherwise, you hardly would have given me this opportunity to speak with you alone."— "Oh, I really have taken up too much of your time already, Herr von Dorsday." — That was well said. Fred would have been satisfied with it. What's this? Is he reaching for my hand? What's the matter with him?— "Haven't you been aware of it for a long time, Else?" — He should let go of my hand. Now, thank Heaven, he's let go of it. Not so close. Not so close. "You wouldn't be a woman, Else, if you didn't notice it. Je vous désire." — He didn't have to say that in French, the noble Vicomte. "Must I say more?"— "You've said quite enough, Herr von Dorsday." I'm still standing here. Why? I'll leave. I'll leave without a word. "Else, Else." — Now he's next to me again. "Forgive me, Else. I too have only been joking, just as you did a little while ago, about the million. My demand, too, shall not be so exorbitant — as you may have feared. So that the lesser demand will, perhaps, be a pleasant surprise. Please stay, Else." — And I actually remain here! Why? Here we are, facing each other. Shouldn't I simply have slapped his face? Wouldn't there still be time for that now? The two Englishmen are passing. This would be the very minute. Right now. Why didn't I do it? I'm cowardly. I'm broken. I'm humiliated. What will he want now in place of the million? A kiss, perhaps. That might be considered. A million is to thirty thousand as — there are some funny comparisons. "If you really need a million some day, Else, you may be certain that YOU see to it, although I'm not a rich man. But this time I shall be reasonable, as you are. And this time I wish nothing more, Else, than — to see you." — Is he crazy? He sees me. — Oh, he means it that way! Why don't I slap his face? The rotter! Have I turned red or pale? You want to see me naked? Many would like that! I'm beautiful when I'm naked. Why don't I slap his face? It's enormous. Why so close, you rotter? I don't want your breath on my cheeks. Why don't I just leave him? Are his eyes holding me? We glare at each other like deadly enemies. I'd like to call him a rotter to his face, but I can't. Or don't I want to?— "You look at me as though I were crazy, Else. Perhaps I am slightly so. For there's a magic in you, Else, that you yourself can't realize. You must understand, Else, that my request implies no insult. Yes — request, I say. Though to you it may seem dangerously like coercion. But I'm no coercionist. I'm only a man who has had many experiences — among others, this: that everything in the world has its price, and that anyone who gives away his money when he might receive a return for it is a consummate fool. And — parting with what I wish to buy this time, Else, much as it is, will not make you poorer. And that the transaction will remain a secret between you and me, Else — that I swear to you by — by all the charms whose revelation will make me happy." — Where did he learn to talk like that? It sounds like a book. "And I swear to you that I will never take any unfair advantage of the situation created by our agreement. I ask of you only to be allowed to stand for a quarter of an hour in contemplation of your beauty. My room is on the same floor as yours, Else. Number Sixty-five. Easy to remember. The Swedish tennis player you mentioned today — wasn't he just sixty-five years old?"

—— He's crazy. Why do I let him go on? I'm paralyzed. "But if for any reason you don't care to visit me in room Number Sixty-five, Else, then I suggest a little stroll after dinner. There's a clearing in the woods. I discovered it by chance the other day. Hardly five minutes from our hotel.

—— It will be a wonderful summer night, almost warm, and the starlight will clothe you divinely." — He speaks as he would to a slave. I feel like spitting in his face. "You need not answer immediately, Else. Think it over. After dinner, you may render your decision." — Why does he say "render"? What a stupid word: "render."

— — "Think it over calmly. Perhaps you'll come to the conclusion that I'm not merely driving a bargain with you. " — What else, you whining rotter!— "Perhaps you'll suspect that a man is speaking to you, a man who is rather lonesome and not particularly happy, and who, perhaps, deserves a little sympathy." — Affected rotter! He speaks like a poor actor. His manicured fingers look like claws. No! No! I won't! Why don't I tell him so? Kill yourself, Father. What is he doing with my hand? My arm's quite limp. He draws my hand to his lips. Hot lips. Augh! My hand's cold. I'd like to knock his hat off. Ha, how funny that would be! Had your fill of kissing, you rotter? — The arc lamps in front of the hotel are already lighted. Two windows are open in the third story. The one in which the curtain is stirring is mine. Something's shining on the cabinet. There's nothing on it. Only a brass ornament. "So, auf Wiedersehen, Else." — I don't answer. I stand here motionless. He looks into my eyes. My face is blank. He knows nothing. He doesn't know whether I'll come or not.

Neither do I. I only know that everything's over. I'm half dead. There he goes. A little bent. Rotter! He senses that I'm staring after him. Whom is he greeting? Two ladies. He bows as if he were a Count. Paul ought to challenge him and shoot him. Or Rudi. What does he think anyway? Brazen fellow! Never, never! There's nothing left to do, Father. You'll have to kill yourself. — The couple obviously is returning from a trip. Both handsome, he and she. Have they time to change their clothes before dinner? They're surely on their honeymoon — or perhaps they aren't married at all. I'll never go on a honeymoon. Thirty thousand gulden. No, no, no. Aren't there thirty thousand gulden somewhere in the world? I'll go to see Fiala. Mercy, mercy, Dr. Fiala. With pleasure, my dear young lady. And there's my bedroom. — Please, Paul, do me a favor. Ask your Father for thirty thousand gulden. Tell him you have gambling debts. That otherwise you must shoot yourself. "Gladly, my dear cousin. My room is Number So-and-so, and I'll expect you at midnight." Oh, Herr von Dorsday, how modest you are. For the time being, at least. Now he's dressing, putting on a smoking jacket. Now we each go our own way. The meadow by moonlight or Room Number Sixty-five. Will he wear his smoking jacket when he's in the woods with me?

There's still time before dinner. A little walk. Let's think it over calmly. I'm a lonesome old man — ha, ha! Heavenly air, like champagne. It's no longer cool. — Thirty thousand... thirty thousand.... I must look very pretty in this wide landscape. Too bad there aren't more people in the clearing. Obviously I'm attractive to the gentleman out there near the edge of the wood. Oh, my dear sir, I'm even more beautiful naked, and the price is laughable. Thirty thousand gulden. Perhaps you'll bring your friends with you. Then it'll be cheaper for each one. Let's hope you have many handsome friends, handsomer and younger than Herr von Dorsday. Do you know Herr von Dorsday? He's a rotter. Vile rotter....

Oh, I must think it over.... A human life is at stake. Father's life. But no — he won't kill himself. He'd rather be imprisoned. Three years at hard labor — or five. He's been living in terror of this for five or ten years.... Trust funds.... And Mother, too. And even I. — For whom will I have to strip next time? Or shall we make permanent arrangements with Herr von Dorsday for simplicity's sake? His present mistress is nothing very fine. "Just between you and me." He'd certainly prefer me. I'm not at all sure that I'm so much finer. Don't take on airs, Fräulein Else. I could tell tales about you.... A certain dream, for instance, that you've had three times now — and that you haven't even told to your friend Bertha. And she's going through something. And what was that affair a little while ago in Gmunden? Six o'clock in the morning, on the balcony, my proud Fräulein Else. Perhaps you didn't notice the two young people in a boat who were staring at you. Of course they couldn't identify my face at that distance, but they couldn't help noticing that I was in negligee. And it made me happy. Oh, more than happy. It was intoxicating. I drew my hands across my hips and acted as though I didn't know that anyone saw me — and the boat didn't move from the spot. Yes — I'm like that. Indeed I am. I'm a hussy. They all know it. Even Paul knows it. Of course, he's a woman's specialist; and the marine lieutenant knew it too, and so did the painter. Only Fred doesn't know it, the stupid fellow. For he loves me. But I'd rather not be naked in front of him. Never, never! I wouldn't like it at all. I'd be ashamed. But for the Filou with the Roman head — how gladly! Even if I had to die the next minute. But I wouldn't have to die the next minute. One can go through all sorts of experiences. Bertha has gone through more.

No, no, I won't! I'll go to anyone else — but not to him. To Paul, for all I care. Or I'll pick somebody for myself this evening, at dinner. It's all the same. But I can't tell everyone that I want thirty thousand gulden in return. That would be like a woman from the Kärntnerstrasse. No; I won't sell myself. Never. I'll never sell myself. Yes; if once I find the right man, I'll give myself. But I'll not sell myself. I'll be a wanton, not a prostitute. You miscalculated, Herr von Dorsday. And so did Father. Yes, he miscalculated. He should have foreseen it. He knows people. He knows Herr von Dorsday. He could have known that Herr von Dorsday wouldn't give something for nothing. — Otherwise, he could have telegraphed, or come here himself. But this way it was easier and safer, wasn't it, Father? If a man has a pretty daughter, why must he be marched off to prison? And Mother, stupid as ever, sits down and writes the letter. Father didn't trust himself to do it. If he had written, I should have noticed something peculiar immediately. But you won't succeed. No; you've counted too definitely on my childish affection, Father. You assumed too certainly that I'd rather undergo any indignity than let you suffer the consequences of your criminal frivolity. Certainly you're a genius. Herr von Dorsday says it. Everybody says it. But how does that help me? Fiala's a nobody, but he doesn't embezzle trust funds. Even Waldheim isn't to be mentioned in the same breath with you.... Who said that? Dr. Froriep. "Your father is a genius." And I've only heard him speak once! Last year at the assizes — for the first and last time. It was glorious. Tears ran down my cheeks. And the poor wretch he defended was acquitted. Perhaps he wasn't such a poor wretch. In any case, he only stole something. He didn't embezzle trust funds to play baccarat and speculate on the exchange. Now Father himself will be tried before the jury. It will be in all the papers. Second day of the trial, third day of the trial. The attorney for the defense arose to reply. Who will defend him? Not a genius this time. Nothing will help him. Unanimous verdict of guilty. Sentenced to five years. Stones, striped clothes, cropped hair. Visitors permitted once a month. I go there with Mother, third class. For we have no more money. No one lends us anything. A little home in Lerchenfelderstrasse, like the one in which I saw our seamstress ten years ago. We bring him something to eat. From where? For we have nothing ourselves. Uncle Victor will allow us an income. Three hundred gulden a month. Rudi will be in Holland with Vanderhulst — if they still think of him. A convict's children. Novel by Temme, in three volumes. Father receives us in the striped suit of the criminal. He doesn't look angry — merely sad. After all, he never can look angry.

— Else, if you had gotten me the money that time — that's what he'll think, but he'll say nothing. He won't have the heart to reproach me. He's endlessly kind, but he's careless. His weakness is the love for gambling. He can't help it. It's a sort of insanity. Perhaps they'll discharge him because he's insane. And he didn't give enough thought to the letter. Perhaps it never occurred to him that Dorsday would take advantage of the situation and demand such an indignity of me. He's a good friend of the family. Once before, he loaned Father eight thousand gulden. Why should one suspect a man like that? Father certainly tried everything else first. What he must have suffered when he had Mother write this letter! He went from Warsdorf to Burin, from Burin to Wertheimstein, and God knows to whom next. He certainly went to Uncle Carl, too; and they've all left him in his trouble. All the so-called friends. And now Dorsday is his hope, his last hope, and if the money doesn't arrive he'll kill himself. Of course he'll kill himself. He surely won't let them put him in prison. Examination, trial, assizes, jail, convict's clothes. No, no! When the summons comes, he'll shoot or hang himself. He'll hang himself from the window bars. They'll send word to us from the house across the way. The locksmith will have to open the door and I'll have been at fault. And now he's sitting with Mother smoking a Havana cigar in the very room in which he'll hang himself the day after tomorrow. Where does he keep on getting all the Havana cigars? I can hear him speaking as he quiets Mother. Depend on it, Dorsday will supply the money. Remember I saved him a great sum this winter through my intervention. And now comes the Erbesheimer case... — Surely. — I hear him speaking. Telepathy! Remarkable. I also see Fred this very moment. He's passing the casino in the city park with a girl. She's wearing a light blue waist and light shoes and she's a little hoarse. I'm sure of all of it. When I go to Vienna I'll ask Fred whether he was in the city park with his sweetheart on the third of September between seven and eight o'clock.

What next? What's to be done? It's almost completely dark. How nice and quiet. No one near or far.

They're already at dinner. Telepathy? No; that isn't telepathy. Because I heard the gong a little while ago. Where's Else? Paul will think. He'll notice it if I'm not there for the first course. They'll send up for me. What's wrong with Else? She's always so punctual. The two men at the window will think, Where's that pretty girl with the reddish blond hair today? And Herr von Dorsday will be frightened. He certainly is cowardly. Calm yourself, Herr von Dorsday, nothing will happen to you. I despise you far too much. If I wished it, you'd be a dead man tomorrow night. — I'm convinced that Paul would challenge you if I told him the story. I make you a present of your life, Herr von Dorsday.

How tremendously broad the meadow is, and how terribly dark the mountains. Hardly any stars are out. Yes, a few — three, four — there'll soon be more. And it's so quiet in the wood behind me. It's pleasant to sit here on the bench, at the edge of the wood. The hotel's so distant, so distant, and the lights are like the lights of fairyland. And what rotters live in it! Oh, no — people, poor people; I pity them all. I even pity the Marchesa — I don't know why — and Frau Winawer and the nurse of Cissy's little girl. She doesn't eat at the table d'hôte. She has her dinner earlier, with Fritzi. What's this about Else? asks Cissy. What? Isn't she in her room? They're all worried about me. I can feel they are. Only I don't worry about myself. Yes, here I am in Martino di Castrozza, sitting on a bench at the edge of the wood, and the air is like champagne, and it seems to me that I'm crying. Yes, and why am I crying?

There's no reason for crying. My nerves are getting the better of me. I must control myself. I mustn't let myself go to pieces this way. But crying isn't at all unpleasant. Crying's always good for me. When I visited our old French nurse in the hospital — the one who died later — I also cried. At Grandmother's funeral, when Bertha left for Nuremberg, and when Agatha's baby died, and when we saw "Camille" — I cried then, too. Who'll cry when I'm dead? Oh, how beautiful it would be to be dead! I lie on a bier in the salon, with candles burning. Long candles. Twelve long candles. The hearse is already downstairs. People are standing at the gate. How old was she? Only nineteen. Really only nineteen? — Think of it, her father in jail. Why did she kill herself? Because she loved a Filou in vain. But what are you talking about? She was to have had a child. No; she fell from the Cimone. It's supposed to have been an accident. Good day, Herr von Dorsday. You too pay your last respects to little Else. Little Else, the old woman says. — Why? Certainly; I must pay my last respects. Wasn't I the first one to disgrace her? Oh, it was worth the trouble, Frau Winawer. I've never seen such a beautiful body. It cost me only thirty million. A Rubens costs three times as much. She poisoned herself with hashish. She merely longed for beautiful visions, but she took too much and never awoke. Why is Herr von Dorsday wearing a red monocle? At whom is he waving that handkerchief? Mother comes down the steps and kisses his hand. Terrible, terrible. Now they whisper to each other. I can't understand a word, because I'm on a bier. The crown of violets about my brow came from Paul. The ribbons stream to the floor. No one trusts himself in the room. I'd rather get up and look out of the window. What a great, blue sea! A hundred ships with yellow sails. The waves glisten. So much sunlight. Regatta. The men are wearing life preservers. The ladies are in bathing suits. That's indecent. They think I'm naked. How stupid they are! I'm wearing deep mourning, because I'm dead. I'll prove it to you. I'll lay myself on the bier again. Where is it now? It's gone. They've taken it away. They've embezzled it. That's why Father's in jail. And they've pardoned him after three years. The jailers all were bribed by Fiala. Now I'll go to the cemetery on foot. That'll save Mother the funeral expenses. We must economize. I'm going so quickly that no one follows me. Oh, how fast I can go! They're all still standing in the streets, marveling. How dare they stare so at one who's dead? This is oppressive. I'd rather go across the field. It's all blue with forget-me-nots and violets. The marine officers stand with swords at presentarms. Good morning, gentlemen. Open the gate. Open the gate, Sir Matador. Don't you recognize me? I'm the girl that just died.... Therefore, you mustn't kiss my hand.

Where's my grave? Is that embezzled too? Thank God, it's not the cemetery at all. It's the park in Mentone. Father'll be glad that I'm not buried. I'm not afraid of snakes. If only my foot isn't bitten by one. Oh, dear!

What's happened? Where am I? Have I been asleep? Yes; I've been asleep. I must have been dreaming. My feet are so cold. My right foot's cold. Why? There's a little rip in the stocking, across the ankle. Why am I still sitting in the woods. They must have rung for dinner long ago. "Dîner."

Oh, Lord, where was I? I was so far away! What was I dreaming? I think I was dead. And I had no sorrows and didn't have to rack my brains. Thirty thousand, thirty thousand... I haven't got them yet. I must earn them first. And here I'm sitting alone on the edge of the wood. The lights from the hotel are shining all the way over here. I must return.

It's terrible that I must return. There's no more time to be lost. Herr von Dorsday waits for my decision. Decision. Decision! No. No, Herr von Dorsday, once for all, No. You've been joking, of course, Herr von Dorsday. Yes; I'll say that to him. Oh, that's excellent! Your joke wasn't very delicate, Herr von Dorsday, but I'll forgive you. I'll telegraph Father in the morning, Herr von Dorsday, that the money will be in Dr. Fiala's hands punctually. Wonderful. I'll say that to him. There'll be nothing left for him to do; he'll have to send the money. Have to? Does he have to? And why does he have to? And if he did, he'd even the score in some way. He'd arrange it so that the money arrived too late. Or he'd send the money and tell everybody that he'd had me. But he won't send the money at all. No, Fräulein Else, that wasn't our bargain. Telegraph your Father what you please, I'll not send the money. You shan't believe, Fraulein Else, that I allow myself to be outwitted by a mere girl — I, the Vicomte of Eperies.

I must walk carefully. The road's quite dark. Strangely enough, I feel better than I did. Nothing at all has changed and I feel better. What could I have been dreaming about? About a matador? What sort of matador was he? It's farther to the hotel than I thought. Surely they're still at dinner. I'll sit down quietly at the table. I'll tell them that I've had a sick headache and let them serve me later. Herr von Dorsday eventually will come to his senses and say that the whole affair was only a joke. Forgive me, Fräulein Else, forgive me for my bad joke. I've already telegraphed to my bank. But he won't say it. He hasn't telegraphed. Everything is as it was before. He's waiting. Herr von Dorsday is waiting. No! I don't want to see him. I can't see him any more. I don't want to see anyone any more. I don't want to return to the hotel; I don't want to return home; I don't want to return to Vienna; I don't want to go to anybody; to anyone at all; not to Father and not to Mother; not to Rudi and not to Fred; not to Bertha and not to Aunt Irene. She's still the best of them. She'd understand everything. But I'll have nothing more to do with her or with anybody else. If I were a magician, I'd be in some other part of the world. On some gorgeous ship in the Mediterranean, but not alone. With Paul, perhaps. Yes, I could imagine that very easily. Or I could be living in a villa by the sea, and we would be lying on the marble steps that lead into the water, and he'd be holding me close in his arms and biting my lips, as Albert did at the piano two years ago. The bounder! No. I'd like to lie alone by the sea on the marble steps and wait, and at last a man would come, or several men, and I'd choose one, and the others whom I'd reject would throw themselves despairingly into the sea. Or they'd have to be patient, until the next day. Oh, what a marvelous life that would be!

Why have I my glorious shoulders and my beautiful slender legs, and for what reason, after all, do I exist? And it would serve them right, all of them. They've brought me up only to sell myself one way or another. They wouldn't hear of acting. They laughed at me. It would have served them altogether right if last year I had married Wilomitzer, the stage director, who's almost fifty. If only they hadn't suggested things to me. Father, to be sure, seemed embarrassed. But Mother dropped some very plain hints.

How huge the hotel is! Like a monstrous, shining magic city. Everything's gigantic. The mountains, too.

Terrifyingly so. They've never been so black. The moon hasn't risen yet. It'll rise only for the performance, for the great performance on the meadow, when Herr von Dorsday bids his slave dance naked. What's Herr von Dorsday to me? Well, Mademoiselle Else, what pretentious nonsense you are talking! You were prepared to be the mistress of strange men, of one after the other. And the trifle which Herr von Dorsday asks horrifies you. You're prepared to sell yourself for a string of pearls, for beautiful clothes, for a villa by the sea, and the life of your father isn't worth as much as that? That would have been just the right start. That would have been the correct preface to everything else. You were guilty, I could say. You brought me to it. You're all to blame that I've become what I am. Not merely Father and Mother. Rudi's to blame, too, and Fred, and everybody; yes, everybody because no one has troubled himself about me. A little caress when you look pretty, a little anxiety when you have fever; they send you to school and you take lessons in piano and French at home; in the summer you go to the country and on your birthday you get presents; and they talk about all sorts of things at dinner. But what I feel — the things stirring and trembling in me — have you ever thought of that? Sometimes I could see something of the sort in Father's eyes, but it passed quickly. The next moment he was wrapped up again in his practice and his troubles and his speculations. — And probably some common woman. Furtively. "Nothing very fine, between you and me." And I'd be alone again. Well, what would you do, Father? What would you do if I weren't here?

I'm standing here. Yes, here I'm standing in front of the hotel. — It'll be terrible to go in and see all the people, Herr von Dorsday, my Aunt Cissy. How pleasant it was a little while ago on the bench — when I was already dead. Matador. — If only I could remember what it was. — It was a regatta. — Right. — And I was watching it from the window. But who was the matador? — Oh, if only I weren't so tired, so terribly tired. And now, I'm to sit up until midnight and then slip quietly into Herr von Dorsday's room? Perhaps I'll meet Cissy in the hall. Does she wear anything under her kimono when she goes to him? It's so difficult for a beginner! Oughtn't I to ask Cissy for advice? Of course, I mustn't tell her that it's Dorsday. I'd rather have her understand that I have a nightly rendezvous with one of the handsome young men in the hotel. For instance, the tall blond man with glowing eyes. But he's no longer here. He disappeared suddenly. I never even thought of him until this very minute. But unfortunately it's not the tall blond man with glowing eyes and it's not Paul. It's Herr von Dorsday. How shall I manage it? What shall I say to him? Just "Yes." And yet I can't visit Herr von Dorsday in his room. Of course he has all kinds of magnificent scent bottles on his washstand, and the room always smells of French perfume. No — not for anything in the world — I won't go to see him. It'll be better in the open. The sky's so high and the meadow's so wide. I mustn't think of Herr Dorsday at all. I mustn't even look at him. And if he dares to touch me, I'll kick him with my naked feet. Oh, if it only were somebody else. Anybody else. He could have everything he wanted tonight. But not Dorsday. Not Dorsday! Not Dorsday! How his eyes will stab and drill their way into me. He'll stand there with his monocle and leer. But no; he won't leer. He'll look dignified. Aristocratic. For he's used to such things. How many has he seen — so? A hundred, or a thousand — but was there one among them like me? No; certainly not. I'll tell him he's not the first to see me this way. I'll tell him I have a lover — but only after the thirty thousand gulden have been sent to Fiala. Then I'll tell him that he's a fool. That he could have had me, as well, for the same amount. — That I've already had ten lovers — twenty — a hundred. — But he won't believe that of me. — And if he believed it, how would it help me? — If only I could spoil his pleasure somehow. If only someone else were present. Why not? He didn't stipulate that he had to be alone with me. Oh, Herr von Dorsday, I'm so afraid of you. Won't you please do me the favor of bringing some mutual acquaintance with you? Oh, that's not at all contrary to our agreement, Herr von Dorsday. If I felt like it, I could invite the whole hotel and you'd still be bound to send the thirty thousand gulden. But I'll be content if my Cousin Paul comes. Or would you prefer somebody else? The tall blond man unfortunately isn't here now. And the Filou with the Roman head, unfortunately, has gone, too. But I'll find another, easily. You fear a scandal. That's out of the question. Scandal has nothing to do with it. Nothing matters to one who has gone as far as I have. Today's just the beginning. Or, do you think perhaps that I'll go home from this adventure, a decent girl of good family? No — neither good family nor decent young girl. That matter would be settled, once for all. Hereafter, I'll stand on my own feet. I have beautiful legs, as you and the other participants in the festival will soon have occasion to observe. So the matter's arranged, Herr von Dorsday. At ten o'clock, while everybody's still in the salon, we'll wander in the moonlight across the meadow, through the woods to your famous clearing. At all events, you'll have to bring the telegram to the bank with you. For it's my privilege to demand a guarantee from a rascal like you. And at midnight, you may return home, and I'll stay with my cousin, or possibly with somebody else, in the moonlit meadow. You've no objection to that, Herr von Dorsday? You can't have. And if I should be found dead tomorrow morning, don't be surprised. In that event, Paul will send the telegram. I'll have seen to that. But don't think, for Heaven's sake, that you, you miserable scoundrel, have driven me to my death. I've known for a long time that I'd end up this way. Just ask my friend, Fred, if I haven't mentioned it to him time and again. Fred. I mean Herr Friedrich Wenkheim. Incidentally, the only decent person I ever knew in my life. The only one I could have loved — if he hadn't been such a decent person. Yes, I'm a very corrupt creature. I wasn't meant for domesticity and I haven't any talents. As it is, it might be best for our family if it died out. Some catastrophe will overtake Rudi. Some Dutch chorus girl will get him into debt and then he'll defraud Vanderhulst. It runs in the family. My father's youngest brother shot himself when he was fifteen years old. No one knows why. I didn't know him. Ask them to show you his photograph, Herr von Dorsday. We have it in an album.... I'm supposed to look like him. Nobody knows why he killed himself. And nobody will know why I did. In any case, not on account of you, Herr von Dorsday. I'll not do you that honor. At nineteen or twenty-one — it's all the same. Or shall I become a nurse girl or a telephone operator or marry Herr Wilomitzer or let you keep me? It's all equally disgusting, and I'll not go to the meadow with you at all. No; all of that's too tiring and too stupid and too disagreeable. When I'm dead, will you be so good as to send a few thousand gulden to Father, because it certainly would be sad if he were to be arrested on the very day that my body was taken to Vienna. But I'll leave a letter, with this testament: — Herr von Dorsday has the right to see my body, my beautiful, naked corpse. So you can't complain, Herr von Dorsday, that I made false promises. You're getting something for your money. Our contract doesn't specify that I must be alive when you see me. Oh, no. There's nothing to that effect. So — a view of my corpse I bequeath to the art dealer, Dorsday, and to Herr Fred Wenkheim I bequeath my diary up to my seventeenth year — that's as far as I wrote it — and to Cissy's Fräulein I bequeath the five twenty-franc pieces which I brought from Switzerland years ago. They're in the desk, next to the letters. And to Bertha I bequeath my black evening gown. And to Agatha my books. And to my Cousin Paul I bequeath a kiss on my pale lips. And to Cissy — I bequeath my tennis racket — because I'm generous. And I'm to be buried here in San Martino di Castrozza, in the pretty little cemetery. I don't want to go home. Even when I'm dead I don't want to return. And Father and Mother mustn't grieve. I'm better off than they are. And I forgive them. I'm not to be pitied. — Haha, what a funny will! Really, I'm touched to think that by this time tomorrow, while the rest are at dinner, I'll be dead. — Aunt Emma, of course, won't go down to dinner, and neither will Paul. They'll have their meals served in their rooms. I'm curious to know how Cissy will act. Only, I won't know, unfortunately. I'll know nothing more. Or perhaps you know everything so long as you're not buried. And, after all, I'm only making believe I'm dead. And if Herr von Dorsday approaches my corpse, I'll wake up and open my eyes and he'll be so frightened that he'll drop his monocle.

But, unfortunately, none of it's true. I'll be neither make-believe nor really dead. I won't kill myself at all. I'm too much of a coward. I may he a brave mountain-climber, but even so, I'm a coward. And perhaps I haven't even enough veronal. How many powders are needed? Six, I believe. But ten are more certain. I think I still have ten. Yes, that'll be enough.

I wonder how many times I've actually walked around the hotel. And what next? I'm standing in front of the door. Nobody's in the salon. Of course — they're all at dinner. The salon is seldom entirely deserted. There's a hat on the settee. A tourist's hat. Very smart. Pretty chamois tuft. There's an old gentleman in the fauteuil. Probably hasn't any appetite. Reading the paper. He's well off. He hasn't any worries. While he is reading his paper quietly, I must rack my brains to get thirty thousand gulden for Father. But no. I know how. After all, it's so terribly simple. What am I after? What am I doing here in the salon? Soon they'll all be coming in from dinner. What shall I do? Herr von Dorsday's certainly on pins and needles. Where is she, he's thinking. Has she killed herself, or is she hiring somebody to kill me, or is she stirring up her Cousin Paul against me? Have no fear, Herr von Dorsday, I'm not so dangerous. I'm a little hussy, nothing more. You'll be rewarded for your anxiety. Twelve o'clock, Room Sixty-five. It'll be too cool for me in the meadow and from your room, Herr von Dorsday, I'll go straight to my Cousin Paul. You certainly don't object to that, Herr von Dorsday? "Else! Else! How? What? That's Paul's voice. Is dinner already over?

"Else!"— "Oh, Paul. Why, what's the matter, Paul?" I'll act innocent. —

"Where've you been hiding yourself, Else?"— "Where do you suppose I've been hiding? I've been taking a walk."— "Right now — during dinner?"— "Well, why not? After all, it's the best time for it." I'm talking nonsense. "Mother's been imagining all sorts of things. I went to your door. I knocked."— "Never heard you."— "Please be serious, Else. How can you make us so uneasy? You could at least have informed Mother that you weren't coming down for dinner."— "You're quite right, Paul. But you've no idea what a headache I had." I said that quite disarmingly. Oh, what a hussy I am!— "Is it somewhat better now?"— "I couldn't really say that."

"Before everything else, Mother—"

"Stop, Paul; not yet. Make my apologies to my aunt. I want to go to my room for a few minutes to primp up. Then I'll come right down and have a little something to eat."— "You're so pale, Else. Shall I send Mother up to you?" —

"Don't make so much fuss about me, Paul, and don't look at me that way. Haven't you ever seen a woman with a headache? Of course I'll come down. In ten minutes, at the latest. Good-bye, Paul."— "Goodbye, Else." — Thank Heaven, he's gone. Stupid boy: — but dear. What does the porter want of me? What — a telegram? "Thank you. When did the message arrive?"— "Fifteen minutes ago, Fräulein." — Why does he look at me so — pityingly? For Heaven's sake, what can be in this message? I'll wait until I'm upstairs before opening it. Otherwise, I might faint. After all, Father has — if Father's dead, then everything's all right. Then I needn't go with Herr von Dorsday to the meadow.... Oh, what a wicked soul I am! Dear God, please let there be nothing bad in the message. Dear God, please let Father live. Have him arrested, for all I care, but not dead. If there's no bad news in it, I'll offer up a sacrifice. I'll become a nurse. I'll take a position in an office. Don't die, Father. I'll do everything you ask....

Thank Heaven, I'm upstairs. Turn on the light. Turn on the light. It's become cool. The window was open too long. Courage. Courage. Oh, perhaps I'll hear that matters have been settled. Perhaps Uncle Bernard is giving the money, and they're wiring me: "Don't ask Dorsday."

I'll know immediately. But if I look up at the ceiling I can't read the message. Trala, trala, courage. It's necessary. "Repeat urgently ask Dorsday. Sum not thirty but fifty. Otherwise everything useless. Address remains Fiala." — But fifty. Otherwise everything useless. Trala, trala. Fifty. Address remains Fiala. Fifty. But surely fifty or thirty makes no difference one way or the other. Not even to Herr von Dorsday. The veronal is under the laundry — for any emergency. Why didn't I ask for fifty thousand in the first place? I thought of it! Otherwise everything useless. So — I must go downstairs at once. I can't stay here, sitting on the bed. A little mistake, Herr von Dorsday. Forgive me. Not thirty, but fifty. Otherwise everything useless. Address remains Fiala. "Do you take me for a fool, Fräulein Else?" Not at all, Herr Vicomte. Why should I? But for fifty, I'd certainly have to demand considerably more, Fräulein. Otherwise everything useless. Address remains Fiala. As you wish, Herr von Dorsday. Pray command me. But first of all, write the message to your bank. Otherwise, I have no guarantee. —

Yes, that's how I'll do it. I'll go to his room. Only after he's written out the message before my eyes — then I'll disrobe. I'll hold the message in my hand. Oh, how disgusting! And where shall I lay my clothes? No, no! No! I'll undress here and put on my big black coat, which will cover me completely. That'll be the most comfortable way. For both parties. Address remains Fiala. My teeth are chattering. The window's still open. Closed. In the clearing? I could have died there. Rotter! Fifty thousand. He can't say No. Room Number Sixty-five. But before that, I'll tell Paul to wait in his room for me. Then from Dorsday I'll go direct to Paul and tell him everything. And then Paul shall box his ears. Yes — this very evening. It'll be a rich program. And then comes the veronal. No — why the veronal? Why die? Not a bit of it. Be merry, be merry. Life's only beginning now. You'll have your share of it. You'll be proud of your little daughter. I'll be a wanton such as the world has never seen. Address remains Fiala. You shall have your fifty thousand gulden, Father, but with the next money I earn I'll buy myself nightgowns, with lace, quite transparent, and expensive silk stockings. One lives only once. Light. I'll light the lamp over the mirror. How beautiful my blondish red hair is, and my shoulders: and my eyes aren't bad, either. Oh, how big they are. It would be a pity.

There's still time for veronal. — But I must go down. Way down. Herr von Dorsday is waiting and he doesn't even know that meanwhile it's become fifty thousand. Yes, I've gone up in price, Herr von Dorsday. I must show him the telegram. Otherwise he really won't believe me, and he'll think I'm making a profit out of the transaction. I'll send the telegram to his room and write something to go with it. To my great regret, it has become fifty thousand, Herr von Dorsday, but that's surely all the same to you. And I am convinced that your suggestions for payment were not meant seriously at all. For you are a Vicomte and a gentleman. Tomorrow morning you'll send the fifty thousand — my Father's life depends on it — to Fiala without delay. I count on it. "Why, of course, my dear young lady. I'll send a hundred thousand immediately to cover any further contingencies. I shan't ask a guarantee and I'll pledge myself furthermore from this day on to look after the welfare of your whole family, to pay the market debts of your father and to make good all embezzled trust funds." Address remains Fiala. Hahaha! Yes, just like the Vicomte of Eperies. But that's all nonsense. What can I do now? Something must be done. I must do something. I must do everything that Herr von Dorsday asks so that Father may have the money tomorrow — so that he won't be arrested; that he won't kill himself. And I'll do it, too. Yes, I'll do it. Although it's all for nothing. In half a year we'll all be just as far as we are today! In four weeks, in fact! — But then it will make no difference to me. I'll make this one sacrifice — and no more after that. Never, never, never again. Yes, I'll tell Father so as soon as I get to Vienna; then out of the house — anywhere. I'll consult Fred. He's the only one who really cares for me. But I'm not that far yet. I'm not in Vienna. I'm still in Martino di Castrozza. Nothing has happened yet. So now — how? What?

There's the telegram. What'll I do with the telegram? I knew what I was going to do with it. I must send it to him in his room. But what else? I must write him something to go with it. Yes — but what shall I write him? Expect me at twelve. No, no, no. He'll not have that satisfaction. I won't, I won't, won't, won't. Thank God, I have the powders. That's the only way out. Where are they? For Heaven's sake, they haven't been stolen! No. Here they are. Right here in the box. Are all of them still there? Yes, here they are. One, two, three, four, five, six. I only want to look at them — the precious powders. Looking at them commits me to nothing. And I pour them into the glass, but that commits me to nothing. One, two — but I surely won't kill myself. I wouldn't think of it. Three, four, five, — even five won't really kill anybody. It would be terrible if I didn't have the veronal with me. Then I'd have to jump out of the window, and I wouldn't have the courage for that.

But veronal: — you go to sleep quietly and never wake up again. No trouble. No pain. You lie in bed. You drink it in one draught. Dream — and all is over. The day before yesterday I took a powder, and a few days ago I even took two. Ssh, don't tell anybody. Today it'll have to be a little more. It's only for emergencies. In case he revolts me too much. But why should he revolt me? If he touches me, I'll spit in his face. Very simple.

But how shall I get the letter to him? I can send the letter to Herr von Dorsday by the chambermaid. It would be best if I went downstairs and talked with him and showed him the telegram. In any event, I must go down. I can't stay up here in my room. I couldn't stand it for three hours — until the moment arrives. I must go down; too, for my aunt's sake. Ha, what's my aunt to me? What are the people to me? Look, my good people, there's the glass with veronal. So — now I take it up in my hand. Now I lift it up to my lips. Yes, at any moment I can be over there where there are no aunts and no Dorsday and no father who embezzles trust funds....

But I won't kill myself. That isn't at all necessary. And I won't visit Herr von Dorsday in his room. I wouldn't think of it. I'm blessed if for fifty thousand gulden I'll stand naked in front of an old roué just to save a good-for-nothing from jail. No, no — not in any case. How does Herr von Dorsday come into the picture? Must it be Herr von Dorsday? If one sees me, others shall see me. Yes! Wonderful idea! Everybody shall see me. The whole world shall see me — and then comes the veronal. No, not the veronal. What for? Next will come the villa with the marble steps and the handsome youths and freedom and the wide world. Good evening, Fräulein Else, I like you this way. Haha, down there you'll all think that I've gone mad. But I've never been sensible. For the first time in my life I'm really sensible. Everybody, all of them shall see me! — After that, there's no return. No return home to Father and Mother or uncles and aunts. Then I'll no longer be the Fräulein Else, who can be married off to any old Director Wilomitzer. I'll make fools of them all — especially that rotter Dorsday — and come into the world for a second time.... Otherwise everything is useless — address remains Fiala. Haha!

No more time to lose. Don't become cowardly again. Off with the dress. Who'll be the first? Will it be you, Cousin Paul? Your luck, that the Roman head isn't here any more. Oh, how beautiful I am! Bertha has a black silk chemise. Refined. I'll be much more refined. Wonderful life. Off with the stockings. They'd be indecent. Naked, altogether naked. How Cissy will envy me. And others, too. But they don't dare. They'd all like to — so much. Take me as an example, all of you. I, the virgin, I dare. I'll laugh myself to death over Dorsday. Here I am, Herr Dorsday. Quick — to the post-office. Fifty thousand. Isn't it worth that much?

Beautiful, I'm beautiful! Look at me, Night! Mountains, look at me! Sky, look at me — how beautiful I am. But you are all blind. What are you to me? The people downstairs have eyes. Shall I loose my hair? No. I'd look like a madwoman. But you shan't think me mad. You're only to think me shameless. Canaille. Where's the telegram? For Heaven's sake, where have I left the telegram? There it is lying peacefully beside the veronal. "Repeat urgently — fifty thousand — otherwise everything useless. Address remains Fiala." Yes, that's the telegram. That's a piece of paper, and there are words on it. Despatched in Vienna at four-thirty. No; I'm not dreaming. It's all true, and at home they're all waiting for fifty thousand gulden, and Herr von Dorsday is waiting, too. Let him wait. There's plenty of time. Oh, how pleasant it is to walk up and down the room, naked. Am I really as beautiful as I look in that mirror? Oh, won't you come closer, pretty Fräulein? I want to kiss your blood-red lips. What a pity that the mirror comes between us. The cold mirror. How well we'd get on together. Isn't that so? We need nobody else. Perhaps there are no other people. There are telegrams and hotels and mountains and railroad stations and woods, but there are no people. We merely dream of them. Only Dr. Fiala exists — and his address. It always remains the same. Oh, I'm not at all mad. I'm only a little excited. That's quite natural when one is about to come into the world for a second time. For the Else that once existed is now dead. Yes, most certainly I'm dead. The veronal isn't necessary. Shouldn't I pour it out? The chambermaid might drink it by mistake. I'll leave a slip of paper there, and write on it: Poison: No — better: Medicine. So that nothing will happen to the chambermaid. I'm so noble!! So. Medicine, underscored twice, and three exclamation points. Now nothing can happen. And if I come upstairs and don't feel that I want to commit suicide, and only want to sleep, then I won't drink the whole glass — only a quarter of it, or perhaps even less. Very simple. Everything's prepared. It would be simplest to run down, as I am — across the hallways and the stairs. But no — I might be stopped before I got downstairs. And I must have assurance that Herr von Dorsday will be present. Otherwise, of course, he won't send the money — the reprobate. — But I still have to write to him. That's the most important of all. Oh, the back of the chair is cold, but agreeable. I'll leave my fountain pen to Fred, when I die. But just now I've something more important to do than die. "Most honored Herr Vicomte—" But be sensible, Else. No salutation. Neither most honored nor most despised. "Your condition, Herr von Dorsday, is fulfilled. — At the moment that you read these lines, Herr von Dorsday, your condition is fulfilled, although perhaps not in the manner you had anticipated."— "My, how well the girl writes," Father would say. "And so I cannot but hope that you will keep your part of the agreement and send the fifty thousand gulden by telegraph to the given address. Else." — No, not Else. No signature at all. So. My pretty yellow writing paper. A Christmas present. Too bad. So — and now the telegram and letter go into the envelope. "For Herr von Dorsday," Room Number Sixty-five? Why use the number? I'll just drop the letter at his door as I go by. But I needn't. I needn't do anything. If I felt like it, I could lie in bed now, and sleep, and do no more worrying about anything. Not about Herr von Dorsday, and not about Father. A striped convict's uniform really is very stylish, and many people have killed themselves. After all, everyone must die.

But you needn't do anything for the time being, Father. After all, you have a beautiful grown-up daughter, and address re-mains Fiala. I'll start a collection. I'll pass the plate. Why should Herr von Dorsday be the only one to contribute? That would be unfair. Everyone according to his means. How much will Paul drop on the plate? How much from the man with the pince-nez? But don't imagine that the fun will last. I'll cover myself again, run upstairs to my room, lock myself in, and, if I feel like it, drink the whole glass at one gulp. But I won't feel like it. It would be pure cowardice. They don't deserve such an honor, the rotters. Ashamed before you? Before whom am I to be ashamed? It's not at all necessary. Just let me look into your eyes, beautiful Else. What enormous eyes you have, when one comes near to you. I wish someone would kiss me on the eyes, on my blood-red mouth. My coat hardly covers my ankles. They'll notice that my feet are bare. What of it? They'll see more! But I'm not committed to it. I can go back now, before I've been downstairs. I can turn back on the first floor.

In fact, I needn't go down at all. But I will do it. I look forward to it. Haven't I longed for something like this all my life?

What am I waiting for? After all, I'm ready. The performance may begin. But don't forget the letter. Fred insists my handwriting's aristocratic. Auf Wiedersehen, Else. You're beautiful in that coat. Florentine ladies had themselves painted that way. Their portraits are hung in galleries and it's considered an honor. — Nothing's noticeable when I have the coat about me. Only the feet. My feet. I'll put on my black patent leather shoes. Then they'll think I'm wearing flesh-colored stockings. Done. I'll go through the halls and nobody'll suspect that there's nothing beneath the coat except me. Just me. And besides I can always return upstairs.... Who's playing piano so wonderfully down there? Chopin? — Herr von Dorsday must be rather nervous. Perhaps he's afraid of Paul. Patience — just patience — everything will take care of itself. I don't know anything yet, Herr von Dorsday. I'm in terrible suspense, myself. Put out the light. Oh, is my room in order? Farewell, veronal. Good-bye. Farewell, my dearly beloved looking-glass. — How you shine out in the darkness! Now I'm quite used to being naked under the coat. Rather pleasant. Who knows if there aren't many sitting this way in the hall with no one aware of it? I wonder whether many women don't go to theatre and sit in the loges this way — for fun or for entirely different reasons.

Shall I lock the door? Why? Nothing will be stolen here. And what if there were — I no longer need anything. Finished.... Where's Number Sixty-five? There's nobody in the hall. Everybody's still at dinner. Sixty-one.... Sixty-two.... Such huge mountain-boots in front of the door There are a pair of trousers hanging on the hook. How indecent. Sixty-four.... Sixty-five.... That's where he lives, the Vicomte....

I'll lean the letter against the door. He can't help seeing it there. Nobody'll steal it. So — there it is.... It doesn't matter.... I still can do as I please. I've merely made a fool of him.... If only I don't meet him on the steps now. Here he comes.... No, it isn't he!... This one is much handsomer than Herr von Dorsday. Very aristocratic with that small black moustache. When did he arrive? I might stage a little rehearsal — lift the coat a trifle. I'm very much tempted. Just look at me, my dear sir. You have no idea whom you're passing by. Too bad you're so occupied with climbing the stairs just now. Why don't you stay in the hall? You're missing something. Great performance. Why don't you stop me? My fate lies in your hands. If you greet me, I'll go back again. So, please greet me. After all, I'm looking at you so tenderly.... He won't greet me. He's gone. He's turning back! I feel it. Call me! Greet me! Save me! Perhaps, my dear sir, you will be responsible for my death. But you'll never realize it. Address remains Fiala....

Where am I? In the hall so soon? How did I get here? So few people and so many strangers. Or is my eyesight bad? Where's Dorsday? He's not here. Is this a stroke of fate? I'll go back. I'll write a different letter to Dorsday. I expect you in my room at midnight. Bring the message to the bank with you. No. He might regard it as a snare. It might be one, too. I could have Paul hidden with me, and he could force him to give up the despatch at the point of a revolver. Blackmail. A couple of criminals. Where's Dorsday? Dorsday, where are you? Has he perhaps killed himself in remorse over my death? He'll be in the card room. Of course. He'll be sitting at the card table. If he is, I'll signal to him from the doorway with my eyes. He'll get up at once. "Here I am, my dear young lady." His voice will have that strange sound to it. "Shall we take a little walk, Herr Dorsday?"

"As you please, Fräulein Else." We cross the virgin path to the woods. We're alone. I open my coat. The fifty thousand are due. The air's cold. I contract pneumonia and die.... Why are those two ladies looking at me? Do they notice something? Why am I here? Am I mad? I'll return to my room. I'll dress quickly. Put on the blue dress, the coat over it — but open, this time — and nobody'll believe that I had nothing on before.... I can't go back. I won't go back. Where's Paul? Where's Aunt Emma? Where's Cissy? Where are they all? No one will notice it.... It can't be noticed. Who's playing so beautifully? Chopin? No, Schumann.

I flit about in the hall, like a bat. Fifty thousand! Time flies. I must find this confounded Herr von Dorsday.

No, I must return to my room.... I'll drink some veronal. Only a few drops of it. Then I'll sleep well.... After work well done, sleep is welcome.... But the work hasn't been done.... If the waiter serves that black coffee to the old gentleman over there, everything will be all right. And if he takes it to the young bridal couple in the corner, everything's lost. What's that? What is he doing? He's bringing the coffee to the old gentleman. Triumph! Everything's all right. Ha, there go Cissy and Paul! They're strolling in front of the hotel. They're chatting quite gaily. He isn't so very wrought up over my headache. Hypocrite!... Cissy's figure isn't as good as mine. Of course, she's had a child... What are they talking about? If only I could hear them! Why should their conversation interest me? I might go out, bid them good evening and then go on, flit over the meadows, into the woods, step up, climb up, higher, higher, up to the Cimone, lie down, sleep, and freeze. Mysterious suicide of young Viennese society woman. Dressed only in her black evening coat, the beautiful young lady was found dead in an unfrequented part of the Cimone della Pala.... But perhaps they won't find me.... Or perhaps not until next year. Or even later. Rotted. A skeleton. Better to remain in these warm halls and not freeze. Well, Herr von Dorsday, where are you hiding? Am I obliged to wait? You must find me — not I you. I'll look in the card room. If he isn't there, he has forfeited his privilege and I'll write to him: — You were not to be found, Herr von Dorsday. You disappeared of your own volition. This does not release you of your obligation to forward the money at once. The money. What money? What's that to me? I don't care whether he sends it or not. I've no more sympathy for Father, not the least. I've sympathy for no one. Not even for myself. My heart is dead. I believe it has stopped beating. Perhaps I've drunk the veronal already.... Why does the Dutch family stare at me so? It's impossible to notice anything. The porter also regards me with suspicion. Has another message arrived? Eighty thousand? A hundred thousand? Address remains Fiala. If there were a message, he'd tell me. He looks at me most respectfully. He doesn't know that there's nothing under the coat. Nobody knows it. I'll return to my room. Back, back, back! If I tripped on the stairs — that would be pretty! Three years ago, on the Wörthersee, there was a young woman who went in swimming without clothes, but she left on the same afternoon. Mother says it was an opera singer from Berlin. Schumann? Yes — Carnival. He or she plays very well. The card room is at the right side. Last chance, Herr von Dorsday. If he's there, I'll summon him with my eyes and say to him, "I'll be with you at midnight, you rotter." — No, I'll not call him a rotter. But I'll call him that afterwards.... Somebody's following me. I won't look back. No, no. —

"Else!" — For Heaven's sake, my aunt! I'd better keep right on walking. "Else!" — I must turn around. There's no way out.

"Oh, good evening, Aunt."— "Oh, Else, what's wrong with you? I was just about to go up to you. Paul told me — Oh, how you look!"

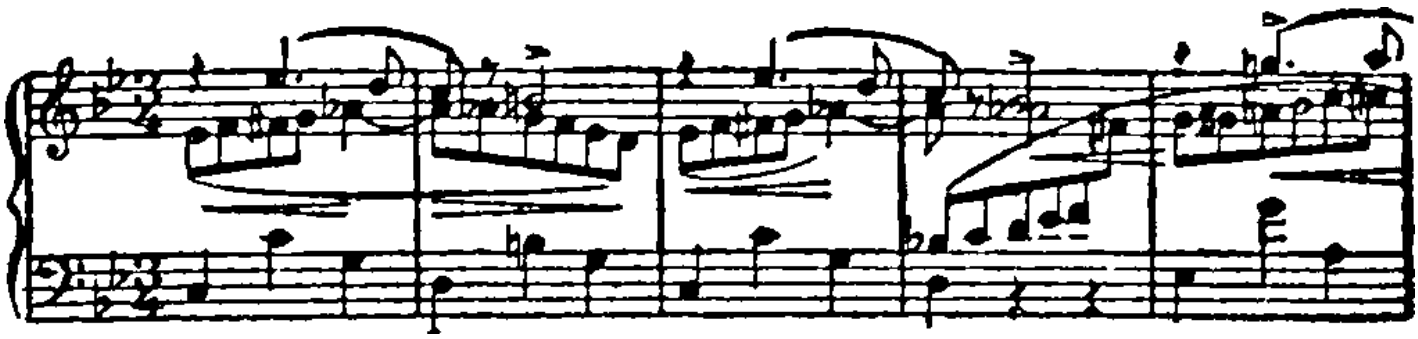
"How do I look, Aunt? I'm feeling quite well. I just ate something." She notices something. "Else — you have — you have no stockings on!"— "What did you say? My soul, I have no stockings on! No —!"— "Aren't you well, Else? Your eyes — you have temperature."— "Temperature? I think not. I've just had the worst headache of my life."— "You must go to bed at once, child; you're deathly pale."— "That's on account of the bad light. Everybody looks pale in this hall." She looks at me so strangely. She can't notice anything? Now, I must keep my poise. All's over with Father if I lose my poise. I must say something. "Do you know, Aunt, what happened to me in Vienna a little while ago? I went out walking with one yellow shoe and one black one." Not a word of it's true. I must keep on talking. What'll I say now?



"Do you know, Aunt, I sometimes have attacks of absent-mindedness. Mother used to have them, too." Not a word of it's true. "In any case, I'll send for the doctor."— "But please Aunt! There isn't one in the hotel. They'll have to call one from the next town. He certainly would laugh if he were called because I had no stockings on. Haha." I oughtn't to laugh so loudly. My aunt's face is distorted with fear. The thing's too weird for her. Her eyes are popping out. "Tell me, Else, have you by any chance seen Paul?" — Ah, she's looking for help. Poise. Poise. Everything depends on it. "I think he's walking in front of the hotel with Cissy Mohr, if I'm not mistaken."— "In front of the hotel? I'll call them both in. We'll all have a little tea. Yes?"— "Gladly." What a stupid face she makes! I nod at her quite amiably and innocently. She's gone. Now I'll go to my room. No; what'll I do in my room? It's high time. High time. Fifty thousand. Fifty thousand. Why am I hurrying so? Slowly. Slowly.... What do I want? What's the man's name? Herr von Dorsday. Funny name.... Here's the card room. Green curtain over the door. They see nothing. I'll stand on tiptoe. A game of whist. They play every evening. Two gentlemen are playing chess over there. Herr von Dorsday isn't here. Victory! Saved! But how so? I must look further. I'm condemned to look for Herr von Dorsday till the end of my life. Probably he's looking for me too. We always miss one another. Perhaps he's looking for me upstairs. We'll meet on the steps. The Dutch people are staring at me again. The daughter is very pretty. The old gentleman has spectacles, spectacles, spectacles.... Fifty thousand. That's not so much, fifty thousand, Herr von Dorsday.

Schumann? Yes, Carnival. I once studied that myself. She plays well. But why she? Perhaps it's a he. Perhaps it's a virtuoso. I'll take one look into the music room.

Yes, there's the door. — Dorsday! I'm falling. Dorsday! He's standing at the window, listening. Is it really possible? I'm burning up — I'm going insane — I'm dead — and he's listening to a strange lady playing piano. Two gentlemen are sitting on the divan. The blond one just arrived today. I saw him get out of the carriage. The lady's no longer young. She's been here for a couple of days. I didn't know that she played piano so beautifully. She's well off. All people are well off... only I am doomed... Dorsday! Dorsday! Is that really he?

He doesn't see me. Now he looks like a decent person. He's listening. Fifty thousand. Now or never. Open the door softly. Here I am, Herr von Dorsday! He doesn't see me. I'll signal to him just once with my eyes; then I'll raise the coat a little. That'll be enough. After all, I'm a young girl. A decent young girl from a good family. Not a prostitute.... I want to go away. I want to take veronal and sleep. You've made a mistake, Herr von Dorsday. I'm no prostitute. Adieu, adieu!... Oh, he's looking up. Here I am, Herr von Dorsday. What eyes he's making. His lips tremble. His eyes are burning into my forehead. He doesn't suspect that there's nothing beneath the coat. Let me go. Let me go. His eyes are shining. His eyes are threatening. What do you want of me? You're a rotter. Nobody sees me — except him. They're listening. So come then, Herr von Dorsday! Don't you notice anything? There in the fauteuil — great God, in the fauteuil — there's the Filou! Heaven be praised! He's here again. He's here again! He was only on a trip and now he's here again. The Roman head is here again. My bridegroom, my beloved! But he doesn't see me. Nor should he see me. What do you want, Herr von Dorsday? You look at me as though I were your slave. I'm not your slave. Fifty thousand! Does our agreement still hold, Herr von Dorsday? I'm ready. Here I am. I'm quite calm. I'm smiling. You understand my look? His eyes say to me: come! His eyes say: I want to see you naked. Well, you swine, I am naked. What more do you want? Send the message... immediately. Chills are running up and down my spine. She's playing on. How wonderful it is to be naked. Chills are running up and down my spine. She's playing on. She doesn't realize what's happening here. Nobody realizes it. No one sees me yet. Filou! Filou! Here I'm standing naked! Dorsday opens his eyes wide. At last he believes it. The Filou gets up. His eyes are glowing. You understand me, beautiful youth. "Ha, ha." The lady is playing no more. Father is saved. Fifty thousand! Address remains Fiala! "Ha, ha, ha!" Who's laughing there? Am I laughing? "Ha, ha, ha!" What are all those faces around me? "Ha, ha, ha!" How stupid of me to laugh. "Ha, ha, ha!" I don't want to laugh — I don't want to. "Ha, ha!"— "Else!" — Who's calling Else? That's Paul. He must be behind me. I feel his breath on my bare back. My ears are ringing. Perhaps I'm already dead. What do you wish, Herr von Dorsday? Why are you so enormous, and why are you staggering towards me? "Ha, ha, ha!" Now what have I done? What have I done? What have I done? I'm falling. All is over. Why has the music stopped? An arm is supporting my back. That's Paul. Where's the Filou? I'm lying here. "Ha, ha, ha!" The coat's thrown over me and I'm lying here. The people think me unconscious. No, I'm not unconscious. I'm in all my senses. I'm a hundred times awake, a thousand times awake. Only, I always have to laugh. "Ha, ha, ha!" Now you have your wish, Herr von Dorsday. You must send the money to Father, immediately.

“Haaaaah!” I don’t want to cry out and I always have to cry out. Why must I cry out? — My eyes are closed. No one can see me. Father is saved. “Else!” —

That’s my aunt. “Else! Else!”— “A doctor, a doctor!”— “Run for the porter!”— ‘What’s happened?”— “It’s impossible.”— “The poor child.” — What are they talking about there? What’s all this murmuring? I’m no poor child. I’m happy. The Filou has seen me naked. Oh, I’m so ashamed! What have I done? Never again will I open my eyes. “Please close the door.” — Why close the door? What a murmur! A thousand people are crowding around me. They’ll think I’m unconscious. I’m not unconscious. I’m only dreaming. “Try to calm yourself, my dear lady.”— “Has a doctor been sent for?” — It’s a fainting spell. “ — How far away they all are. They’re all speaking from Cimone. “We can’t let her lie on the floor.”— “Here’s a shawl.”— “A blanket.”— “A blanket, or a shawl — it’s all the same.”— “Quiet, please.”— “On the divan.”— “Will you please close that door!”— “Don’t be so nervous. It’s already closed.”— “Else! Else!” — If my aunt would only be quiet!— “Do you hear me, Else?”— “Don’t you see, Mother, that she’s unconscious?” — Yes, thank God, to you I’m unconscious and I’ll remain unconscious. “We must take her up to her room.”— “What’s happened here, for God’s sake?” — Cissy. How does Cissy happen to be in the meadow? Ah, but it isn’t the meadow. “Else!”— “Please be quiet.”— “Please step back a bit.” — Hands, hands under me. What do they want? How heavy I am. Paul’s hands. Go away, go away. The Filou’s near me; I can feel it. And Dorsday’s gone. They must look for him. He mayn’t kill himself before he has sent off the fifty thousand. My good people, he owes me money. Arrest him. “Have you any idea from whom the message was, Paul?”— “Good evening, my good people.”— “Else, do you hear me?”— “Just let her be, Frau Cissy.”— “Oh, Paul.”— “The manager says it may be four hours before the doctor arrives.”— “She looks as though she were sleeping” — I’m lying on the divan. Paul is holding my hand. He is feeling my pulse. Right. After all, he’s a physician. “She’s not at all in danger, Mother. An — attack”— “I won’t stay in this hotel a day longer”— “Please, Mother.”— “We’ll leave promptly tomorrow morning.”— “It will be easier to take her over the servants’ stairway. The stretcher will be here immediately.” — Stretcher? Haven’t I already been on a stretcher today? Haven’t I already been dead? Do I have to die again?— “Won’t you please see to it, Herr Director, that the people at least stand clear of the door?”— “Please don’t worry so, Mother.”— “It’s terribly inconsiderate of all these people.” — Why are they all whispering? It’s like a death chamber. The stretcher will be here at once. Open the gate, Sir Matador,— “The path is clear.”— “The people might at least have as much consideration as to—”— “Please, Mother, please calm yourself.”— “Please, my dear lady.”— “Won’t you look after my mother for a while, Frau Cissy?” — She’s his mistress, but she isn’t as beautiful as I am. What’s that again? What’s happening there? They’re bringing in the stretcher. I can see it with closed eyes. That’s the stretcher for the injured. They laid Dr. Zigmondi on it when he fell off the Cimone. And now I’m to lie on the same stretcher. I fell too. “Ha!” No, I won’t cry out again. They’re whispering. Who’s bending over my head? It smells like cigarettes. His hand is under my head. Hands under my back. Hands under my legs. Go away, all of you. Don’t touch me. Shame, shame! What do you want, anyway? Leave me alone. It was only for Father. “Please, carefully, so, slowly.”— “The shawl?”— “Yes, thank you, Frau Cissy” — Why is he thanking her? What has she done for him? What will they do to me? Oh, how good, how good! I’m shivering, shivering. I’m shivering all over. They’re carrying me, carrying me. They’re carrying me to my grave. “Oh, I’m, used to that, Doctor. Heavier people have already lain on the stretcher. Once last fall, there were even two.”— “Sssh, ssh.”— “Perhaps you’d be so good as to go ahead, Frau Cissy, and see that everything in Else’s room is in order.” — What right has Cissy to go in my room? The veronal! The veronal! If only they don’t pour it out. If they did that I’d have to jump out of the window. “Thank you very much, Herr Director, don’t bother further.”— “I’ll take the liberty of inquiring again later on.” — The steps are squeaking. The carriers are wearing heavy mountain-boots. Where are my patent leathers? Back in the music room. They'll be stolen. I wanted to will them to Agatha. Fred gets my fountain pen. They're carrying me, they're carrying me. Funeral procession. Where's Dorsday, the murderer? He's gone away, and so has the Filou. He has gone away too. He has gone back to his wanderings. He came back just for a glimpse of my white body. And now he's gone away again. He's going on a hazardous path between rocks and precipices. Farewell, farewell. — I'm shivering, shivering. Let them carry me upstairs, always further up, up to the roof, up to the sky. It would be so comfortable there. "I've seen it coming all along, Paul." — What has Aunt seen coming? "For the past few days I've seen it coming along. She's really not normal. Of course, she must go to an asylum."— "But, Mother, this certainly isn't the time to speak of that." — Asylum —? Asylum —?!— "You don't really imagine, Paul, that I'd return to Vienna in the same compartment with this person. We'd go through some pretty experiences."— "Nothing whatsoever will happen to you, Mother. I'll guarantee that you won't have the slightest embarrassment."— "How can you guarantee that?" — No, Aunt, you'll have no embarrassment. Nobody will be embarrassed. Not even Herr von Dorsday.

Where are we now? We're standing still. We're on the second floor. I'll just open my eyes for a second. Cissy's standing there in the doorway talking with Paul. "Over this way, please. So. Here. Thank you. Move the stretcher very close to the bed." — They're lifting the stretcher. They're carrying me. It feels good. Now I'm home again. Ah!— "Thank you. This way. That's right. Please close the door. — If you'd be so good as to help me, Cissy."— "Oh, with pleasure, Herr Doctor."— "Slowly, please. Here, please, Cissy, take hold of her here. Here at the legs. Carefully, now. And then — Else —? Do you hear me, Else?" — Why of course I hear you, Paul. I hear everything, but what does that matter to you? It's so wonderful to be unconscious. Oh, go ahead and do as you please. "Paul!"

— — "gnädige Frau?"— "Do you really think that she's unconscious, Paul dear?"

—— Paul dear? She calls him dear! — I've caught you! Dear is what she calls him!

— "Yes, she's altogether unconscious. That's what generally happens after an attack like this."— "Paul, I could laugh myself sick when you act so mature in your medical manner." — I've caught you, you hypocrites! I've caught you. "Keep quiet, Cissy."— "Why should I keep quiet if she can't hear anything?" — What's happened? I'm lying naked in bed under the covers. How did they get me here?:— "Well, how is she? Better?" — That's Aunt. What does she want now?— "She's still unconscious?" — She's creeping around the room on tiptoe. She can go to the devil. I won't be taken to an asylum. I'm not insane. "Isn't there any way of waking her up?"— "She'll soon come to, Mother. She needs nothing right now except rest. So do you, Mother. Don't you want to sleep? There's absolutely no danger. I'll stay here with Frau Cissy and take care of Else through the night."— "Yes, indeed, dear lady, I'll be the chaperon, or Else will be, depending on how you look at it." — Horrible woman. Here I'm lying unconscious and she's joking. "And I can definitely depend upon it, Paul, that you'll wake me just as soon as the doctor arrives?"— "But, Mother, he wont be here until morning"— "She looks as though she is sleeping. Her breathing is regular."— "As a matter of fact, Mother, it is a sort of sleep."— "I still cant control myself, Paul. Such a scandal! — You'll see, it'll appear in all the papers."— "Mother!"— "But she can't hear anything if she's unconscious. We're talking very quietly."— "In this condition the senses are sometimes unusually acute."

— "You have such a learned son, gnädige Frau."— "Please, Mother, go to bed."— "Tomorrow morning we'll leave, no matter what happens. And in Bozen we'll get a nurse for Else." — What? A nurse? You will be disappointed in that, too. "Well, we'll talk about all that tomorrow. Good night, Mother."— "I'll have a cup of tea brought up to my room and look in here again in a quarter of an hour."— "That's absolutely unnecessary, Mother.". — No, it certainly isn't necessary. You just go to the devil. Where's the veronal? I'll have to wait. They're taking my aunt to the door. No one can see me now. It must be on the night table, that glass of veronal. If I drink it, all will be over. I'll drink it immediately. My aunt is away. Paul and Cissy are standing by the door. Ha, she's kissing him. She's kissing him, and I'm lying naked under the covers. Aren't you two ashamed of yourselves? She's kissing him again. Aren't you two ashamed of yourselves?— "Do you see, Paul? Now I know that she's unconscious. Otherwise she'd jump up at me."— "Won't you please do me a favor, Cissy, and be quiet?"— "But why, Paul? Either she is really unconscious, in which case she can hear and see nothing, or else she's making fools of us. If that's so, it serves her altogether right."— "Someone's knocked."— "I thought so, too."— "I'll open the door softly and see who it is. — Good evening, Herr von Dorsday."— "Excuse me, I just wanted to inquire how Else is." — Dorsday! Dorsday! Does he really dare? How beastly. Where is he? I hear them whispering in front of the door, Paul and Dorsday. Cissy is standing before the mirror. What are you doing there by the mirror? It's my mirror. Isn't my picture still in it? What are they talking about in front of the door, Paul and Dorsday? I feel Cissy's gaze. She's looking at me through the mirror. What does she want? Why is she coming nearer? Help! Help! I'm calling and no one hears me. What do you want at my bed, Cissy?! Why are you bending over me? Do you want to strangle me? I can't move. "Else!" — What does she want?— "Else! Do you hear me, Else?" — I hear, but I can't talk. I'm powerless. I can't talk. "Else, you gave us a nice fright downstairs." — She talks to me just as though I were awake. What does she want?— "Do you know what you have done, Else? Just think. You came down to the music room dressed only in your coat and suddenly you stood there naked before all the people, and then you fell down unconscious. They say it was a hysterical attack. I don't believe a word of it. I also don't believe that you're unconscious. I'll bet you re hearing every word of what I'm saying." — Yes, I hear, yes, yes, yes. But she doesn't hear me. Why not? I can't move my lips. That's why she can't hear me. I can't move. What's the matter with me? Am I dead? Do I seem dead? Am I dreaming? Where's the veronal? I want to drink my veronal, but I can't stretch out my arm. Go away, Cissy. Why are you bending over me? Go away, go away. She'll never know that I heard her. No one will ever know. I'll never talk to anyone again. I'll never wake up again. She's going to the door. She's turning around once more to look at me. She's opening the door. Dorsday's standing there. I've just seen him with my eyes closed. No, I really see him. My eyes are open. The door's ajar. Cissy is outside. Now they're all whispering. I'm alone. If I could only move now.

Ha! I can. Yes! I can move my hand. I'm stretching out my finger. I'm stretching 'out my arm. I'm opening my eyes wide. I see. I see. There's my glass. Quick, before they come into the room again. Are there enough veronal powders in it? I must never awaken again. What I had to do in the world I've done. Father is saved. I could never go out among people again. Paul is peering through the door. He thinks I'm unconscious. He doesn't see that I have my arm almost extended. Now they're all three standing outside of the room again. The murderers! — They're all murderers, Dorsday and Cissy and Paul. Also, Fred is a murderer and Mother is a murderer. They all murdered me and say nothing about it. They'll say, "She committed suicide." All of you killed me. All of you killed me. All of you. All of you. Well, have I finally reached it? Quick, quick. I must. I mustn't spill a drop. So, quick. It tastes good. More, more. It isn't poison at all. Nothing ever tasted so good. If you only knew how good death tastes! Good night, my glass. Klirr, klirr! What's that? The glass is lying on the floor. It's lying down there. Good night. "Else! Else!" — What do they want?— "Else!" — Are you here again? Good morning. Here I am lying unconscious with closed eyes. You'll never see my eyes again. "She must have moved, Paul. How else could the glass have dropped?"— "It was an involuntary movement. That would have been quite possible."— "Well, if she isn't awake."— "What's the matter with you, anyhow, Cissy? Just look at her." — I've drunk veronal. I'll die. But everything is just as it was before. Perhaps it wasn't enough. Paul's holding my hand. "The pulse is quiet. But don't laugh, Cissy.

The poor girl."— "I wonder whether you'd call me a poor girl too if I'd stood naked in the center of the music room?"— "Won't you please keep still, Cissy?"— "Just as you wish, my dear sir. Perhaps I ought to go away so that I can leave you alone with the naked lady. But please don't be embarrassed. Just act as though I weren't here at all." — I've drunk veronal. It's good. I'll die. Thank God. "Well, now, I'll tell you what I think. I think that this Herr von Dorsday is in love with the naked lady. He was as excited as though it were a personal matter with him." — Dorsday, Dorsday! Why, that's the — Fifty thousand! Will he send it off? For God's sake, what will happen if he doesn't? I must tell him. They must bring him back. For God's sake, all this might be for nothing. But I can still be saved. Paul! Cissy! Why don't you hear me? Don't you know that I'm dying? But I don't feel anything. I'm just tired. Paul, I'm just tired. Don't you hear me? I'm tired, Paul. I can't open my lips. I can't move my tongue, but I'm not dead yet. That's the veronal. Where are you, anyhow? I'll fall asleep presently. Then it will be too late. I don't hear them talking at all. They're talking, and I don't know it. Their voices buzz so. Oh, Paul, please help me! My tongue is so heavy. "I think, Cissy, that she'll soon wake up. She looks as though she's trying to open her eyes. Well, Cissy, what are you doing now?"— "I'm only putting my arms around you. Why shouldn't I? I know she didn't have any sense of shame either." — No, I had no sense of shame. I stood there naked before all those people. If I could only speak you would understand. Paul! Paul! I want you to hear me. I drank veronal, Paul. Ten powders, a hundred. I didn't want to do it. I was mad. I don't want to die. Save me, Paul. You're a doctor. Save me!— "She seems to be quiet again. Her pulse is fairly regular." — Save me, Paul. I implore you. Don't let me die. There is still time. But I'll soon fall asleep, and you won't know it. I don't want to die. Please save me. It was only for Father's sake. Dorsday insisted on it. Paul! Paul!— "Look, Cissy, doesn't it seem to you that she's smiling?"— "Well, why shouldn't she smile, Paul, when you constantly hold her hand so tenderly?" — Cissy, Cissy, what did I ever do to you that you are so cruel? Keep your Paul, but don't let me die. I'm so young. Mother will grieve. I still want to climb many mountains. I still want to dance. And some day I'll marry. I still want to travel. Tomorrow we're going on a trip up the Cimone. Tomorrow will be a lovely day. The Filou will come along. I'll invite him humbly. Run after him, Paul. He's going his hazardous way. He'll meet Father. Address remains Fiala. Don't forget that. It's only fifty thousand and then everything will be all right. Look, they're all marching in convicts' clothes, and singing. Open the gate, Sir Matador! It's all just a dream. And here comes Fred with his hoarse lady. And the piano's out under the great, broad sky. The piano tuner lives in Bartenstein Street, Mother! Why didn't you write to him, child? You always forget everything. You ought to practice more scales, Else. A girl of thirteen ought to be more industrious. Rudi was at a masked ball and he came home at eight o'clock in the morning. What have you brought along for me, Father? Thirty thousand dolls. I'll need a separate house for them. But perhaps they can go strolling in the garden. Or go with Rudi to the masked ball. God bless you, Else. Oh, Bertha, are you back from Naples again? Yes, from Sicily. I want you to meet my husband, Else. Enchanté, Monsieur. "Else, do you hear me, Else? Ifs I, Paul." — Haha, Paul. Why are you sitting on the giraffe on the merry-go-round?— "Else, Else!" — Don't ride away from me. You can't hear me if you ride so fast through the main street. I want you to save me. I've taken veronalica. It's running over my legs, right and left, like ants. Go and catch Herr von Dorsday. There he goes. Don't you see him? There he jumps over the pond. He's killed Father, so run after him. I'll run with you. They've strapped the stretcher over my back, but I'll run along. I'm trembling so, but I'll run along. Where are you, Paul? Fred, where are you? Mother, where are you? Cissy? Why do you all let me run alone? I'm afraid being so alone. I'd rather fly. I knew it. I can fly.

"Else!"...

"Else!"...

Where are you? I hear you, but I don't see you.

"Else!"...

"Else!"...

"Else!"...

What's that? A whole chorus? And an organ too? I'm singing along. What's the song they're all singing? Everybody's singing along. The woods too, and the mountains, and the stars. Never have I heard anything so beautiful. Never have I seen such a brilliant night. Give me your hand, Father. We'll fly together. The world is so beautiful when you can fly. Don't kiss my hand. I'm your child, Father.

"Else! Else!"

They're calling me from so far away. What do you all want? Don't wake me. Oh, I'm sleeping so well. Tomorrow morning. I'm dreaming and flying. I'm flying... flying... flying... sleeping and dreaming... and flying... not waking... early morning...

"El..."

I'm flying... I'm dreaming... I'm sleeping... I'm drea... drea — I'm fly...

The Road into the Open (1908)

Original German Title: 'Der Weg ins Freie'

Translated by Horace Samuel, 1913

First published in Berlin by S. Fischer Verlag in 1908, Der Weg ins Freie tells the story of the aristocratic young composer Georg von Wergenthin-Recco, who has talent, yet lacks the drive to get down to work. Instead, he spends the majority of his time socialising with members of the assimilationist, artistically sensitive Jewish bourgeoisie of Vienna and other non-Jews like himself that enjoy their company.

The plot centres on Georg's affair with a Catholic lower middle class girl named Anna Rosner. The novel's reputation rests not on the story of this affair, however, but on Schnitzler's engaging description, sourced from first-hand experience, of the milieu he describes and the topics that interest him, including the arts and the psychology of love. The novel is also well-known for its description of how anti-Semitism was gradually dominating so much of life and politics in Austria-Hungary at the time.

GEORGE VON WERGENTHIN sat at table quite alone to-day. His elder brother Felician had chosen to dine out with friends for the first time after a longish interval. But George felt no particular inclination to renew his acquaintance with Ralph Skelton, Count Schönstein or any of the other young people, whose gossip usually afforded him so much pleasure; for the time being he did not feel in the mood for any kind of society.

The servant cleared away and disappeared. George lit a cigarette and then in accordance with his habit walked up and down the big three-windowed rather low room, while he wondered how it was that this very room which had for many weeks seemed to him so gloomy was now gradually beginning to regain its former air of cheerfulness. He could not help letting his glance linger on the empty chair at the top end of the table, over which the September sun was streaming through the open window in the centre. He felt as though he had seen his father, who had died two months ago, sit there only an hour back, as he visualised with great clearness the very slightest mannerisms of the dead man, even down to his trick of pushing his coffee-cup away, adjusting his pince-nez or turning over the leaves of a pamphlet.

George thought of one of his last conversations with his father which had occurred in the late spring before they had moved to the villa on the Veldeser Lake. George had just then come back from Sicily, where he had spent April with Grace on a melancholy and somewhat boring farewell tour before his mistress's final return to America. He had done no real work for six months or more, and had not even copied out the plaintive adagio which he had heard in the plashing of the waves on a windy morning in Palermo as he walked along the beach. George had played over the theme to his father and improvised on it with an exaggerated wealth of harmonies which almost swamped the original melody, and when he had launched into a wildly modulated variation, his father had smilingly asked him from the other end of the piano— "Whither away, whither away?" George had felt abashed and allowed the swell of the notes to subside, and his father had begun a discussion about his son's future with all his usual affection, but with rather more than his usual seriousness. This conversation ran through his mind to-day as though it had been pregnant with presage. He stood at the window and looked out. The park outside was fairly empty. An old woman wearing an old-fashioned cloak with glass beads sat on a seat. A nursemaid walked past holding one child by the hand while another, a little boy, in a hussar uniform, with a buckled-on sabre and a pistol in his belt, ran past, looked haughtily round and saluted a veteran who came down the path smoking. Further down the grounds were a few people sitting round the kiosk, drinking coffee and reading the papers. The foliage was still fairly thick, and the park looked depressed and dusty and altogether far more summer-like than usual for late September.

George rested his arms on the window-sill, leant forwards and looked at the sky. He had not left Vienna since his father's death, though he had had many opportunities of so doing. He could have gone with Felician to the Schönstein estate; Frau Ehrenberg had written him a charming letter inviting him to come to Auhof; he could easily have found a companion for that long-planned cycle-tour through Carinthia and the Tyrol, which he had not the energy to undertake alone. But he preferred to stay in Vienna and occupy his time with perusing and putting in order the old family papers. He found archives which went as far back as his great-grandfather Anastasius von Wergenthin, who haled from the Rhine district and had by his marriage with a Fräulein Recco become possessed of an old castle near Bozen which had been uninhabitable for a long period. There were also documents dealing with the history of George's grandfather, a major of artillery who had fallen before Chlum in the year 1866.

The major's son, the father of Felician and himself, had devoted himself to scientific studies, principally botany, and had taken at Innsbruck the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. At the age of twenty-four he had made the acquaintance of a young girl of an old family of Austrian officials, who had brought her up to be a singer, more with a view to rendering her independent of the limited, not to say impoverished, resources of the household, than because she had any real vocation. Baron von Wergenthin saw and heard her for the first time at a concert-performance of the Missa Solemnis and in the following May she became his wife. Three years later the health of the Baroness began to fail, and she was ordered South by the doctors. She did not recover as soon as was anticipated, with the result that the house in Vienna was given up, and the Baron and his family lived for several years a kind of hotel-life, as they travelled from one place to another. His business and studies frequently summoned the Baron to Vienna, but the sons never left their mother. The family lived in Sicily, Rome, Tunis, Corfu, Athens, Malta, Merano, the Riviera, and finally in Florence; never in very great style, but fairly well nevertheless, and without curtailing their expenditure sufficiently to prevent a substantial part of the Baron's fortune being gradually eaten up. George was eighteen when his mother died. Nine years had passed since then, but the memory of that spring evening was still as vivid as ever, when his father and brother had happened to be out, and he had stood alone and helpless by his mother's death-bed, while the talk and laughter of the passers-by had flowed in with the spring air through the hastily opened windows with all the jar of its unwelcome noise.

The survivors took their mother's body back to Vienna. The Baron devoted himself to his studies with new and desperate zeal. He had formerly enjoyed the reputation of an aristocratic dilettante, but he now began to be taken quite seriously even in academic circles, and when he was elected honorary president of the Botanical Society he owed that distinction to something more than the accident of a noble name. Felician and George entered themselves as law students. But after some time their father himself encouraged the boys to abandon their university studies, and go in for a more general education and one more in accordance with their musical tendencies. George felt thankful and relieved at this new departure. But even in this sphere which he had chosen himself, he was by no means industrious, and he would often occupy himself for weeks on end with all manner of things that had nothing at all to do with his musical career.

It was this same trait of dilettantism which made him now go through the old family documents as seriously as though he were investigating some important secrets of the past. He spent many hours busying himself with letters which his parents had exchanged in years gone by, wistful letters and superficial letters, melancholy letters and placid letters, which brought back again to life not merely the departed ones themselves but other men and women half sunk in oblivion. His German tutor now appeared to him again with his sad pale forehead just as he used to declaim his Horace to him on their long walks, there floated up in his mind the wild brown boyish face of Prince Alexander of Macedon in whose company George had had his first riding lessons in Rome; and then the Pyramids of Cestius limned as though in a dream with black lines on a pale blue horizon reared their peaks, just as George had seen them once in the twilight as he came home from his first ride in the Campagna. And as he abandoned himself still more to his reverie there appeared sea-shores, gardens and streets, though he had no knowledge of the landscape or the town that had furnished them to his memory; images of human beings swept past him; some of these, whom he had met casually on some trivial occasion, were very clear, others again, with whom he might at some time or other have passed many days, were shadowy and distant.

When George had finished inspecting the old letters and was putting his own papers in order, he found in an old green case some musical jottings of his boyhood, whose very existence had so completely vanished from his memory, that if they had been put before him as the records of some one else he would not have known the difference. Some affected him with a kind of pleasant pain, for they seemed to him to contain promises which he was perhaps never to fulfil. And yet he had been feeling lately that something had been hatching within him. He saw his development as a mysterious but definite line which showed the way from those first promising notes in the green case to quite new ideas, and this much he knew — the two songs out of the "Westöstliche Divan" which he had set to music this summer on a sultry afternoon, while Felician lay in his hammock and his father worked in his armchair on the cool terrace, could not have been composed by your ordinary person.

George moved back a step from the window as though surprised by an absolutely unexpected thought. He had never before realised with such clearness that there had been an absolute break in his life since his father's death down to to-day. During the whole time he had not given a single thought to Anna Rosner to whom he had sent the songs in manuscript. And he felt pleasurably thrilled at the thought that he could hear her melodious melancholy voice again and accompany her singing on that somewhat heavy piano, as soon as he wished. And he remembered the old house in the Paulanergasse, with its low door and badly lighted stairs which he had not been up more than three or four times, in the mood in which a man thinks of something which he has known very long and held very dear.

A slight soughing traversed the leaves in the park outside. Thin clouds appeared over the spire of the Stephan Tower, which stood directly opposite the window, on the other side of the park, and over a largish part of the town. George was faced with a long afternoon without any engagements. It seemed to him as though all his former friendships during the two months of mourning had dissolved or broken up. He thought of the past spring and winter with all their complications and mad whirl of gaiety, and all kinds of images came back into his memory — the ride with Frau Marianne in the closed fiacre through the snow-covered forest. The masked ball at Ehrenberg's with Else's subtly-naive remarks about "Hedda Gabler" with whom she insisted she felt a certain affinity, and with Sissy's hasty kiss from under the black lace of her mask. A mountain expedition in the snow from Edlach up to the Rax with Count Schönstein and Oskar Ehrenberg, who, though very far from being a born mountaineer, had jumped at the opportunity of tacking himself on to two blue-blooded gentlemen. The evening at Ronacher's with Grace and young Labinski, who had shot himself four days afterwards either on account of Grace, debts, satiety, or as a sheer piece of affectation. The strange hot and cold conversation with Grace in the cemetery in the melting February snow two days after Labinski's funeral. The evening in the hot lofty fencing-room where Felician's sword had crossed the dangerous blade of the Italian master. The walk at night after the Paderewski concert when his father had spoken to him more intimately than ever before of that long-past evening on which his dead mother had sung in the Missa Solemnis in the very hall which they had just come out of. And finally Anna Rosner's tall quiet figure appeared to him, leaning on the piano, with the score in her hand, and her smiling blue eyes turned towards the keys, and he even heard her voice reverberating in his soul.

While he stood like this at the window and looked down at the park which was gradually becoming animated, he felt a certain consolation in the fact that he had no close ties with any human being, and that there were so many people to whom he could attach himself once more and whose set he could enter again as soon as the fancy took him. He felt at the same time wonderfully rested and more in the vein for work and happiness than he had ever been. He was full of great bold resolutions and joyfully conscious of his youth and independence. He no doubt felt a certain shame at the thought that at any rate at the present moment his grief for his dead father was much alleviated; but he found a relief for this indifference of his in the thought of his dear father's painless end. He had been walking up and down the garden chatting with his two sons, had suddenly looked round him as though he heard voices in the distance, had then looked up towards the sky and had suddenly dropped down dead on the sward, without a cry of pain or even a twitching of the lips.

George went back into the room, got ready to go out and left the house. He intended to walk about for a couple of hours wherever chance might take him, and in the evening to work again at his quintette, for which he now felt in the right mood. He crossed the street and went into the park. The sultriness had passed. The old woman in the cloak still sat on the seat and stared in front of her. Children were playing on the sandy playground round the trees. All the chairs round the kiosk were taken. A clean-shaven gentleman sat in the summer-house whom George knew by sight and who had impressed him by his likeness to the elder Grillparzer. By the pond George met a governess with two well-dressed children and received a flashing glance. When he got out of the Park into the Ringstrasse he met Willy Eissler who was wearing a long autumn overcoat with dark stripes and began to speak to him.

"Good afternoon, Baron, so you've come back to Vienna again."

"I've been back a long time," answered George. "I didn't leave Vienna again after my father's death."

"Yes, yes, quite so.... Allow me, once again...." And Willy shook hands with George.

"And what have you been doing this summer?" asked George.

"All kinds of things. Played tennis, and painted, rotted about, had some amusing times and a lot of boring ones...." Willy spoke extremely quickly, with a deliberate though slight hoarseness, briskly and yet nonchalantly with a combination of the Hungarian, French, Viennese and Jewish accents. "Anyway, I came early to-day, just as you see me now, from Przemysl," he continued.

"Drill?"

"Yes, the last one. I'm sorry to say so. Though I'm nearly an old man, I've always found it a joke to trot about with my yellow epaulettes, clanking my spurs, dragging my sabre along, spreading an atmosphere of impending peril, and being taken by incompetent Lavaters for a noble count." They walked along by the side of the railing of the Stadtpark.

"Going to Ehrenbergs' by any chance?" asked Willy.

"No, I never thought of it."

"Because this is the way. I say, have you heard, Fräulein Else is supposed to be engaged?"

"Really?" queried George slowly. "And whom to?"

"Guess, Baron."

"Come, Hofrat Wilt?"

"Great heavens!" cried Willy, "I'm sure it's never entered his head! Becoming S. Ehrenberg's son-in-law might result in prejudicing his government career — nowadays."

George went on guessing. "Rittmeister Ladisc?"

"Oh no, Fräulein Else is far too clever to be taken in by him."

George then remembered that Willy had fought a duel with Ladisc a few years back. Willy felt George's look, twirled somewhat nervously his blonde moustache which drooped in the Polish fashion and began to speak quickly and offhandedly.

"The fact that Rittmeister Ladisc and myself once had a difference cannot prevent me from loyally recognising the fact that he is, and always has been, a drunken swine. I have an invincible repulsion, which even blood cannot wash out, against those people who gorge themselves sick at Jewish houses and then start slanging the Jews as soon as they get on the door-steps. They ought to be able to wait till they got to the café. But don't exert yourself any more by guessing. Heinrich Bermann is the lucky man."

"Impossible," said George.

"Why?" asked Eissler. "It had to be some one sooner or later. Bermann is no Adonis, I agree, but he's a coming man, and Else's official ideal of a mixture of gentleman-rider and athlete will never turn up. Meanwhile she has reached twenty-four, and she must have had enough by now of Salomon's tactless remarks and Salomon's jokes."

"Salomon? — oh, yes — Ehrenberg."

"You only know him by the initial S? S of course stands for Salomon... and as for only S standing on the door, that is simply a concession he made to his family. If he could follow his own fancy he would prefer to turn up at the parties Madame Ehrenberg gives in a caftan and side-curls."

"Do you think so? He's not so very strict?"

"Strict?... Really now! It's nothing at all to do with strictness. It is only cussedness, particularly against his son Oskar with his feudal ideals."

"Really," said George with a smile, "wasn't Oskar baptised long ago? Why, he's a reserve officer in the dragoons."

"That's why... well, I've not been baptised and nevertheless... yes... there are always exceptions... with good will...." He laughed and went on. "As for Oskar, he would personally prefer to be a Catholic. But he thought for the time being he would have to pay too dearly for the pleasure of being able to go to confession. There's sure to be a provision in the will to take care that Oskar doesn't 'vert over."

They had arrived in front of the Café Imperial. Willy remained standing. "I've got an appointment here with Demeter Stanzides."

"Please remember me to him."

"Thanks very much. Won't you come in and have an ice?"

"Thanks, I'll prowl about a little more."

"You like solitude?"

"It's hard to give an answer to so general a question," replied George.

"Of course," said Willy, suddenly grew serious and lifted his hat. "Good afternoon, Baron."

George held out his hand. He felt that Willy was a man who was continually defending a position though there was no pressing necessity for him to do so.

"Au revoir," he said with real sincerity. He felt now as he had often done before, that it was almost extraordinary that Willy should be a Jew. Why, old Eissler, Willy's father, who composed charming Viennese waltzes and songs, was a connoisseur and collector, and sometimes a seller of antiquities, and objets d'art, and had passed in his day for the most celebrated boxer in Vienna, was, what with his long grey beard and his monocle, far more like a Hungarian magnate than a Jewish patriarch. Besides, Willy's own temperament, his deliberate cultivation of it and his iron will had made him into the deceptive counterpart of a feudal gentleman bred and born. What, however, distinguished him from other young people of similar race and ambition was the fact that he was accustomed to admit his origin, to demand explanation or satisfaction for every ambiguous smile, and to make merry himself over all the prejudices and vanities of which he was so often the victim.

George strode along, and Willy's last question echoed in his ears. Did he love solitude?... He remembered how he had walked about in Palermo for whole mornings while Grace, following her usual habit, lay in bed till noon.... Where was she now...? Since she had said goodbye to him in Naples he had in accordance with their arrangement heard nothing from her. He thought of the deep blue night which had swept over the waters when he had travelled alone to Genoa after that farewell, and of the soft strange fairy-like song of two children who, nestling closely up against each other and wrapped, the pair of them, in one rug, had sat on the deck by the side of their sleeping mother.

With a growing sense of well-being he walked on among the people who passed by him with all the casual nonchalance of a Sunday. Many a glad glance from a woman's eye met his own, and seemed as though it would have liked to console him for strolling about alone and with all the external appearances of mourning on this beautiful holiday afternoon. And another picture floated up in his mind. — He saw himself on a hilly sward, after a hot June day, late in the evening. Darkness all around. Deep below him a clatter of men, laughter and noise, and glittering fairy-lamps. Quite near, girls' voices came out of the darkness.... He lit the small pipe which he usually only smoked in the country; the flare of the vesta showed him two pretty young peasant wenches, still almost children. He chatted to them. They were frightened because it was so dark; they nestled up to him. Suddenly a whizz, rockets in the air, a loud "Ah!" from down below. Bengal lights flaring violet and red over the invisible lake beneath. The girls rushed down the hill and vanished. Then it became dark again and he lay alone and looked up into the darkness which swam down on him in all its sultriness. The night before the day on which his father died had been one such as this. And he thought of him for the first time to-day.

He had left the Ringstrasse and taken the direction of the Wieden. Would the Rosners be at home on such a beautiful day? At all events the distance was so short that it was worth trying, and at any rate he fancied going there rather than to Ehrenbergs'. He was not the least in love with Else, and it was almost a matter of indifference to him whether or no she were really engaged to Heinrich Bermann. He had already known her for a long time. She had been eleven, he had been fourteen when they had played tennis with each other on the Riviera. In those days she looked like a gipsy girl. Black-blue tresses tossed round her cheeks and forehead, and she was as boisterous as a boy. Her brother had already begun to play the lord, and even to-day George could not help smiling at the recollection of the fifteen-year old boy appearing on the promenade one day in a light grey coat with white black-braided gloves and a monocle in his eye. Frau Ehrenberg was then thirty-four, and had a dignified appearance though her figure was too large; she was still beautiful, had dim eyes, and was usually very tired.

George never forgot the day on which her husband, the millionaire cartridge-manufacturer, had descended on his family and had by the very fact of his appearance made a speedy end of the Ehrenbergian aristocracy. George still remembered in his mind's eye how he had sprung up during the breakfast on the hotel terrace; a small spare gentleman with a trimmed beard and moustache and Japanese eyes, in badly-creased white flannels, a dark straw hat with a red-and-white striped ribbon on his round head and with dusty black shoes. He always spoke very slowly and in an as it were sarcastic manner even about the most unimportant matters, and whenever he opened his mouth a secret anxiety would always lurk beneath the apparent calm of his wife's face. She tried to revenge herself by making fun of him; but she could never do anything with his inconsiderate manners. Oskar behaved whenever he had a chance as though he didn't belong to the family at all. A somewhat hesitating contempt would play over his features for that progenitor who was not quite worthy of him, and he would smile meaningly for sympathy at the young baron. Only Else in those days was really nice to her father. She was quite glad to hang on his arm on the promenade and she would often throw her arms round his neck before every one.

George had seen Else again in Florence a year before his mother's death. She was then taking drawing lessons from an old grizzled German, about whom the legend was circulated that he had once been celebrated. He spread the rumour about himself that when he felt his genius on the wane he had discarded his former well-known name and had given up his calling, though what that was he never disclosed. If his own version was to be believed, his downfall was due to a diabolical female who had destroyed his most important picture in a fit of jealousy; and then ended her life by jumping out of the window. This man who had struck the seventeen-year-old George as a kind of fool and impostor was the object of Else's first infatuation. She was then fourteen years old, and had all the wildness and naïveté of childhood. When she stood in front of the Titian Venus in the Uffizi Gallery her cheeks would flush with curiosity, yearning and admiration, and vague dreams of future experiences would play in her eyes. She often came with her mother to the house which the Wergenthins had hired at Lungarno, and while Frau Ehrenberg tried in her languid blasé way to amuse the ailing baroness, Else would stand at the window with George, start precocious conversations about the art of the Pre-Raphaelites, and smile at her old childish games. Felician too would come in sometimes, slim and handsome, cast his cold grey eyes over the objects and people in the room, murmur a few polite words, sit down by his mother's bedside, and tenderly stroke and kiss her hand. He would usually soon go away again, though not without leaving behind, so far as Else was concerned, a very palpable atmosphere of old-time aristocracy, cold-blooded fascination and elegant contempt of death. She always had the impression that he was going to a gaming-table where hundreds of thousands were at stake, to a duel to the death or to a princess with red hair and a dagger on her dressing-table. George remembered that he had been somewhat jealous both of the erratic drawing-master and of his brother. The master was suddenly dismissed for reasons which were never specified, and soon afterwards Felician left for Vienna with Baron von Wergenthin. George now played to the ladies on the piano more frequently than before, both his own compositions and those of others, and Else would sing from the score easy songs from Schubert and Schumann in her small, rather shrill voice. She visited the galleries and churches with her mother and George; when spring came there were excursion parties up the Hill Road or to Fiesole, and George and Else exchanged smiling glances which were eloquent of a deeper understanding than actually existed. Their relations went on progressing in this somewhat disingenuous manner, when their acquaintance was renewed and continued in Vienna. Else seemed pleasurably thrilled all over again by the equable friendly manner with which George approached her, notwithstanding the fact that they had not seen each other for some months. She herself, on the other hand, grew outwardly more self-possessed and mentally more unsettled with each succeeding year. She had abandoned her artistic aspirations fairly early, and in the course of time she came to regard herself as destined to the most varied careers.

She often saw herself in the future as a society woman, an organiser of battles of flowers, a patroness of great balls, taking part in aristocratic charity performances; more frequently she would believe herself called to sit enthroned as a great appreciator in an artistic salon of painters, musicians and poets. She would then dream again of a more adventurous life: a sensational marriage with an American millionaire, the elopement with a violin virtuoso or a Spanish officer, a diabolical ruination of all the men who came near her. Sometimes she would think a quiet life in the country by the side of a worthy landowner the most desirable consummation; and then she would imagine herself sitting with prematurely grey hair at a simply-laid table in a circle of numerous children while she stroked the wrinkles out of the forehead of her grave husband. But George always felt that her love of comfort, which was deeper than she guessed herself, would save her from any rash step. She would often confide in George without ever being quite honest with him; for the wish which she cherished most frequently and seriously of all was to become his wife. George was well aware of this, but that was not the only reason why the latest piece of intelligence about her engagement with Heinrich Bermann struck him as somewhat incredible — this Bermann was a gaunt clean-shaven man with gloomy eyes and straight and rather too long hair, who had recently won a reputation as a writer and whose demeanour and appearance reminded George, though he could not tell why, of some fanatical Jewish teacher from the provinces; there was nothing in him which could fascinate Else particularly or even make a pleasurable appeal.

This impression was no doubt dispelled by subsequent conversation. George had left the Ehrenbergs' in company with him one evening last spring, and they had fallen into so thrilling a conversation about musical matters that they had gone on chatting till three o'clock in the morning on a seat in the Ringstrasse.

It is strange, thought George, what a lot of things are running through my mind to-day which I had scarcely thought of at all since they happened. And he felt as though he had on this autumn evening emerged out of the grievous dreary obscurity of so many weeks into the light of day at last.

He was now standing in front of the house in the Paulanergasse where the Rosners lived. He looked up to the second story. A window was open, white tulle curtains pinned together in the centre fluttered in the light breeze.

The Rosners were at home. The housemaid showed George in. Anna was sitting opposite the door, she held a coffee-cup in her hand and her eyes were turned towards the newcomer. On her right her father was reading a paper and smoking a pipe. He was clean-shaven except for a pair of narrow grizzled whiskers on his cheeks. His thin hair of a strange greenish-grey hue was parted at the temples in front and looked like a badly-made wig. His eyes were watery and red-lidded.

The stoutish mother, around whose forehead the memory of fairer years seemed as it were to hover, looked straight in front of her; her hands were contemplatively intertwined and rested on the table.

Anna slowly put down her cup, nodded and smiled in silence. The two old people began to get up when George came in.

"Please, don't trouble, please don't," said George.

Then there was a noise from the wall at the side of the room. Josef, the son of the house, got up from the sofa on which he had been lying. "Charmed to see you, Herr Baron," he said in a very deep voice, and adjusted the turned-up collar of his yellow-check rather shabby lounge jacket.

"And how have you been all this time, Herr Baron?" inquired the old man. He remained standing a gaunt and somewhat bowed figure, and refused to resume his seat until George had sat down. Josef pushed a chair between his father and sister, Anna held out her hand to the visitor.

"We haven't seen one another for a long time," she said, and drank some of her coffee.

"You've been going through a sad time," remarked Frau Rosner sympathetically.

"Yes," added Herr Rosner. "We were extremely sorry to read of your great loss — and so far as we knew your father always enjoyed the best of health."

He spoke very slowly all the time, as if he had still something more to say, stroking his head several times with his left hand, and nodded while he listened to the answer.

"Yes, it came very unexpectedly," said George gently, and looked at the faded dark-red carpet at his feet.

"A sudden death then, so to speak," remarked Herr Rosner and there was a general silence.

George took a cigarette out of his case and offered one to Josef.

"Much obliged," said Josef as he took the cigarette and bowed while he clicked his heels together without any apparent reason; while he was giving the Baron a light he thought the latter was looking at him, and said apologetically, with an even deeper voice than usual, "Office jacket."

"Office jacket straight from the office," said Anna simply without looking at her brother.

"The lady fancies she has the ironic gift," answered Josef merrily, but his manifest restraint indicated that under other conditions he would have expressed himself less agreeably.

"Sympathy was universally felt," old Rosner began again. "I read an obituary in the Neuen Freie Presse on your good father by Herr Hoffrat Kerner, if I remember rightly; it was highly laudatory. Science too has suffered a sad loss."

George nodded in embarrassment, and looked at his hands.

Anna began to speak about her past summer-outing. “It was awfully pretty in Weissenfeld,” she said. “The forest was just behind our house with good level roads, wasn’t it, papa? One could walk there for hours and hours without meeting a soul.”

“And did you have a piano out there?” asked George.

“Oh yes.”

“An awful affair,” observed Herr Rosner, “a thing fit to wake up the stones and drive men mad.”

“It wasn’t so bad,” said Anna.

“Good enough for the little Graubinger girl,” added Frau Rosner.

“The little Graubinger girl, you see, is the daughter of the local shopkeeper,” explained Anna: “and I taught her the elements of pianoforte, a pretty little girl with long blonde pig-tails.”

“Just a favour to the shopkeeper,” said Frau Rosner.

“Quite so, but I should like to remind you,” supplemented Anna, “that apart from that I gave real lessons, I mean paid-for ones.”

“What, also in Weissenfeld?” asked George.

“Children on a holiday. Anyway, it’s a pity, Herr Baron, that you never paid us a visit in the country. I am sure you would have liked it.”

George then remembered for the first time that he had promised Anna that he would try to pay her a visit some time in the summer on a cycling tour.

“I am sure the Baron would not have found a place like that really to his liking,” began Herr Rosner.

“Why not?” asked George.

“They don’t cater there for the requirements of a spoilt Viennese.”

“Oh, I’m not spoilt,” said George.

“Weren’t you at Auhof either?” Anna turned to George.

“Oh no,” he answered quickly. “No, I wasn’t there,” he added less sharply. “I was invited though.... Frau Ehrenberg was so kind as to... I had various invitations for the summer. But I preferred to stay in Vienna by myself.”

“I am really sorry,” said Anna, “not to see anything more of Else. You know of course that we went to the same boarding-school. Of course it’s a long time ago. I really liked her. A pity that one gets so out of touch as time goes on.”

“How is that?” asked George.

“Well, I suppose the reason is that I’m not particularly keen on the whole set.”

“Nor am I,” said Josef, who was blowing rings into the air.... “I haven’t been there for years. Putting it quite frankly... I’ve no idea, Baron, of your views on this question... I’m not very gone on Israelites.”

Herr Rosner looked up at his son. “My dear Josef, the Baron visits the house and it will strike him as rather strange....”

“I?” said George courteously. “I’m not at all on intimate terms with the Ehrenberg family, however much I enjoy talking to the two ladies.” And then he added interrogatively, “But didn’t you give singing lessons to Else last year, Fräulein Anna?”

“Yes. Or rather... I just accompanied her....”

“I suppose you’ll do so again this year?”

“I don’t know. She hasn’t shown any signs of life, so far.”

“Perhaps she’s giving it all up.”

“You think so? It would be almost better if she did,” replied Anna softly, “for as a matter of fact, it was more like squeaking than singing. But anyway,” and she threw George a look which, as it were, welcomed him afresh, “the songs you sent me are very nice. Shall I sing them to you?”

“You’ve had a look at the things already? That is nice of you.”

Anna had got up. She put both her hands on her temples and stroked her wavy hair gently, as though making it tidy. It was done fairly high, so that her figure seemed even taller than it actually was. A narrow golden watch-chain was twined twice round her bare neck, fell down over her bosom, and vanished in her grey leather belt. With an almost imperceptible nod of her head she asked George to accompany her.

He got up and said, “If you don’t mind....”

“Not at all, not at all, of course not,” said Herr Rosner. “Very kind of you, Baron, to do a little music with my daughter. Very nice, very nice.”

Anna had stepped into the next room. George followed her and left the door open. The white tulle curtains were pinned together in front of the open window and fluttered slightly. George sat down at the cottage-piano and struck a few chords. Meanwhile, Anna knelt down in front of an old black partly gilded whatnot, and got out the music. George modulated the first chords of his song. Anna joined in and sang to George’s song the Goethean words,

Deinem Blick mich zu bequemen,
Deinem Munde, deiner Brust,
Deine Stimme zu vernehmen,
War mir erst’ und letzte Lust.

She stood behind him and looked over his shoulder at the music. At times she bent a little forward, and he then felt the breath of her lips upon his temples. Her voice was much more beautiful than he remembered its having ever been before.

They were speaking rather too loudly in the next room. Without stopping singing Anna shut the door. It had been Josef who had been unable to control his voice any longer.

“I’ll just pop in to the café for a jiffy,” he said.

There was no answer. Herr Rosner drummed gently on the table and his wife nodded with apparent indifference.

“Goodbye then.” Josef turned round again at the door and said fairly resolutely: “Oh, mamma, if you’ve got a minute to spare by any chance — —”

“I’m listening,” said Frau Rosner. “It’s not a secret, I suppose.”

“No. It’s only that I’ve got a running account with you already.”

“Is it necessary to go to the café?” asked old Rosner simply, without looking up.

“It’s not a question of the café. The fact is... you can take it from me that I’d prefer myself not to have to borrow from you. But what is a man to do?”

“A man should work,” said old Rosner gently, painfully, and his eyes reddened. His wife threw a sad and reproachful look at her son.

“Well,” said Josef, unbuttoning his office coat, and then buttoning it up again— “that really is... for every single gulden-note — —”

“Pst,” said Frau Rosner with a glance towards the door, which was ajar, and through which, now that Anna had finished her song, came the muffled sound of George’s piano-playing.

Josef answered his mother's glance with a deprecatory wave of his hand. "Papa says I ought to work. As though I hadn't already proved that I can work." He saw two pairs of questioning eyes turned towards him. "Yes of course I proved it, and if it had only depended on me I'd have managed to get along all right. But I haven't got the temperament to put up with things, I'm not the kind to let myself be bullied by any chief if I happen to come in a quarter of an hour late — or anything like that."

"We know all about that," interrupted Herr Rosner wearily. "But after all, as we're already on the subject, you really must start looking round for something."

"Look round... good..." answered Josef. "But no one will persuade me to go into any business run by a Jew. It would make me the laughing-stock of all my acquaintances... of my whole set in fact."

"Your set..." said Frau Rosner. "What is your set? Café cronies?"

"Well if you don't mind, now that we are on the subject," said Josef— "it's connected with that gulden-note, too. I've got an appointment at the café now with young Jalaudek. I'd have preferred to have told you when the thing had gone quite through... but I see now that I'd better show my hand straight away. Well, Jalaudek is the son of Councillor Jalaudek the celebrated paper-merchant. And old Jalaudek is well-known as a very influential personage in the party... very intimate with the publisher of the Christliche Volksbote: his name is Zelltinkel. And they're looking out on the Volksbote for young men with good manners — Christians of course, for the advertisement business. And so I've got an appointment to-day with Jalaudek at the café, because he promised me his governor would recommend me to Zelltinkel. That would be ripping... it would get me out of my mess. Then it wouldn't be long before I was earning a hundred or a hundred and fifty gulders a month."

"O dear!" sighed old Rosner.

The bell rang outside.

Rosner looked up.

"That must be young Doctor Stauber," said Frau Rosner and cast an anxious glance at the door, through which the sound of George's piano-playing came in even softer tones than before.

"Well, mamma, what's the matter?" said Josef.

Frau Rosner took out her purse and with a sigh gave her son a silver gulden.

"Much obliged," said Josef and turned to go.

"Josef," cried Herr Rosner, "it's really rather rude — at the very minute when we have a visitor — —"

"Oh thank you, but I mustn't have all the treats."

There was a knock, Doctor Berthold Stauber came in.

"I apologise profusely, Herr Doctor," said Josef, "I'm just going out."

"Not at all," replied Doctor Stauber coldly, and Josef vanished.

Frau Rosner invited the young doctor to sit down. He took a seat on the ottoman and turned towards the quarter from which the piano-playing could be heard.

"Baron Wergenthin, the composer. Anna has just been singing," explained Frau Rosner, somewhat embarrassed. And she started to call her daughter in.

Doctor Berthold gripped her arm lightly but firmly, and said amiably: "No, please don't disturb Fräulein Anna, please don't. I'm not in the least hurry. Besides, this is a farewell visit." The latter words seemed jerked out of his throat; but Berthold nevertheless smiled courteously, leant back comfortably in his corner and stroked his short beard with his right hand.

Frau Rosner looked at him as if she were positively shocked.

"A farewell visit?" Herr Rosner asked. "Has the party allowed you to take a holiday, Herr Stauber?

Parliament has only been assembled a short time, as one sees in the papers."

"I have resigned my seat," said Berthold.

"What?" exclaimed Herr Rosner.

"Yes, resigned," repeated Berthold, and smiled nervously.

The piano-playing had suddenly stopped, the door which had been ajar was now opened. George and Anna appeared.

"Oh, Doctor Berthold," said Anna, and held out her hand to the doctor, who had immediately got up. "Have you been here long? Perhaps you heard me singing?"

"No, Fräulein, I'm sorry I was too late for that. I only caught a few notes on the piano."

"Baron Wergenthin," said Anna, as though she were introducing. "But of course you know each other?"

"Oh yes," answered George, and held out his hand to Berthold.

"The Doctor has come to pay us a farewell visit," said Frau Rosner.

"What?" exclaimed Anna in astonishment.

"I'm going on a journey, you see," said Berthold, and looked Anna in the face with a serious, impenetrable expression. "I'm giving up my political career... or rather," he added jestingly, "I'm interrupting it for a while."

George leant on the window with his arms crossed over his breast and looked sideways at Anna. She had sat down and was looking quietly at Berthold, who was standing up with his hand resting on the back of the sofa, as though he were going to make a speech.

"And where are you going?" asked Anna.

"Paris. I'm going to work in the Pasteur Institute. I'm going back to my old love, bacteriology. It's a cleaner life than politics."

It had grown darker. The faces became vague, only Berthold's forehead, which was directly opposite the window, was still bathed in light. His brows were twitching. He really has his peculiar kind of beauty, thought George, who was leaning motionless in the window-niche and felt himself bathed in a pleasant sense of peace.

The housemaid brought in the burning lamp and hung it over the table.

"But the papers," said Herr Rosner, "have no announcement at all so far of your resigning your seat, Doctor Stauber."

"That would be premature," answered Berthold. "My colleagues and the party know my intention all right, but the thing isn't official yet."

"The news is bound to create a great sensation in the circles affected by it," said Herr Rosner—"particularly after the lively debate the other day in which you showed such spirit and determination. I suppose you've read about it, Baron?" He turned to George.

"I must confess," answered George, "that I don't follow the parliamentary reports as regularly as I really ought to."

"Ought to," repeated Berthold meditatively. "There's no question of 'ought' about it really, although the session has not been uninteresting during the last few days — at any rate as a proof of how low a level a public body can sink to."

"The debate was very heated," said Herr Rosner.

"Heated?... Well, yes, what we call heated here in Austria. People were inwardly indifferent and outwardly offensive."

"What was it all about then?" inquired George.

“It was the debate arising out of the questions on the Golowski case.... Therese Golowski.”

“Therese Golowski...” repeated George. “I seem to know the name.”

“Of course you know it,” said Anna. “You know Therese herself. She was just leaving the house when you called the last time.”

“Oh yes,” said George, “one of your friends.”

“I wouldn’t go so far as to call her a friend; that seems to imply a certain mental sympathy that doesn’t quite exist.”

“You certainly don’t mean to repudiate Therese,” said Doctor Berthold smiling, but dryly.

“Oh no,” answered Anna quickly. “I really never thought of doing that. I even admire her; as a matter of fact I admire all people who are able to risk so much for something that doesn’t really concern them at all. And when a young girl does that, a pretty young girl like Therese” — she was addressing herself to George who was listening attentively— “I am all the more impressed. You know of course that Therese is one of the leaders of the Social Democratic Party?”

“And do you know what I took her for?” said George. “For a budding actress.”

“You’re quite a judge of character, Herr Baron,” said Berthold.

“She really did mean to go on the stage once,” corroborated Frau Rosner coldly.

“But just consider, Frau Rosner,” said Berthold. “What young girl is there with any imagination, especially if she lives in cramped surroundings into the bargain, who has not at some time or other in her life at any rate coquetted with such an idea.”

“Your forgiving her is good,” said Anna, smiling.

It struck Berthold too late that this remark of his had probably touched a still sensitive spot in Anna’s mind. But he continued with all the greater deliberation. “I assure you, Fräulein Anna, it would be a great pity if Therese were to go on the stage, for there’s no getting away from the fact that she can still do her party a tremendous lot of good if she isn’t torn away from her career.”

“Do you regard that as possible?” asked Anna.

“Certainly,” replied Berthold. “Therese is between two dangers, she will either talk her head off one fine day....”

“Or?” inquired George, who had grown inquisitive.

“Or she’ll marry a Baron,” finished Berthold curtly.

“I don’t quite understand,” said George deprecatingly.

“I only said ‘Baron’ for a joke, of course. Substitute Prince for Baron and I make my meaning clearer.”

“I see... I can now get some idea of what you mean, Doctor.... But how did Parliament come to bother about her?”

“Well, it’s like this, last year — at the time of the great coal-strike — Therese Golowski made a speech in some Bohemian hole, which contained an expression which was alleged to be offensive to a member of the Imperial family. She was prosecuted and acquitted. One might perhaps draw the conclusion from this that there was no particular substance in the prosecution. Anyway the State Prosecutor gave notice of appeal, there was an order for a new trial, and Therese was sentenced to two months’ imprisonment, which she is now serving, and as if that wasn’t enough the Judge who had discharged her in the Court of first instance was transferred... to somewhere on the Russian frontier, from where no one ever comes back. Well, we put a question over this business, which in my view was extremely tame. The Minister answered somewhat disingenuously amid the cheers of the so-called Constitutional parties. I ventured to reply in possibly somewhat more drastic terms than members are accustomed to use, and as the benches on the other side had no facts with which to answer me they tried to overwhelm me by shouts and abuse. And of course you can imagine what the strongest argument was, which a certain type of Conservatives used against my points."

"Well?" queried George.

"Hold your jaw, Jew," answered Berthold with tightly compressed lips.

"Oh," said George with embarrassment, and shook his head.

"Be quiet, Jew! Hold your jaw! Jew! Jew! Shut up!" continued Berthold, who seemed somewhat to revel in the recollection.

Anna looked straight in front of her. George thought that this was quite enough. There was a short, painful silence.

"So that was why?" inquired Anna slowly.

"What do you mean?" asked Berthold.

"That's why you're resigning your seat."

Berthold shook his head and smiled. "No, not because of that."

"You are, of course, above such coarse insults, Doctor," said Herr Rosner.

"I won't go quite so far as that," answered Berthold, "but one always has to be prepared for things like that all the same. I'm resigning my seat for a different reason."

"May one ask what it is?" queried George.

Berthold looked at him with an air which was penetrating and yet distrait. He then answered courteously: "Of course you may. I went into the buffet after my speech. I met there, among others, one of the silliest and cheekiest of our democratic popular representatives, who, as he usually does, had made more row than any one else while I was speaking... Jalaudek the paper-merchant. Of course I didn't pay any attention to him. He was just putting down his empty glass. When he saw me he smiled, nodded and hailed me as cheerily as though nothing had taken place at all. 'Hallo, Doctor, won't you have a drink with me?'"

"Incredible!" exclaimed George.

"Incredible?... No, Austrian. Our indignation is as little genuine as our enthusiasm. The only things genuine with us are our malice and our hate of talent."

"Well, and what did you answer the man?" asked Anna.

"What did I answer? Nothing, of course."

"And you resigned your seat," added Anna with gentle raillery.

Berthold smiled. But at the same time his eye-brows twitched, as was his habit when he was painfully or disagreeably affected. It was too late to tell her that as a matter of fact he had come to ask her for her advice, as he used to do in the old days. And at any rate he felt sure of this, he had done wisely in cutting off all retreat as soon as he entered the room by announcing the resignation of his seat as an already accomplished fact, and his journey to Paris as directly imminent. For he now knew for certain that Anna had again escaped him, perhaps for a long time. He did not believe for a minute that any man was capable of winning her really and permanently, and it never entered his head for a minute to be jealous of that elegant young artist who was standing so quietly by the window with his crossed arms. It had happened many times before that Anna had fluttered away for a time, as though fascinated by the magic of an element which was strange to her. Why only two years ago, when she was thinking seriously of going on the stage, and had already begun to learn her parts, he had given her up for a short time as completely lost. Subsequently when she had been compelled to relinquish her artistic projects, owing to the unreliability of her voice, she seemed as if she wanted to come back to him again. But he had deliberately refused to exploit the opportunities of that period. For he wanted before he made her his wife to have won some triumph, either in science or in politics, and to have obtained her genuine admiration. He had been well on the way to it. In the very seat where she was now sitting as she looked him straight in the face with those clear but alas! cold eyes, she had looked at the proofs of his latest medico-philosophical work which bore the title Preliminary Observations on the Physiognomical Diagnosis of Diseases. And then, when he finally left science for politics, at the time when he made speeches at election meetings and equipped himself for his new career by serious studies in history and political economy, she had sincerely rejoiced in his energy and his versatility.

All this was now over. She had grown to eye more and more severely those faults of his of which he was quite aware himself, and particularly his tendency to be swept away by the intoxication of his own words, with the result that he came to lose more and more of his self-confidence in his attitude towards her. He was never quite himself when he spoke to her, or in her presence. He was not satisfied with himself to-day either. He was conscious, with an irritation which struck even himself as petty, that he had not given sufficient force to his encounter with Jalaudek in the buffet, and that he ought to have made his detestation of politics ring far more plausibly.

"You are probably quite right, Fräulein Anna," he said, "if you smile at my resigning my seat on account of that silly incident. A parliamentary life without its share of comedy is an absolute impossibility. I should have realised it, played up to it and taken every opportunity of drinking with the fellow who had publicly insulted me. It would have been convenient, Austrian — and possibly even the most correct course to have taken." He felt himself in full swing again and continued with animation. "What it comes to in the end is that there are two methods of doing anything worth doing in politics. The one is a magnificent flippancy which looks on the whole of public life as an amusing game, has no true enthusiasm for anything, and no true indignation against anything, and which regards the people whose misery or happiness are ultimately at stake with consummate indifference. I have not progressed so far, and I don't know that I should ever have succeeded in doing so. Quite frankly, I have often wished I could have. The other method is this: to be ready every single minute to sacrifice one's whole existence, one's life, in the truest sense of the word, for what one believes to be right — —"

Berthold suddenly stopped. His father, old Doctor Stauber, had come in and been heartily welcomed. He shook hands with George, who had been introduced to him by Frau Rosner, and looked at him so kindly that George felt himself immediately drawn towards him. He looked younger than he was. His long reddish-yellow beard was only streaked by a few grey hairs, and his smoothly combed long hair fell in thick locks on to his broad neck. The strikingly high forehead gave a kind of majesty to the somewhat thick-set figure with its high shoulders. When his eyes were not making a special point of looking kind or shrewd they seemed to be resting behind the tired lids as though to gather the energy for the next look.

"I knew your mother, Herr Baron," he said to George rather gently.

"My mother, Herr Doctor...?"

"You will scarcely remember it, you were only a little boy of three or four at the time."

"You attended her?" asked George.

"I visited her sometimes as deputy for Professor Duchegg, whose assistant I was. You used to live then in the Habsburgergasse, in an old house that has been pulled down long ago. I could describe to you even to-day the furniture of the room in which I was received by your father... whose premature death I deeply regret.... There was a bronze figure on the secretary, a knight in armour to be sure with a flag, and a copy of a Vandyck from the Liechtenstein gallery hung on the wall."

"Yes, quite right," said George, amazed at the doctor's good memory.

"But I have interrupted your conversation," continued Doctor Stauber in that droning slightly melancholy and yet superior tone which was peculiar to him, and sat down in the corner of the sofa.

"Doctor Berthold has just been telling us, to our great astonishment," said Herr Rosner, "that he has decided to resign his seat."

Old Stauber directed a quiet look towards his son, which the latter answered with equal quietness. George, who had watched this play of the eyes, had the impression that there prevailed between these two a tacit understanding which did not need any words.

"Yes," said Doctor Stauber. "I wasn't at all surprised. I've always felt as though Berthold were never really quite at home in Parliament, and I am really glad that he has now begun to pine as it were to go back to his real calling. Yes, yes, your real calling, Berthold," he repeated, as though to answer his son's furrowed brow. "You have not prejudiced your future by it, in the least. Nothing makes life so difficult as our frequent belief in consistency... and our wasting our time in being ashamed of a mistake, instead of owning up to it and simply starting life again on a fresh basis."

Berthold explained that he meant to leave in eight days at the outside. There would be no point in postponing his journey beyond that time, it would be possible too that he might not remain in Paris. His studies might necessitate travelling further afield. Further, he had decided not to make any farewell visits. He had, he added by way of explanation, completely given up all association with certain bourgeois sets, among whom his father had an extensive practice.

"Didn't we meet each other once this winter at Ehrenbergs'?" asked George with a certain amount of satisfaction.

"That's right," answered Berthold. "We are distantly related to the Ehrenbergs you know. The Golowski family is curiously enough the connecting link between us. It would be no good, Herr Baron, if I were to make any attempt to explain it to you in greater detail. I should have to take you on a journey through the registry offices and congregations of Temesvar Tarnopol and similar pleasant localities — and that you mightn't quite fancy."

"Anyway," added old Doctor Stauber in a resigned tone, "the Baron is bound to know that all Jews are related to one another."

George smiled amiably. As a matter of fact it rather jarred on his nerves. There was no necessity at all, in his view, for Doctor Stauber as well officially to communicate to him his membership of the Jewish community. He already knew it and bore him no grudge for it. He bore him no grudge at all for it; but why do they always begin to talk about it themselves? Wherever he went, he only met Jews who were ashamed of being Jews, or the type who were proud of it and were frightened of people thinking they were ashamed of it.

"I had a chat with old Frau Golowski yesterday," continued Doctor Stauber.

"Poor woman," said Herr Rosner.

"How is she?" asked Anna.

"How is she... you can imagine... her daughter in prison, her son a conscript — he is living in the barracks at the expense of the State... just imagine Leo Golowski as a patriot... and the old man sits in the café and watches the other people playing chess. He himself can't even run nowadays to the ten kreuzers for the chess money."

"Therese's imprisonment must soon be over anyway," said Berthold.

"It still lasts another twelve, fourteen days," replied his father.... "Come, Annerl" — he turned towards the young girl— "it would be really nice of you if you were to show yourself once more in Rembrandtstrasse; the old lady has taken an almost pathetic fancy to you. I really can't understand why," he added with a smile, while he looked at Anna almost tenderly.

She looked straight in front of her and made no answer.

The clock on the wall struck seven. George got up as though he had simply been waiting for the signal.

"Going so soon, Herr Baron?" said Herr Rosner, getting up.

George requested the company not to disturb themselves, and shook hands all round.

"It is strange," said old Stauber, "how your voice reminds one of your poor father."

"Yes, many people have said so," replied George. "I, personally, can't see any trace of it."

"There isn't a man in the world who knows his own voice," remarked old Stauber, and it sounded like the beginning of a popular lecture.

But George took his leave. Anna accompanied him, in spite of his slight remonstrance, into the hall and left the door half open — almost on purpose, so it struck George. "It's a pity we couldn't go on with our music any longer," she said.

"I'm sorry too, Fräulein Anna."

"I liked the song to-day even better than the first time, when I had to accompany myself, only it falls off a bit at the end.... I don't know how to express myself."

"Oh, I know what you mean, the end is conventional. I felt so too. I hope soon to be able to bring you something better than that, Fräulein Anna."

"But don't keep me waiting for it too long."

"I certainly won't. Goodbye, Fräulein Anna." They shook hands with each other and both smiled.

"Why didn't you come to Weissenfeld?" asked Anna lightly.

"I am really sorry, but just consider, Fräulein Anna, I could scarcely get in the mood for society of any kind this year, you can quite appreciate that."

Anna looked at him seriously. "Don't you think," she said, "that perhaps one might have been some help to you in bearing it?"

"There's a draught, Anna," called out Frau Rosner from inside.

"I'm coming in a minute," answered Anna with a touch of impatience. But Frau Rosner had already shut the door.

"When can I come back?" asked George.

"Whenever you like. At any rate... I really ought to give you a written time-table, so that you may know when I'm at home, but that wouldn't be much good either. I often go for walks or go shopping in town or go to picture galleries or exhibitions — —"

"We might do that together one day," said George.

"Oh, yes," answered Anna, took her purse out of her pocket and then took out a tiny note-book.

"What have you got there?" asked George.

Anna smiled and turned over the leaves of a little book. "Just wait.... I meant to go and see the Exhibition of Miniatures in the Royal Library at eleven on Thursday. If you too are interested in miniatures, we might meet there."

"Delighted, I'm sure."

"Right you are then, we can then arrange the next time for you to accompany my singing."

"Done," said George and shook hands with her. It struck him that while Anna was chatting with him here outside, young Doctor Stauber would doubtless be getting irritated or offended inside, and he was surprised that he should be more disturbed by this circumstance than Anna, who struck him as on the whole a perfectly good-natured person. He freed his hand from hers, said good-bye and went.

It was quite dark when George got into the streets. He strolled slowly over the Elizabeth Bridge to the Opera, past the centre of the town and undisturbed by the hubbub and traffic around him, listened mentally to the tune of his song. He thought it strange that Anna's voice which had so pure and sound a tone in a small room, should have no future whatsoever before it on the stage and concert platform, and even stranger that Anna scarcely seemed to mind this tragic fact. But of course he was not quite clear in his mind whether Anna's calmness really reflected her true character.

He had known her more or less casually for some years, but an evening in the previous spring had been the first occasion when they had become rather more intimate. A large party had been got up on that occasion in the Waldsteingarten. They took their meal in the open air under the high chestnut-trees, and they all experienced the pleasure, excitement and fascination of the first warm May evening of the year. George conjured up in his mind all the people who had come: Frau Ehrenberg, the organiser of the party, dressed in an intentionally matronly style, in a dark loose-fitting foulard dress; Hofrat Wilt, wearing as it were the mask of an English statesman with all the sloppy aristocracy of his nonchalant demeanour, and his chronic and somewhat cheap superior manner towards everything and everybody; Frau Oberberger who looked like a rococo marquise with her grey powdered hair, her flashing eyes and her beauty spot on her chin; Demeter Stanzides with his white gleaming teeth and that pale forehead that showed all the weariness of an old race of heroes; Oskar Ehrenberg dressed with a smartness that smacked a great deal of the head clerk in a dressmaking establishment, a great deal of a young music-hall comedian and something, too, of a young society man; Sissy Wyner who kept switching her dark laughing eyes from one man to another, as though she had a merry secret understanding with every single member of the party; Willy Eissler who related in his hoarse jovial voice all kinds of jolly anecdotes of his soldier days and Jewish stories as well; Else Ehrenberg in a white English cloth dress with all the delicate melancholy of the spring flowing around her, while her grande dame movements combined with her baby-face and delicate figure to invest her with an almost pathetic grace; Felician, cold and courteous, with haughty eyes which gazed between the members of the party to the other tables, and from the other tables beyond into the distance; Sissy's mother, young, red-cheeked and a positive chatter-box, who wanted to talk about everything at the same time and to listen to everything at the same time; Edmund Nürnberger with his piercing eyes and his thin mouth curving into that smile of contempt (which had almost become a chronic mask) for that whirligig of life, which he thoroughly saw through, though to his own amazement he frequently discovered that he was playing in the game himself; and then finally Heinrich Bermann in a summer suit that was too loose, with a straw hat that was too cheap and a tie that was too light, who one moment spoke louder than the others and at the next moment was more noticeably silent.

Last of all Anna Rosner had appeared, self-possessed and without any escort, greeted the party with a slight nod and composedly sat down between Frau Ehrenberg and George. "I have asked her for you," said Frau Ehrenberg softly to George, who prior to this evening had scarcely given Anna a single thought. These words, which perhaps only originated in a stray idea of Frau Ehrenberg's, became true in the course of the evening. From the moment when the party got up and started on their merry expedition through the Volksprater George and Anna had remained together everywhere, in the side-shows and also on the journey home to town, which for the fun of the thing was done on foot, and surrounded though they were by all that buzz of jollity and foolishness they had finished by starting a perfectly rational conversation. A few days later he called and brought her as he had promised the piano score of "Eugen Onegin" and some of his songs; on his next visit she sang these songs over to him as well as many of Schubert's, and he was very pleased with her voice. Shortly afterwards they said goodbye to each other for the summer without a single trace of sentimentalism or tenderness. George had regarded Anna's invitation to Weissenfeld as a mere piece of politeness, just in the same way as he had thought his promise to come had been understood; and the atmosphere of to-day's visit when compared with the innocence of their previous acquaintance was bound to strike George as extremely strange.

At the Stephansplatz George saw that he was being saluted by some one standing on the platform of a horse-omnibus. George, who was somewhat short-sighted, did not immediately recognise the man who was saluting him.

"It's me," said the gentleman on the platform.

"Oh, Herr Bermann, good evening." George shook hands with him. "Which way are you going?"

"I'm going into the Prater. I'm going to dine down there. Have you anything special on, Baron?"

"Nothing at all."

"Well, come along with me then."

George swung himself on to the omnibus, which had just begun to move on. They told each other cursorily how they had spent the summer. Heinrich had been in the Salzkammergut and subsequently in Germany, from which he had only come back a few days ago.

"Oh, in Berlin?" hazarded George.

"No."

"I thought perhaps in connection with a new piece — —"

"I haven't written a new piece," interrupted Heinrich somewhat rudely. "I was in the Taunus and on the Rhine in several places."

"What's he got to do on the Rhine?" thought George, although the topic did not interest him any further. It struck him that Bermann was looking in front of him in a manner that was not only absent-minded but really almost melancholy.

"And how's your work getting on, my dear Baron?" asked Heinrich with sudden animation, while he drew closer round him the dark grey overcoat which hung over his shoulders.[A special way of wearing a coat affected in Viennese artistic circles.] "Have you finished your quintette?"

"My quintette?" repeated George in astonishment. "Have I spoken to you about my quintette, then?"

"No, not you, but Fräulein Else told me that you were working at a quintette."

"I see, Fräulein Else. No, I haven't got much further with it. I didn't feel quite in the mood, as you can imagine."

"Quite," said Heinrich, and was silent for a while. "And your father was still so young," he added slowly.

George nodded in silence.

"How is your brother?" asked Heinrich suddenly.

"Quite well, thanks," answered George somewhat coldly.

Heinrich threw his cigarette over the rail and immediately proceeded to light another. Then he said: "You must be surprised at my inquiring after your brother when I have scarcely ever spoken to him. But he interests me. He represents in my view a type which is absolutely perfect of its kind, and I regard him as one of the happiest men going."

"That may well be," answered George hesitatingly. "But how do you come to think so seeing that you scarcely know him?"

"In the first place his name is Felician Freiherr von Wergenthin-Recco," said Heinrich very seriously, and blew the smoke into the air.

George looked at him with some astonishment.

"Of course your name is Wergenthin-Recco, too," continued Heinrich, "but only George — and that's not the same by a long way, is it? Besides, your brother is very handsome. Of course you haven't got at all a bad appearance. But people whose real point is that they're handsome have really a much better time of it than others whose real point is that they're clever. If you are handsome you are handsome for always, while clever people, or at any rate nine-tenths of them, spend their life without showing a single trace of talent. Yes, that's certainly the case. The line of life is clearer so to speak when one is handsome than when one is a genius. Of course all this could be expressed far better."

George was disagreeably affected. What's the matter with him? he thought. Can he perhaps be jealous of Felician... on account of Else Ehrenberg?

They got out at the Praterstern. The great stream of the Sunday crowd was flowing towards them. They went towards the Hauptallee, where there was no longer any crush, and strolled slowly on. It had grown cool. George made remarks about the autumnal atmosphere of the evening, the people sitting in the restaurants, the military bands playing in the kiosks.

At first Heinrich answered offhandedly, and subsequently not at all, and finally seemed scarcely to be paying any attention. George thought this rude. He was almost sorry that he had joined Heinrich, all the more so as he made it an almost invariable practice not to respond straight away to casual invitations. The excuse he gave to himself was that it was simply out of absent-mindedness that he had done it on this occasion. Heinrich was walking close to him or even going a few steps in front, as if he were completely oblivious of George's presence. He still held tightly in both hands the overcoat which was swung round him, wore his dark grey felt hat pressed down over his forehead and looked extremely uncouth. His appearance suddenly began to jar keenly on George's nerves. Heinrich Bermann's previous remarks about Felician now struck him as in bad taste, and as quite devoid of tact, and it occurred to him at the psychological moment that practically all he knew of Heinrich's literary productions had gone against the grain. He had seen two pieces of his: one where the scene was laid in the lower strata of society, among artizans or factory workers, and which finished up with murder and fatal blows; the other a kind of satirical society comedy whose first production had occasioned a scandal and which had soon been taken out of the repertoire of the theatre. Anyway George did not then know the author personally, and had taken no further interest in the whole thing. He only remembered that Felician had thought the piece absolutely ridiculous, and that Count Schönstein had expressed the opinion that if he had anything to do with it pieces written by Jews should only be allowed to be performed by the Buda-Pesth Orpheum Company.[A company celebrated for its risqué plays] But Doctor von Breitner in particular, a baptised Jew with a philosophical mind, had given vent to his indignation that such an adventurer of a young man should have dared to have put a world on to the stage that was obviously closed to him, and which it was consequently impossible for him to know anything about.

While George was remembering all this his irritation at the rude conduct and stubborn silence of his companion rose to a genuine sense of enmity, and quite unconsciously he began to think that all the insults which had been previously directed against Bermann had been in fact justified. He now remembered too that Heinrich had been personally antipathetic to him from the beginning, and that he had indulged in some ironic remark to Frau Ehrenberg about her cleverness in having lost no time in adding that young celebrity to the tame lions in her drawing-room. Else, of course, had immediately taken Heinrich's part, and explained that he was an interesting man, was in many respects positively charming, and had prophesied to George that sooner or later he would become good friends with him. And as a matter of fact George had preserved, as the result of that nocturnal conversation on the seat in the Ringstrasse in the spring of this year, a certain sympathy for Bermann which had survived down to the present evening.

They had passed the last inns some time ago. The white high road ran by their side out into the night on a straight and lonely track between the trees, and the very distant music only reached them in more or less broken snatches.

"But where are you going to?" Heinrich exclaimed suddenly, as though he had been dragged there against his will, and stood still.

"I really can't help it," remarked George simply.

"Excuse me," said Heinrich.

"You were so deep in thought," retorted George coolly.

"I wouldn't quite like to say 'deep.' But it often happens that one loses oneself in one's thoughts like this."

"I know," said George, somewhat reconciled.

"They were expecting you in August at Auhof," said Heinrich suddenly.

"Expected? Frau Ehrenberg was certainly kind enough to invite me, but I never accepted. Did you stay there a fairly long time, Herr Bermann?"

"A fairly long time? No. I was up there a few times, but only for an hour or so."

"I thought you stayed there."

"Not a bit of it. I stayed down at the hotel. I only occasionally went up to Auhof. There was too much noise and bustle there for me.... The house was positively packed with visitors. And I can't stand most of the people who go there."

An open fiacre in which a gentleman and lady were sitting passed by.

"Why, that was Oskar Ehrenberg," said Heinrich.

"And the lady?" queried George, looking towards something bright that gleamed through the darkness.

"Don't know her."

They turned their steps through a dark side-avenue. The conversation stuck again. Finally Heinrich began: "Fräulein Else sang a few of your songs to me at Auhof. I'd heard some of them already too, sung by the Bellini, I think."

"Yes, Bellini sang them last winter at a concert."

"Well, Fräulein Else sang those songs and some others of yours as well."

"Who accompanied her, then?"

"I myself, as well as I could. I must tell you, my dear Baron, that as a matter of fact those songs impressed me even more than when I heard them the first time at the concert, in spite of the fact that Fräulein Else has considerably less voice and technique than Fräulein Bellini. Of course one must take into consideration on the other hand that it was a magnificent summer afternoon when Fräulein Else sang your songs. The window was open, there was a view of the mountains and the deep-blue sky opposite... but anyway, you came in for a more than sufficient share of the credit."

"Very flattering," said George, who felt pained by Heinrich's sarcastic tone.

"You know," continued Heinrich, speaking as he frequently did with clenched teeth and unnecessary emphasis, "you know it is not generally my habit to invite people whom I happen to see in the street to join me in an omnibus, and I prefer to tell you at once that I regarded it as — what does one say? — a sign of fate when I suddenly caught sight of you on the Stephansplatz."

George listened to him in amazement.

"You perhaps don't remember as well as I do," continued Heinrich, "our last conversation on that seat in the Ringstrasse."

George now remembered for the first time that Heinrich had then made a quite casual allusion to the libretto of an opera on which he was busy, and that he had offered himself as the composer of the music with equal casualness and more as a joke than anything else. He answered with deliberate coldness: “Oh yes, I remember.”

“Well, that binds you to nothing,” answered Heinrich, even more coldly than the other. “All the less so since, to tell you the truth, I’ve not given my opera libretto a single thought till that beautiful summer afternoon when Fräulein Else sang your song. Anyway, what do you say to our stopping here?”

The restaurant garden which they entered was fairly empty. Heinrich and George sat down in a little arbour next to the green wooden railing and ordered their dinner.

Heinrich leant back, stretched out his legs, looked with probing almost cynical eyes at George, who maintained an obstinate silence, and said suddenly: “I don’t think I am making a mistake if I venture to presume that you’ve not been exactly keen on the things I have done so far.”

“Oh,” answered George, blushing a little, “what makes you think that?”

“Well, I know my pieces... and I know you.”

“Me!” queried George, feeling almost insulted.

“Certainly,” replied Heinrich in a superior manner. “Besides, I have the same feeling with regard to most men, and I regard this faculty as the only indisputable one I’ve really got. All my others, I think, are fairly problematical. My so-called art in particular is more or less mediocre, and a good deal too could be said against my character. The only thing which gives me a certain amount of confidence is simply the consciousness of being able to see right into people’s souls... right deep down, every one, rogues and honest people, men, women and children, heathens, Jews and Protestants, yes, even Catholics, aristocrats and Germans, although I have heard that that is supposed to be infinitely difficult, not to say impossible, for people like myself.”

George gave a slight start. He knew that Heinrich had been subjected to the most violent personal attacks by the clerical and conservative press, particularly with reference to his last piece. “But what’s that got to do with me?” thought George. There was another one of them who had been insulted! It was really absolutely impossible to associate with these people on a neutral footing. He said politely, though coldly, with a semi-conscious recollection of old Herr Rosner’s retort to young Dr. Stauber: “I really thought that people like you were above attacks of the kind to which you’re obviously alluding.”

“Really... you thought that?” queried Heinrich, in that cold almost repulsive manner which was peculiar to him on many occasions. “Well,” he went on more gently, “that is the case sometimes. But unfortunately not always. It doesn’t need much to wake up that self-contempt which is always lying dormant within us; and once that takes place there isn’t a single rogue or a single scoundrel with whom we don’t join forces, and quite sincerely too, in attacking our own selves. Excuse me if I say ‘we.’”

“Oh, I’ve frequently felt something of the same kind myself. Of course I have not yet had the opportunity of being exposed to the public as often as you and in the same way.”

“Well, supposing you did... you would never have to go through quite what I did.”

“Why not?” queried George, slightly hurt.

Heinrich looked him sharply in the face. “You are the Baron von Wergenthin-Recco.”

“So that’s your reason! But you must remember that there are a whole lot of people going about to-day who are prejudiced against one for that very reason — and manage to cast in one’s teeth the fact of one’s being a baron whenever they get a chance.”

“Yes, yes, but I think you will agree with me that being ragged for being a baron is a very different matter than being ragged for being a ‘Jew,’ although the latter — you’ll forgive me of course — may at times denote the better aristocracy. Well, you needn’t look at me so pitifully,” he added with abrupt rudeness. “I am not always so sensitive. I have other moods in which nothing can affect me in any way nor any person either. Then I feel simply this — what do you all know — what do you know about me....” He stopped, proudly, with a scornful look that seemed to pierce through the foliage of the arbour into the darkness. He then turned his head, looked round and said simply to George in quite a new tone: “Just look, we shall soon be the only ones left.”

“It is getting quite cold, too,” said George.

“I think we might still stroll a bit through the Prater.”

They got up and went. A fine grey cloud hung over a meadow which they passed.

“The fraud of summer doesn’t last after nightfall. It’ll soon all be over,” said Heinrich in a tone of unmitigated melancholy, while he added, as though to console himself: “Well, one will be able to work.”

They came into the Wurstelprater. The sound of music rang out from the restaurants, and some of the exuberant gaiety communicated itself to George. He felt suddenly swung out of the dismalness of an inn garden at autumn time and a somewhat painful conversation into a new world. A tout, in front of a merry-go-round, from which a gigantic hurdy-gurdy sent into the open air the pot-pourri cut of the “Troubadour” with all the effect of some fantastic organ, invited people to take a journey to London, Atzgersdorf and Australia. George remembered again the excursion in the spring with the Ehrenberg party. It was on this narrow seat inside the room that Frau Oberberger had sat with Demeter Stanzides, the lion of the evening, by her side, and had probably told him one of her incredible stories: that her mother had been the mistress of a Russian Grand Prince; that she herself had spent a night with an admirer in the Hallstadt cemetery, of course without anything happening; or that her husband, the celebrated traveller, had made conquests of seventeen women in one week in one harem at Smyrna. It was in this carriage upholstered in red velvet, with Hofrat Wilt as her vis-à-vis, that Else had lounged with lady-like grace, just as though she were in a carriage on Derby Day, while she yet managed to show by her manner and demeanour that, if it came to the point, she herself could be quite as childish as other persons of happier and less complex temperaments. Anna Rosner with the reins nonchalantly in her hand, looking dignified, but with a somewhat sly face, rode a white Arab; Sissy rocked about on a black horse that not only turned round in a circle with the other animals and carriages, but swung up and down as well. The boldest eyes imaginable flashed and laughed beneath the audacious coiffure with its gigantic black feather hat, while her white skirt fluttered and flew over her low-cut patent leather shoes and open-work stockings. Sissy’s appearance had produced so strange an effect on a couple of strangers that they called out to her a quite unambiguous invitation. There had then ensued a short mysterious interview between Willy, who immediately came on the spot, and the two somewhat embarrassed gentlemen, who first tried to save their faces by lighting fresh cigarettes with deliberate nonchalance and then suddenly vanished in the crowd.

Even the side-show with its “Illusions” and “Illuminated Pictures” had special memories for George. It was here, while Daphne was turning into a tree, that Sissy had whispered into his ear a gentle “remember” and thus called to his memory that masked ball at Ehrenberg’s at which she had lifted up her lace veil for a fleeting kiss, though presumably he had not been the only one. Then there was the hut where the whole party had had themselves photographed: the three young girls, Anna, Else and Sissy in the pose of classical goddesses and the men at their feet with ecstatic eyes, so that the whole thing looked like the climax of a transformation scene. And while George was thinking of these little episodes there floated up through his memory the way in which he and Anna had said goodbye to-day, and it seemed full of the most pleasant promise.

A striking number of people stood in front of an open shooting gallery. Now the drummer was hit in the heart and beat quick strokes upon his drum, now the glass ball which was dancing to and fro upon a jet of water broke with a slight click, now a vivandière hastily put her trumpet to her mouth and blew a menacing blast, now a little railway thundered out of a door which had sprung open, whizzed over a flying bridge and was swallowed up by another door.

When the crowd began to thin, George and Heinrich made their way to the front and recognised that the good shots were Oskar Ehrenberg and his lady friend. Oskar was just aiming his gun at an eagle which was moving up and down near the ceiling with outstretched wings, and missed for the first time. He laid his weapon down in indignation, gazed round him, saw the two gentlemen behind him and saluted them.

The young lady with her cheek resting on her gun threw a fleeting glance at the new arrivals, then aimed again with great keenness, and pressed the trigger. The eagle drooped its hit wings and did not move any more.

"Bravo," shouted Oskar.

The lady laid the weapon before her on the table. "That's my little lot," she said to the boy who wanted to load again. "I've won."

"How many shots were there?" asked Oskar.

"Forty," answered the boy, "that's eighty kreuzers." Oskar put his hand into his waistcoat pocket, threw a silver gulden down and received with condescension the thanks of the loading boy. "Allow me," he then said, while he placed both his hands on his hips, moved the top of his body slightly in front and put his left foot forward, "Allow me, Amy, to introduce the gentlemen who witnessed your triumph, Baron Wergenthin, Herr von Bermann... Fräulein Amelie Reiter."

The gentlemen lifted their hats, Amelie returned the greeting by nodding a few times with her head. She wore a simple foulard dress designed in white, and over it a light cloak of bright yellow bordered with lace and a black but extremely lively hat.

"I know Herr von Bermann already," she said. She turned towards him. "I saw you at the first night of your play last winter, when you came on the stage to bow your acknowledgments. I enjoyed myself very much. Don't think I am saying this as a mere compliment."

Heinrich thanked her sincerely.

They walked on further between side-shows which were growing quieter and quieter, past inn gardens which were gradually becoming empty.

Oskar thrust his right arm through his companion's left and then turned to George. "Why didn't you come to Auhof this year? We were all very sorry."

"Unfortunately I didn't feel much in the mood for society."

"Of course, I can quite understand," said Oskar with all proper seriousness. "I was only there myself for a few weeks. In August I strengthened my tired limbs in the waves of the North Sea; I was in the Isle of Wight, you know."

"That must be very nice," said George. "Who is it that always goes there?"

"You're thinking of the Wyners," replied Oskar. "When they used to live in London they went there regularly, but now they only go there every two or three years."

"But they've kept the Y for Austrian consumption as well," said George with a smile.

Oskar was serious. "Old Herr Wyner," he answered, "honestly earned his right to the Y. He went to England in his thirteenth year, became naturalised there and was made a partner when quite a young man in the great steel manufacturing concern which is still called Black & Wyner."

“At any rate he got his wife from Vienna.”

“Yes, and when he died seven or eight years ago she came over here with her two children, but James will never get acclimatised here.... Lord Antinous, you know, that’s what Frau Oberberger calls him. He is now back at Cambridge again where strangely enough he is studying Greek scholarship. Demeter was a few days in Ventnor, too.”

“Stanzides?” added George.

“Do you know Herr von Stanzides, Herr Baron?” asked Amy.

“Oh yes.”

“Then he does really exist?” she exclaimed.

“Yes, but just you listen,” said Oskar. “She put a lot of money on him this spring at Freudenau, and won a lot of money, and now she inquires if he really exists.”

“What makes you have doubts about Stanzides’ existence, Fräulein?” asked George.

“Well, you know, whenever I don’t know where he is — Oskar, I mean — it’s always a case of ‘I’ve an appointment with Stanzides’ or ‘I’m riding with Stanzides in the Prater.’ Stanzides this and Stanzides that, why it sounds more like an excuse than a name.”

“You be quiet now, will you?” said Oskar gently.

“Not only does Stanzides exist,” explained George, “but he has the most beautiful black moustache and the most fiery black eyes that are to be found anywhere.”

“That’s quite possible, but when I saw him he looked more like a jack-in-the-box, yellow jacket, green cap, violet sleeves.”

“And she won forty gulden on him,” added Oskar facetiously.

“And where are the forty gulden?” sighed Fräulein Amelie.... Then she suddenly stood still and exclaimed: “But I’ve never yet been on it.”

“Well, that can be remedied,” said Oskar simply.

The Great Wheel was turning slowly and majestically in front of them with its lighted carriages. The young people passed the turnstile, climbed into an empty compartment and swept upwards.

“Do you know, George, whom I got to know this summer?” said Oskar. “The Prince of Guastalla.”

“Which one?” asked George.

“The youngest, of course, Karl Friedrich. He was there incognito. He’s very thick with Stanzides, an extraordinary man. You take my word for it,” he added softly, “if people like us said one hundredth part of the things the prince says, we’d never get out of prison our whole life long.”

“Look, Oskar,” cried Amy, “at the tables and the people down there. It looks just like a little box, doesn’t it? And that mass of lights over there, far off. I’m sure that’s going to Prague, don’t you think so, Herr Bermann?”

“Possibly,” answered Heinrich, knitting his forehead as he stared through the glass wall out into the night.

When they left the compartment and got out into the open air the Sunday hubbub was subsiding.

“Poor little girl,” said Oskar Ehrenberg to George, while Amy went on in front with Heinrich, “she has no idea that this is the last time we are going out together in the Prater.”

“But why the last time?” asked George, not feeling particularly interested.

“It’s got to be,” replied Oskar. “Things like this oughtn’t to last longer than a year at the outside. Any way, you might buy your gloves from her after December,” he added brightly, though with a certain touch of melancholy. “I am setting her up, you know, in a little business. I more or less owe her that, for I took her away from a fairly safe situation.”

"A safe one?"

"Yes, she was engaged, to a case-maker. Did you know that there were such people?"

In the meanwhile Amy and Heinrich were standing in front of a narrow moving staircase that went boldly up to a platform and waited for the others. All agreed that they ought not to leave the Prater before going for a ride on the switchback.

They whizzed through the darkness down and up again in the groaning coach under the black tree-tops; and George managed to discover a grotesque motif in 3/4 time in the heavy rhythmic noise.

While he was going down the moving staircase with the others, he knew that the melody should be introduced by an oboe and clarionet and accompanied by a cello and contra bass. It was clearly a scherzo probably for a symphony.

"If I were a capitalist," expounded Heinrich with emphasis, "I would have a switchback built four miles long to go over fields and hills, through forests and dancing-halls; I would also see that there were surprises on the way." Anyway, he thought that the time had come to develop more elaborately the fantastic element in the Wurstelprater. He himself, he informed them, had a rough idea for a merry-go-round that by means of some marvellous machinery was to revolve spiral-fashion above the ground, winding higher and higher till eventually it reached the top of a kind of tower.

Unfortunately he lacked the necessary technical knowledge to explain it in greater detail. As they went on he invented burlesque figures and groups for the shooting galleries, and finally declared that there was a pressing need for a magnificent Punch and Judy show for which original authors should write pieces at once profound and frivolous.

In this way they came to the end of the Prater where Oskar's carriage was waiting. Squashed, but none the less good-tempered, they drove to a wine-restaurant in the town. Oskar ordered champagne in a private room, George sat down by the piano and improvised the theme that had occurred to him on the switchback. Amy lounged back in the corner of the sofa, while Oskar kept whispering things into her ears which made her laugh. Heinrich had grown silent again and twirled his glass slowly between his fingers. Suddenly George stopped playing and let his hands lie on the keys. A feeling of the dreamlike and purposeless character of existence came over him, as it frequently did when he had drunk wine. Ages seemed to have passed since he had come down a badly-lighted staircase in the Paulanergasse, and his walk with Heinrich in the dark autumn avenue lay far away in the distant past. On the other hand he suddenly remembered, as vividly as though the whole thing had happened yesterday, a very young and very depraved individual, with whom he had spent many years ago a few weeks of that happy-go-lucky life which Oskar Ehrenberg was now leading with Amy. She had kept him waiting too long one evening in the street, he had gone away impatiently and had neither heard nor seen anything of her again. How easy life was sometimes....

He heard Amy's soft laugh and turned round. His look encountered that of Oskar, who seemed to be trying to catch his eye over Amy's blonde head. He felt irritated by that look and deliberately avoided it and struck a few chords again in a melancholy ballad-style. He felt a desire to describe all that had happened to him to-day, and looked at the clock over the door. It was past one. He caught Heinrich's eye and they both got up. Oskar pointed to Amy, who had gone to sleep on his shoulder, and intimated by a smile and a shrug of his shoulders that under such circumstances he could not think of going for the present. The two others shook hands with him, whispered good-night and slipped away.

"Do you know what I've done?" said Heinrich. "While you were improvising so extraordinarily finely on that ghastly piano I tried to get the real hang of that libretto that I spoke to you about in the spring."

"Oh, the opera libretto! that is interesting. Won't you tell me?"

Heinrich shook his head. “I should like to, but the unfortunate thing is, as you’ve already seen, that it’s really not yet finished — like most of my other so-called plots.”

George looked at him interrogatively. “You had a whole lot of things on hand last spring, when we saw each other last.”

“Yes, I have made a lot of notes, but to-day I’ve done nothing more than sentences... no words, no, just letters on white paper. It’s just as if a dead hand had touched everything. I’m frightened the next time I tackle the thing that it will all fall to pieces like tinder. Yes, I’ve been going through a bad time, and who knows if there’s a better one in store for me?”

George was silent. Then he suddenly remembered the notice in the papers which he had read somewhere or other about Heinrich’s father, the former deputy, Doctor Bermann. He suspected that that might be the reason. “Your father is ill, isn’t he?” he asked.

Heinrich answered without looking at him. “Yes, my father has been in a mental home since June.”

George shook his head sympathetically.

Heinrich continued: “Yes, it’s an awful business, even though I wasn’t on very intimate terms with him during the last months it is indescribably awful, and goes on being so.”

“I can quite understand,” said George, “not making any headway with one’s work under circumstances like that.”

“Yes,” answered Heinrich hesitatingly. “But it’s not that alone. To be quite frank that business plays a comparatively subordinate part in my present mental condition. I don’t want to make myself out better than I am. Better...! Should I be better...!” He gave a short laugh and then went on speaking. “Look here, yesterday I still thought that it was the accumulation of every possible misfortune that depressed me so. But to-day I’ve had an infallible proof that things of no importance at all, positively silly things in fact, affect me more deeply than very real things like my father’s illness. Disgusting, isn’t it?”

George looked in front of him. Why do I still go on walking with him, he thought, and why does he take it quite for granted that I should?

Heinrich went on speaking with clenched teeth and unnecessary vehemence of tone. “I received two letters this afternoon. Two letters, yes... one from my mother, who had visited my father yesterday in the home. This letter contained the news that he is bad — very bad; to come to the point he won’t last much longer” — he gave a deep breath— “and as you can imagine that involves all kinds of troubles, responsibilities for my mother and my sister and for myself. But just think of it, another letter came at the same time as that one; it contained nothing of importance so to speak — a letter from a person with whom I have been intimate for two years — and there was a passage in that letter which struck me as a little suspicious — one isolated passage... otherwise the letter was very affectionate and very nice, like all her other letters... and now, just imagine, the memory of that one suspicious passage, which another man wouldn’t have noticed at all, has been haunting me and torturing me the whole day. I’ve not been thinking about my father in the lunatic asylum, nor about my mother and sister who are in despair, but only about that unimportant passage in that silly letter from a really by no means brilliant female. It eats up all my strength, it makes me incapable of feeling like a son, like a human being... isn’t it ghastly?”

George listened coldly. It struck him as strange that this taciturn melancholy man should suddenly confide in so casual an acquaintance as himself, and he could not help feeling a painful sense of embarrassment when confronted with this unexpected revelation. He did not have the impression either that any particular sympathy for him on Heinrich’s part was the real reason for all these confessions. He rather felt inclined to put it down to a want of tact, a certain natural lack of self-control, something which seemed very well described by the expression “bad breeding,” which he had once heard applied to Heinrich — wasn’t it by Hofrat Wilt? They went as far as the Burg gate. A starless sky lay over the silent town, there was a slight rustle in the trees of the park, they could hear somewhere or other the noise of a rolling carriage as it drove away into the distance.

As Heinrich was silent again, George stood still and said in as kind a tone as he could: “I must now really say good-bye, dear Herr Bermann.”

“Oh,” exclaimed Heinrich, “I now see that you’ve come with me quite a long way — and I’ve been tactless enough to tell you, or rather myself in your presence, a lot of things which can’t interest you in the least.... Forgive me!”

“What is there to forgive?” answered George gently. He felt a little moved by this self-reproach of Heinrich’s and held out his hand.

Heinrich took it, said “Good-bye, my dear Baron,” and rushed off in a hurry, as though he had suddenly decided that any further word would be bound to be importunate.

George looked after him with a mixture of sympathy and repulsion, and suddenly a free and almost happy mood came over him. He felt young, devoid of care and destined for the most brilliant future. He rejoiced at the winter which was coming, there were all kinds of possibilities: work, amusement, sentiment, while he was absolutely indifferent as to who it was from whom these joys might come. He lingered a moment by the Opera-house. If he went home through the Paulanergasse it would not be appreciably out of his way. He smiled at the memory of the serenades of his earlier years. Not far from here lay the street where he had looked up many a night at a window behind whose curtains Marianne had been accustomed to show herself when her husband had gone to sleep. This woman who was always playing with dangers in whose seriousness she herself did not believe had never really been worthy of George.... Another memory more distant than this one was much more gracious. When he was a boy of seventeen in Florence he had walked to and fro many a night before the window of a beautiful girl, the first creature of the other sex who had given her virgin self to him as yet untouched. And he thought of the hour when he had seen his beloved step on the arm of her bridegroom up to the altar, where the priest was to consecrate the marriage, of the look of eternal farewell which she had sent to him from under her white veil....

He had now arrived at his goal. The lamps were still burning at both ends of the short street, so that it was quite dark where he stood opposite the house. The window of Anna’s room was open, and the pinned curtains fluttered lightly in the wind, just as in the afternoon. It was quite dark below. A soft tenderness began to stir in George’s heart. Of all the beings who had ever refrained from hiding their inclination for him he thought Anna the best and the purest. She was also the first who brought the gift of sympathy for his artistic aspirations. She was certainly more genuine than Marianne, whose tears would roll over her cheeks whatever he happened to play on the piano; she was deeper too than Else Ehrenberg, who no doubt only wanted to confirm herself in the proud consciousness of having been the first to recognise his talent. And if any person was positively cut out to counteract his tendency to dilettantism and nonchalance and to keep him working energetically, profitably and with a conscious object that person was Anna. He had thought only last winter of looking out for a post as a conductor or accompanist at some German Opera; at Ehrenbergs’ he had casually spoken of his intentions, which had not been taken very seriously. Frau Ehrenberg, woman of the world that she was, had given him the motherly advice rather to undertake a tour through the United States as a composer and conductor, whereupon Else had cut in, “And an American heiress shouldn’t be sniffed at either.” As he remembered this conversation he was very pleased with the idea of knocking about the world a bit, he wished to get to know foreign towns and foreign men, to win love and fame somewhere out in the wide world, and finally came to the conclusion that his life was slipping away from him on the whole in far too quiet and monotonous a fashion.

He had long ago left the Paulanergasse, without having taken mentally any farewell of Anna, and was soon home.

As he stepped into the dining-room he saw a light shining from Felician's room.

"Good evening, Felician," he cried out.

The door was opened and Felician came out still fully dressed.

The brothers shook hands with each other.

"Only just got home?" said Felician. "I thought you had been asleep quite a long time." As he spoke he looked past him, as his manner was, and nodded his head towards the right. "What have you been doing, then?"

"I've been in the Prater," answered George.

"Alone?"

"No, I met people. Oskar Ehrenberg with his girl and Bermann the author. We shot and went on the switchback. It was quite jolly.... What have you got in your hand?" he said, interrupting his narrative. "Have you been out for a walk like that?" he added jestingly.

Felician let the sword which he held in his right hand shine in the light of the lamp. "I've just taken it down from the wall, I begin to-morrow again in earnest. The tournament is in the middle of November, and I want to try what I can do this year against Forestier."

"By Jove!" cried George.

"A piece of cheek, you think, what? But it's still a long time before the middle of November. And the strange thing is I've got the feeling as though I had learnt something fresh in the very six weeks of this summer when I didn't have the thing in my hand at all. It's as though my arm had got new ideas in the meanwhile. I can't explain it properly."

"I follow what you mean."

Felician held the sword stretched out in front of him and looked at it affectionately. He then said: "Ralph inquired after you, so did Guido... a pity you weren't there."

"You spent the whole day with them?"

"Oh no, I remained at home after dinner. You must have gone out straight away. I've been studying."

"Studying?"

"Yes, I must really do something serious now. I want to pass my Diplomatic exam, by May at the outside."

"So you've quite made up your mind?"

"Absolutely. There's no point in my remaining on any more in the Stadthalterei. The longer I stay there the clearer it becomes. Anyway, the time won't have been wasted. They don't mind at all if one has spent a year or two in Home Service."

"So you'll probably be leaving Vienna in the autumn."

"Presumably."

"And where will they send you?"

"If one only knew."

George looked in front of him. "So the parting is as near as that?" But why did it affect him so much all of a sudden?... Why, he himself had determined to go away, and had quite recently spoken to his brother about his plans for next year. Was he still as sceptical as ever of his seriousness? If only they could have a good frank brotherly heart-to-heart talk as they had had on that evening after their father's funeral. As a matter of fact, it was only when life revealed its gloomy side to them that they felt absolutely in touch. Otherwise there was always this strange constraint between them both. There was obviously no help for it. They just had to talk more or less discreetly to each other like fairly intimate friends. And as though resigned to the situation George went on with his questions. “What did you do in the evening?”

“I had supper with Guido and an interesting young lady.”

“Really?”

“He’s in silken dalliance again, you know.”

“Who is it, then?”

“Conservatoire, Jewess, violin. But she didn’t bring it with her. Not particularly pretty, but clever. She improves him and he respects her; he wants her to be baptised. A humorous affair I can tell you. You would have had quite a good time.”

George turned his eyes towards the sword which Felician still held in his hand. “Would you like to fence a bit?” he asked.

“Why not?” answered Felician and fetched a second foil out of his room. Meanwhile George had moved the big table in the middle up against the wall.

“I haven’t had a thing in my hand since May,” he said as he took hold of his sword. They took off their coats and crossed blades. George cried touché the next second.

“Come on,” cried George, and thought himself lucky that it was his brother whom he had to face as he stood in an awkward position with the slender flashing weapon in his hand.

Felician hit him as often as he wanted to without himself being touched a single time. He then lowered his sword and said: “You’re too tired to-day, there’s no point in it. But you should come more often to the club. I assure you it’s a pity, with your talent.”

George was pleased by his brotherly praise. He laid his sword down on the table, took a deep breath and went to the wide centre window which was open. “What wonderful air,” he said. A lonely lamp was shining from the park, there was absolute silence.

Felician came up to George, and while the latter leant with both hands on the sill the elder brother remained upright and swept over street, park and town with one of his proud quiet glances. They were both silent for a long time. And they knew they were each thinking of the same thing: a May night of last spring when they had gone home together through the park and their father had greeted them with a silent nod of his head from the very same window by which they were now standing. And both felt a little shocked at the thought that they had enjoyed the whole day with such full gusto, without any painful memories of the beloved man who now lay beneath the ground.

“Well, good-night,” said Felician in a softer tone than usual as he held out his hand to George. He pressed it in silence and each went into his own room.

George arranged the table lamp, took out some music paper and began to write. It was not the scherzo which had occurred to him when he had whizzed through the night with the others under the black tree-tops a few hours ago; and it was not the melancholy folk-ballad of the restaurant either; but a quite new motif that swam up slowly and continuously as though from secret depths. George felt as though he had to allow some mysterious element to take its course. He wrote down the melody, which he thought should be sung by an alto voice or played on the viola, and at the same time a strange accompaniment rang in his ears, which he knew would never vanish from his memory.

It was four o’clock in the morning when he went to bed with the calmness of a man to whom nothing evil can ever come in all his life and for whom neither solitude nor poverty nor death possess any terror.

II

FRAU EHRENBERG SAT with her knitting on the green velvet sofa in the raised bow-window. Opposite her Else was reading a book. The white head of the marble Isis gleamed from out the far dark part of the room behind the piano, while a streak of light from the next room played through the open door over the grey carpet. Else looked up from her book through the window to the high tops of the trees in the Schwarzenberg Park which were waving in the autumn wind and said casually: "We might perhaps ring up George Wergenthin, to know if he's coming this evening."

Frau Ehrenberg let her knitting fall on her lap. "I don't know," she said. "You remember what a really charming condolence letter I wrote him and what a pressing invitation I gave him to come to Auhof. He didn't come and the coldness of his answer was quite marked. I wouldn't ring him up."

"One shouldn't treat him like other people," answered Else. "He belongs to the people whom one has occasionally to remind that one is still alive. When he has been reminded he is extremely glad."

Frau Ehrenberg went on with her knitting. "It really won't come to anything," she said quietly.

"It's not meant to come to anything," retorted Else. "I thought you knew that by this time, mamma. We're good friends, nothing more — and even that only at intervals; or do you really think that I'm in love with him, mamma? Yes, when I was a little girl I was, in Nice, when we played tennis together, but that is long past."

"Well — and Florence?"

"In Florence — I was more in love with Felician."

"And now?" asked Frau Ehrenberg slowly.

"Now... you're probably thinking of Heinrich Bermann... but you're making a mistake, mother."

"I prefer to be making a mistake. But this summer I really quite had the impression that — —"

"I tell you," interrupted Else a little impatiently, "it isn't anything and never was anything. On one solitary occasion, when we went out boating on a sultry afternoon, you saw us from your balcony with your opera-glasses, no doubt — it was only then that it became a little dangerous. And even supposing we had fallen on each other's neck — which as a matter of fact we never did — it wouldn't have meant anything. It was simply a summer flirtation."

"And besides, he's supposed to be involved in a very serious love-affair," said Frau Ehrenberg.

"You mean... with that actress, mamma?"

Frau Ehrenberg looked up. "Did he tell you anything about her?"

"Tell...? Not in so many words, but when we went for walks together in the park or went out in the evening on the lake, why, he practically spoke of nothing but her — of course without mentioning her name... and the better he liked me — men really are such awfully funny people — the more jealous he became about the other woman.... But if it were only that? What young man isn't involved in a serious love affair? Do you think by any chance, mamma, that George Wergenthin is not?"

"In a serious one... no, that will never happen to him. He's too cold, too superior for that... he hasn't got enough temperament."

"That's exactly why," explained Else, airing her knowledge of human nature. "He'll slip into some whirlpool or other and get taken out of his depth without his having noticed it, and some fine day he'll get married... out of sheer indolence... to some person or other who'll probably be absolutely indifferent to him."

“You must have a definite suspicion,” said Frau Ehrenberg.

“I have.”

“Marianne?”

“Marianne! but that’s been over a long time, mamma. And that was never anything particularly serious, either.”

“Well, who is it then?”

“Well whom do you think, mamma?”

“I have no idea.”

“Which Anna?”

“Anna Rosner, of course.”

“But....”

“You can say ‘but’ as much as you like — it’s a fact.”

“Else, you don’t seriously think that Anna with her reserved character could so far forget herself as to — —”

“So far forget herself...? Really, mamma, the number of expressions you keep on using — anyway, I don’t think that’s quite a case of one’s forgetting oneself.”

Frau Ehrenberg smiled, not without a certain pride.

The bell rang outside.

“It might quite as well be Demeter Stanzides,” observed Frau Ehrenberg.

“Stanzides was to bring the Prince along sometime,” said Else casually.

“Do you think that will come off?” inquired Frau Ehrenberg, letting her knitting fall into her lap.

“Why shouldn’t it come off?” said Else. “They are so intimate.”

The door opened. As a matter of fact it was none of the expected visitors who came in, but Edmund Nürnberger. He was dressed, as always, with the greatest care, though not after the latest fashion. His tail coat was a little too short and an emerald pin was stuck in his voluminous satin tie. He bowed as soon as he had got to the door, though his demeanour expressed at the same time a certain irony at his own politeness. “Am I the first?” he inquired. “No one here yet? Not a Hofrat — nor a count — nor an author — nor a diabolical female?”

“Only a woman who never was one, I’m sorry to say,” answered Frau Ehrenberg as she shook hands with him.

“And one... who will perhaps become one sometime.”

“Oh, I am convinced,” said Nürnberger, “that if she only takes it seriously, Fräulein Else will succeed in that.” He stroked his smooth black somewhat glossy hair slowly with his left hand.

Frau Ehrenberg expressed her regret that their expectation of his coming to Auhof had not been realised. Had he really spent the whole summer in Vienna?

“Why do you wonder so much, my dear madam? Whether I am walking up and down among mountain scenery or by the shore of the sea or in my own room, it doesn’t really matter much in the end.”

“But you must have felt quite lonely,” said Frau Ehrenberg.

“You certainly realise solitude more clearly when there’s no one in the neighbourhood who shows any desire of talking to you.... But let’s talk of more interesting and promising men than I am. How are all the numerous friends of your popular family?”

“Friends!” repeated Else. “I should like first to know what you mean by the word?”

“Well, all the people who say something agreeable to you from whatever motive, and whom you believe in when they say it.”

The door of the bedroom opened, Herr Ehrenberg appeared and greeted Nürnberger.

“Are you ready packed?” asked Else.

“Packed and ready,” answered Ehrenberg, who had on a grey suit that was far too loose and was biting a fat cigar between his teeth. He turned to Nürnberger to explain.... “I’m off to-day, just as I am, to Corfu... for the time being; the season is beginning and the Ehrenberg ‘at homes’ make me feel sick.”

“No one asks you,” replied Frau Ehrenberg gently, “to honour them with your presence.”

“Cute answer, eh,” said Ehrenberg, puffing at his cigar. “I don’t mind, of course, staying away from your real ‘at homes.’ But when I’d like to dine quietly at home on a Thursday and there’s an attaché sitting in one corner and a hussar in the other, and some one over there is playing his own compositions and some one else on the sofa is being funny, while by the window Frau Oberberger is fixing up an assignation with any one who happens to come along... well, it really gets on my nerves. One can stand it once, but not a second time.”

“Do you think you’ll remain away all the winter?” asked Nürnberger.

“It’s possible. I intend, you know, to go further, to Egypt, to Syria, probably to Palestine as well. Yes, it’s perhaps only because one’s getting older, perhaps because one reads so much about Zionism and so forth, but I can’t help it, I should like to see Jerusalem before I die.”

Frau Ehrenberg shrugged her shoulders.

“Those are matters,” said Ehrenberg, “which my wife don’t understand — and my children even less so. What do you know about it, Else? no, you don’t know anything either. But when one reads what’s going on in the world it often makes one inclined to think that there’s no other way out for us.”

“For us?” repeated Nürnberger. “I’ve not observed up to the present that Anti-Semitism has done you any particular harm.”

“You mean because I’ve grown a rich man? Well if I were to tell you that I don’t give any shakes for money, you would, of course, not believe me, and quite right too. But as sure as you see me here, I swear to you that I would give half my fortune to see the worst of our enemies on the gallows.”

“I’m only afraid,” remarked Nürnberger, “that you would have the wrong ones hanged.”

“There’s not much danger,” replied Ehrenberg. “Even if you don’t catch the man you’re after, the man you do catch is bound to be one of them, too, right enough.”

“This is not the first time, my dear Herr Ehrenberg, that I observe that your standpoint towards this question is not ideally objective.”

Ehrenberg suddenly bit through his cigar and with fingers shaking with rage put it on the ash-tray. “If any one here’s to tell me... and even... excuse me... or perhaps you’re baptised...? One can really never tell nowadays.”

“I’m not baptised,” replied Nürnberger quietly. “But on the other hand I am certainly not a Jew either. I’ve ceased to belong to the congregation for a long time, for the simple reason that I never felt myself to be a Jew.”

“If some one were to bash in your top hat in the Ringstrasse because, if you will allow me to say so, you have a somewhat Jewish nose, you’d realise pretty quick that you were insulted because you were a Yiddisher fellow. You take my word for it.”

“But, papa, how excited you are getting,” said Else, and stroked him on his bald reddish shiny head.

Old Ehrenberg took her hand, stroked it and asked, apparently without any connection with what he had been saying before: “By-the-bye, shall I have the pleasure of seeing my son and heir before I leave?”

Frau Ehrenberg answered: “Oskar’s bound to be home soon.”

Ehrenberg turned to Nürnberger. “You will doubtless be glad to know that my son Oskar is an Anti-Semite as well.”

Frau Ehrenberg sighed gently. “It’s a fixed idea of his,” she said to Nürnberger. “He sees Anti-Semites everywhere, even in his own family.”

“That is the latest Jewish national disease,” said Nürnberger. “I myself have only succeeded up to the present in making the acquaintance of one genuine Anti-Semite. I’m afraid I am bound to admit, dear Herr Ehrenberg, that it was a well-known Zionist leader.”

Ehrenberg could only make an eloquent gesture.

Demeter Stanzides and Willy Eissler came in and immediately spread an atmosphere of vivid brilliancy around them. Demeter wore his uniform lightly and magnificently, as though it were a fancy costume rather than a military dress; Willy stood there in a dinner jacket looking tall and pale and as if he had been keeping late hours, and then immediately gathered up the reins of the conversation, while his pleasantly hoarse voice rasped through the air with amiable imperiousness.

He gave an account of the preparations for an aristocratic theatrical performance in which he was adviser, producer and actor, just as he had been last year, and described a meeting of the young lords, where, if his account was to be believed, every one had behaved as though they were in a lunatic asylum, and then went on to treat them to a humorous dialogue between two countesses whose mannerisms he managed to take off in a most delightful way. Ehrenberg was always very amused by Willy Eissler. The vague feeling that this Hungarian Jew managed somehow or other to outwit and make a fool of that whole feudal set, whom personally he hated so much, filled him with respect for the young man.

Else sat at the little table in the corner with Demeter and made him tell her about the Isle of Wight. “You were there with your friend?” she inquired, “weren’t you, Prince Karl Friedrich?”

“My friend the Prince?... that’s not quite right, Fräulein Else. The Prince has no friends, nor have I. We’re neither of us the type to have friends.”

“He must be an interesting man according to all one hears.”

“Interesting — I don’t know about that. At any rate he’s thought over a lot of things which people in his position are not usually accustomed to bother their heads about very much. Perhaps he’d have managed to do all kinds of things too, if he’d been left to himself. Well, who knows, it was perhaps better for him that they kept a tight hold on him, for him and for the country too in the long run. One man alone can do nothing — never in this life. That’s why it’s best to let matters slide and get out of things, as he did.”

Else looked at him somewhat coldly. “You’re so philosophical to-day, what is it? It seems to me that Willy Eissler has spoilt you.”

“Willy spoilt me?”

“Yes, you know you shouldn’t associate with such clever people.”

“Why not?”

“You should simply be young, shine, live, and then when there’s nothing more to do, do whatever you like... but without bothering about yourself and the world.”

“You should have told me that before, Fräulein Else; once a man’s started getting clever....”

Else shook her head. “But perhaps in your case it might have been avoided,” she said quite seriously. And then they both had to laugh.

The chandelier was lighted up. George Wergenthin and Heinrich Bermann had come in. Invited by a smile

George sat down by Else's side.

"I knew that you would come," she said disingenuously but warmly as she pressed his hand; she was more glad than she thought she would have been that he should sit opposite to her after so long an interval, that she could see again his proud gracious face and hear again his somewhat gentle yet warm voice.

Frau Wyner appeared, a little woman with a high colour, jolly and awkward. Her daughter Sissy was with her. The groups got broken up in the "general post" of mutual greetings.

"Well, have you composed that song for me yet?" Sissy asked George with laughing eyes and laughing lips, as she played with one of her gloves and moved about like a snake in her dark-green shimmering dress.

"A song?" asked George. He really didn't remember.

"Or waltz or something. But you promised me to dedicate something to me." While she spoke her looks were wandering round. They glowed into the eyes of Willy, passed caressingly by Demeter and addressed a sphinx-like question to Heinrich Bermann. It seemed as though will-o'-the-wisps were dancing through the drawing-room.

Frau Wyner suddenly came up to her daughter. She flushed deeply. "Sissy is really so silly.... What are you thinking of, Sissy? Baron George has had more important things to do this year than to compose things for you."

"Oh not at all," said George politely.

"You buried your father, that's no trifle."

George looked straight in front of him.

But Frau Wyner went on speaking quite unperturbed. "And your father wasn't old, was he? And such a handsome man.... Is it true that he was a chemist?"

"No," answered George calmly. "He was President of the Botanical Society." Heinrich with one arm on the shut piano-top was speaking to Else.

"So you've been in Germany?" she asked.

"Yes," replied Heinrich. "I've been back a fairly long time, four or five weeks."

"And when are you going back again?"

"I don't know, perhaps never."

"Come, you don't believe that yourself — what are you working at?" she added quickly.

"All kinds of things," he answered. "I'm going through a rather restless time. I sketch out a lot but I finish nothing. I'm very rarely keen on completing things, obviously I lose all my interest in things too quickly."

"And people too," added Else.

"Possibly. Only unhappily one's emotions remain attached to people after one's reason has long ago decided to have nothing more to do with them. A poet — if you will allow me to use the expression — must go away from every one who no longer presents any riddle to him... particularly from any one whom he loves."

"They say," suggested Else, "that it is just those whom we know least that we love."

"That's what Nürnberger makes out, but it's not quite right. If it were really so, my dear Else, then life would probably be much more beautiful than it is. No, we know those whom we love much better than we do other people — but we know them with a feeling of shame, bitterness and with the fear that others may know them as well as we do. Love means this — being afraid that the faults which we have discovered in the person we love may be revealed to others. Love means this — being able to look into the future and curse this very gift.... Love means this — knowing some one so that it smashes one."

Else leant on the piano in her childish lady-like way and listened to him curiously. How much she liked him in moments like this! She would have liked to have stroked his hair again consolingly, as she had done before on the lake when he had been torn by his love for that other woman, but when he suddenly retired into his shell, coldly and drily, and looked as though all his fire had been extinguished she felt that she could never live with him, and she would be bound to run away after a few weeks... with a Spanish officer or a violin virtuoso. "It is a good thing," she said somewhat condescendingly, "that you see something of George Wergenthin. He'll have a sound influence on you. He is quieter than you are. I don't think that he is so gifted as you are, and I am sure that he is not so clever."

"What do you know about his gifts?" interrupted Heinrich almost rudely.

George came up and asked Else if they couldn't have the pleasure to-night of hearing one of her songs. She didn't want to. Besides she was principally studying opera parts nowadays. That interested her more. As a matter of fact she was far from having a lyrical temperament. George asked her jokingly if she didn't have perhaps the secret intention of going on the stage?

"With my little bit of a voice!" said Else.

Nürnberger was standing near them. "That wouldn't be an obstacle," he observed. "Why, I feel quite positive that a modern critic would soon turn up who would boom you as an important singer for the very reason that you have no voice, but who would discover some other gift in you by way of compensation, as, for instance, your gift for characterisation, just as we have to-day certain painters who have no sense of colour but only intellect; and celebrated authors who never have the vaguest ideas but who succeed in discovering the most unsuitable epithets for every noun they use."

Else noticed that Nürnberger's manner of speaking got on George's nerves. She turned to him. "I should like to show you something," she said, and took a few steps towards the music-case.

George followed her.

"Here is a collection of old Italian folksongs. I should like you to show me the best. I myself don't know enough about it."

"I can't understand," said George gently, "how you can stand any one like that man Nürnberger near you. He spreads around him an absolute atmosphere of distrust and malice."

"As I've often told you, George, you're no judge of character. After all, what do you know about him? He's different from what you think he is; just ask your friend Heinrich Bermann."

"Oh, I know well enough that he raves about him, too," replied George.

"You're speaking about Nürnberger?" asked Frau Ehrenberg, who had just joined them.

"George can't stand him," said Else in her casual way.

"Well, you're doing him a great injustice, if that's the case. Have you ever read anything of his?"

George shook his head.

"Not even his novel which made so great a sensation fifteen or sixteen years ago? That is really a shame. We've just lent it to Hofrat Wilt. I tell you he was quite flabbergasted at the way in which the whole of present-day Austria is anticipated in that book, written all that time ago."

"Really, is that so?" said George, without conviction.

"You have no idea," continued Frau Ehrenberg, "of the applause with which Nürnberger was then hailed; one could go so far as to say that all doors sprang open before him."

"Perhaps he found that enough," observed Else, with an air of meditative wisdom.

Heinrich was standing by the piano engaged in conversation with Nürnberger, and was making an effort, as he frequently did, to persuade him to undertake a new work or to bring out an edition of previous writings.

Nürnberger would not agree. He was filled with positive horror at the thought of seeing his name a prey to publicity again, of plunging again into a literary vortex which seemed to him as repulsive as it was fatuous. He had no desire to enter the competition. What was the point? Intriguing cliques that no longer made any attempt at concealment were at work everywhere. Did there remain a single man of sound talent and honest aspirations who did not have to face every minute the prospect of being dragged down into the dirt? Was there a blockhead in the country who could not boast of having been hailed as a genius in some rag or other? Had celebrity in these days anything at all to do with honour, and was being ignored and forgotten worth even a single shrug of regret? And who could know after all what verdicts would pass as the correct ones in the future? Were not the fools really the geniuses and the geniuses really the fools? It would be ridiculous to allow himself to be tempted to stake his peace of mind and even his self-respect on a game where even the greatest possible win held out no promise of any satisfaction.

"None at all?" queried Heinrich. "I'll grant you as much as you like about fame, wealth, world-wide influence — but for a man, simply because all these things are of dubious advantage, to relinquish something so absolutely indubitable as the moments of inner consciousness of one's own power — —"

"Inner consciousness of power? Why don't you say straight away the happiness of creating?"

"It does exist, Nürnberger."

"It may be so; why, I even think I remember that I felt something like that myself now and then, a very long time ago... only, as you no doubt know, as the years went by I completely lost the faculty of deceiving myself."

"Perhaps you only think so," replied Heinrich. "Who knows if it is not that very faculty of self-deception which you have developed more strongly than any other as the years went by?"

Nürnberger laughed. "Do you know how I feel when I hear you talk like that? just like a fencing-master feels who gets a thrust in the heart from one of his own pupils."

"And not even one of his best," said Heinrich.

Herr Ehrenberg suddenly appeared in the doorway, to the astonishment of his wife, who had presumed that he would be by now on his way to the station. He led a young lady by the hand. She was dressed simply in black, and had her hair done extraordinarily high after a fashion that was now out of date. Her lips were full and red, the eyes in the pale vivid face had a clear hard gaze.

"Come along," said Ehrenberg with some malice in his small eyes, and led the visitor straight up to Else, who was chatting with Stanzides. "I've brought a visitor for you."

Else held out her hand. "But this is nice." She introduced them— "Herr Demeter Stanzides — Fräulein Therese Golowski."

Therese bowed slightly and let her gaze rest on him for a while with a little embarrassment as though she were scrutinising a beautiful beast, then she turned to Else: "If I had known that you had such a lot of visitors."

"Do you know what she looks like?" said Stanzides softly to George. "Like a Russian student, don't you think?"

George nodded. "That's about it. I know her. She is a school-friend of Fräulein Else's, and now she's playing a leading part among the Socialists. Just think of it! she's just been in prison for lèse-majesté, I believe."

"Yes, I think I've read something about it," replied Demeter. "One should really get to know a person of that type more intimately. She's pretty. Her face might be made of ivory."

"And her features show a lot of energy," added George. "Her brother too is an extraordinary fellow, a pianist and a mathematician, and the father's supposed to be a ruined Jewish skin-dealer."

In the meanwhile Frau Ehrenberg had come up to Therese. She considered it correct not to show any surprise. “Sit down, Therese,” she said. “And how have you been getting on all this time? Since you’ve devoted yourself to political life you don’t bother about your old friends any more.”

“Yes, I’m afraid my work gives me very little time to pay private visits,” replied Therese, thrusting out her chin, in a way that made her face look masculine and almost ugly.

Frau Ehrenberg vacillated as to whether she should or should not make any reference to the term of imprisonment which Therese had just served. It was certainly to be borne in mind there was scarcely another house in Vienna where ladies who had been locked up a short time ago, were allowed to call.

“And how is your brother?” asked Else.

“He’s doing his service this year,” answered Therese. “You can imagine pretty well how he’s getting on.” And she looked ironically at Demeter’s hussar uniform.

“I suppose he doesn’t get much opportunity there for playing the piano,” said Frau Ehrenberg.

“Oh, he’s given up all thoughts of being a pianist,” replied Therese. “He’s all for politics now.” And turning with a smile to Demeter she added: “Of course you won’t give him away, Herr Oberlieutenant?”

Stanzides laughed somewhat awkwardly.

“What do you mean by politics?” asked Herr Ehrenberg. “Does he want to get into the Cabinet?”

“Not in Austria at any rate,” replied Therese. “He is a Zionist, you know.”

“What?” exclaimed Ehrenberg, and his visage beamed.

“That’s certainly a subject on which we don’t quite agree,” added Therese.

“My dear Therese...” began Ehrenberg.

“You’ll miss your train, my dear,” interrupted his wife.

“I’m not going to miss my train, and anyway, another one goes to-morrow. My dear Therese, this is the only thing I want to say — each person should find happiness in his own way. But in this case your brother and not you is the cleverer of you two. Excuse me, I’m perhaps a layman in politics, but I assure you, Therese, exactly the same thing will happen to you Jewish Social Democrats as happened to the Jewish Liberals and German Nationalists.”

“How do you mean?” asked Therese haughtily. “In what way will the same thing happen to us?”

“In what way...? I’ll tell you soon enough. Who created the Liberal movement in Austria?... the Jews. By whom have the Jews been betrayed and deserted? By the Liberals. Who created the National-German movement in Austria? the Jews. By whom were the Jews left in the lurch?... what — left in the lurch!... Spat upon like dogs!... By the National-Germans, and precisely the same thing will happen in the case of Socialism and Communism. As soon as you’ve drawn the chestnuts out of the fire they’ll start driving you away from the table. It always has been so and always will be so.”

“We will wait and see,” Therese replied quietly.

George and Demeter looked at each other like two friends marooned together on a desert island.

Oskar, who had come in during the middle of his father’s speech, compressed his lips and was very embarrassed. But they all felt a kind of deliverance when Ehrenberg suddenly looked at his watch and took his leave.

“We certainly shan’t agree to-day,” he said to Therese.

Therese smiled. “Scarcely. Hope you will enjoy your journey and I want once more to... to thank you in the name of....”

“Hush!” said Ehrenberg and vanished.

“What are you thanking papa for?” said Else.

“For a gift of money for which I came to ask him in the most shameless manner. Apart from him there is not a single rich man in the circle of my acquaintances. I am not in a position to speak of the purpose for which it is wanted.”

Frau Ehrenberg came up to Bermann and Nürnberger, who were continuing their conversation over the top of the piano, and said softly: “Of course you know that she” — then she looked at Therese— “has just been released from prison.”

“I read about it,” said Heinrich.

Nürnberger half shut his eyes and cast a glance at the group in the corner where the three girls were talking to Stanzides and Willy Eissler and shook his head.

“What cynicism are you suppressing?” said Frau Ehrenberg.

“I was just thinking how easily it might have come about for Fräulein Else to have languished two months in prison and for Fräulein Therese to have held receptions in a stylish drawing-room as daughter of the house.”

“Easily come about?”

“Herr Ehrenberg has had good luck, Herr Golowski bad luck.... Perhaps that is the only difference.”

“Look here, now, Nürnberger,” said Heinrich, “you’re not going to deny that such a thing as individuality exists in the world.... Else and Therese are rather different characters you know.”

“I think so too,” observed Frau Ehrenberg.

Nürnberger shrugged his shoulders. “They are both young girls, quite gifted, quite pretty... everything else is more or less of an accidental appanage, just as it is with most young women — most people, in fact.”

Heinrich shook his head energetically. “No, no,” he said, “life is really not as simple as all that.”

“That doesn’t make it simpler, my dear Heinrich.”

Frau Ehrenberg turned her eyes towards the door and beamed.

Felician had just come in. With all the sureness of a sleep-walker he walked up to the hostess and kissed her hand. “I have just had the pleasure of meeting Herr Ehrenberg on the steps; he told me he was going off to Corfu. It must be awfully beautiful out there.”

“You know Corfu?”

“Yes, a memory of my childhood.” He greeted Nürnberger and Bermann, and they all talked about the South for which Bermann longed and in which Nürnberger did not believe.

George gave his brother a hand-shake which meant a salutation and a goodbye at the same time. As he unobtrusively disappeared through the open door of the dining-room he looked round again, noticed Marianne sitting in the furthest corner of the drawing-room and looking at him ironically through her lorgnette. This woman had always had the mysterious gift of suddenly being present without one realising where she came from. And then a veiled lady came up to him on the steps. “Don’t be in such a hurry, you can surely wait another moment,” she said. “One really shouldn’t spoil women so.... I wonder if you’d be in such a hurry, you know, if you were going to keep an appointment with me...? But you prefer to be non-committal. Probably because you’re afraid that my husband will shoot you when he comes back from Stockholm. I mean he’s probably got as far as Copenhagen to-day. But he places absolute confidence in me. And he’s quite right too. For I’m able to swear to you that no one has managed to get any further than a kiss on my hand.... No, to tell the full truth, on my neck, here. Of course, you believe, too, that I have had an affair with Stanzides? No, he wouldn’t be at all in my line! I positively loathe handsome men. I couldn’t find anything in your brother Felician either....”

One could form no idea when the veiled lady would leave off speaking, for it was Frau Oberberger. Similar conduct in other women would have betokened a specific overture, but that was not so in her case. In spite of the dubious impression created by her whole manner the world had never been able to fix her so far with a single lover. She lived in a strange, but apparently happy, childless marriage. Her brilliant handsome husband, a geologist by profession, had undertaken scientific expeditions in days gone by, when, so Hofrat Wilt used to assert, he had set more store by the good travelling and facilities and unimpeachable cooking of the districts in question than on their being actually unexplored. But for some years past he had given up travelling in favour of lecturing and ladykilling. When he was at home he lived with his wife in the best camaraderie. George had frequently, though never seriously, considered the possibility of a liaison with Frau Oberberger. He was even one of those who had kissed her neck, a fact which she probably did not remember herself. And as she threw back her veil now George again surrendered himself with pleasure to the fascination of this face, which though no longer in its first flush of youth was yet both charming and animated. He wanted to take up the conversation, but she went on speaking. "Do you know you're very pale? a nice life you must be leading. What kind of a woman is it who is responsible for taking you away from me this time?"

Hofrat Wilt, with his usual silent step, suddenly stood by them. With a casual air of gallantry and superiority he threw them a "Good-day, beauteous lady, Hullo, Baron," and started to go on.

But Frau Oberberger thought it fitting to inform him first that Baron George was just going to one of his usual orgies — she then followed Hofrat up to the second story at the risk, as she remarked, of his being taken for her ninety-fifth lover if he presented himself at Ehrenberg's at the same time as she did.

It was seven o'clock before George could settle himself in a fly and drive to Mariahilf. He felt quite exhausted by the two hours at Ehrenberg's and he was even more than usually glad at the meeting with Anna which was before him. Since that morning at the miniature exhibition they had seen each other nearly every day; in parks, picture-galleries, at her house. They usually talked about the little incidents of their life or gossiped about books or music. They did not often talk of the past, but when they did it was without doubts or misgivings. For so far as Anna was concerned the adventures from which George had just come were far from being surrounded with the uncanny atmosphere of mystery; while George gathered from her own jesting allusions that she herself had already experienced more than one infatuation, though that did not cause him to lose the serenity of his good spirits or even to ask her any further questions.

He had kissed her for the first time eight days ago, in an empty room in the Liechtentein Gallery, and from that moment Anna had employed the familiar 'du,' as though a less intimate appellation would have rung somewhat false. The fly stopped at a street corner. George got out, lit a cigarette and walked up and down opposite the house out of which Anna was due to come.

After a few minutes she came out of the door, he rushed across the street to meet her and kissed her hand ecstatically. Following her habit, for she was in the habit of reading on her journeys, she carried a book with her in a pressed leather cover.

"It is quite cool, Anna," said George, took the book out of her hand and helped her into the jacket which she had been carrying over her arm.

"I was a little bit late you see," she said, "and I was very impatient to see you. Yes," she added with a smile, "one's temperament will break out now and again. What do you think of my new dress?" she added as they walked on.

"It suits you very well."

"They thought at my lesson that I looked like a lady-in-waiting."

"Who thought so?"

“Frau Bittner herself and her two daughters whom I am teaching.”

“I should rather say, like an Arch-Duchess.”

Anna nodded with satisfaction.

“And now tell me, Anna, all that’s happened to you since yesterday.”

She began quite seriously: “Twelve o’clock, after I left you at the door of our house, dinner in the family circle. Rested a little in the afternoon, and thought about you. Pupils from four to six-thirty, then read ‘Grüner Heinrich,’ and the evening paper. Too lazy to go out again, messed about at home. Supper. The usual domestic scene.”

“Your brother?” queried George.

She answered with a “Yes” that ruled out all further questions. “A little music after supper.... Even tried to sing.”

“Were you satisfied?”

“It was quite good enough for me, anyway,” she said, and George thought he detected a slight note of melancholy in her tone. She quickly went on with her report. “Went to bed at half-past ten, slept well, got up early at eight... one can’t lie in bed any longer in our house... dressed till half-past nine, was about the house till eleven....”

“... Messing about,” added George.

“Right. Then went on to Weils, gave the boy a lesson.”

“How old is he?” asked George.

“Thirteen,” replied Anna.

“Well, after all that is not so young.”

“Quite so,” said Anna. “But you can set your mind at rest when I inform you that he loves his Aunt Adele, a sentimental blonde of thirty-three, and is not thinking for the time being of breaking his troth to her.... Well, to continue the record. Got home at one-thirty, had my meal alone, thank Heaven! Father already at the office, mamma in a state of sleep. Rested again from three to four, thought even more about you, and more seriously too, than yesterday, then went shopping in town, gloves, safety pins and something for mamma, and then drove on the tram, reading all the way to Mariahilf, to the two Bittner kiddies.... So now you know all. Satisfied?”

“Except for the boy of thirteen.”

“Well, I agree that that might be a bit upsetting. But now we should like to know if you haven’t got even more sinister confessions to make to me.”

They were in a narrow silent street, which seemed quite strange to George, and Anna took his arm.

“I have just come from Ehrenbergs’,” he began.

“Well?” queried Anna. “Did they try very much to inveigle you?”

“No, I can’t go so far as that. Of course they seemed a little hurt that I did not go to Auhof this summer,” he added.

“Did dear little Else perform?” Anna asked.

“No; of course I don’t know what happened after I left.”

“It won’t be worth the trouble now,” said Anna with exuberant mirth.

“You are wrong, Anna. There are people there for whom it is quite worth while singing.”

“Who?”

“Heinrich Bermann, Willy Eissler, Demeter Stanzides....”

“Oh, Stanzides!” exclaimed Anna. “Now I am really sorry that I wasn’t there too.”

"It seems to me," said George, "that that is a true word spoken in jest."

"Quite so," replied Anna. "I think Demeter is really desperately handsome."

George was silent for a few seconds and suddenly asked, with more emotion than he usually manifested: "Is it he then...?"

"What 'he' do you mean?"

"The one you... loved more than me."

She smiled, nestled closer up to him and answered simply, though a little ironically: "Am I really supposed to have been fonder of any one else than of you?"

"You confessed it to me yourself," replied George.

"But I also confess to you that I should love you in time more than I have loved or ever could love any one else."

"Are you quite sure about that, Anna?"

"Yes, George, I am quite certain of it."

They had now come again into a more lively street and reluctantly let go of each other's arms.

They remained standing in front of various shops. They discovered a photographer's show-case by a house-door and were very much amused by the laboriously-natural poses in which golden and silver wedding couples, cadets, cooks in their Sunday best and ladies in masked fancy dress were taken.

George asked again in a lighter tone: "So it was Stanzides?"

"What an idea! I have never spoken a hundred words to him in my life."

They went on walking.

"Leo Golowski, then?" asked George.

She shook her head and smiled. "That was calf-love," she replied. "That really doesn't count. I should like to know the girl of sixteen who wouldn't have fallen in love in the country with a handsome youth who fights a duel with a real Count and then goes about for eight days with his arm in a sling."

"But he didn't do it on your account, but for his sister's honour, as it were."

"For Therese's honour? What makes you think that?"

"You told me that the young man had spoken to Therese in the forest while she was studying 'Emilia Galotti.'"

"Yes, that is quite true. Anyway, she was quite glad to be spoken to. The only thing Leo objected to was that the young Count belonged to a club of young men who really behaved rather cheekily, and I think showed a touch of Anti-Semitism. So when Therese once went with her brother for a walk by the lake, and the Count came up and spoke to Therese as though he had known her for ages, while he mumbled his name off-handedly, for the benefit of Leo, Leo made a bow and introduced himself like this: 'Leo Golowski, Cracow Jew.' I don't know exactly what happened further; there was an exchange of words and the duel took place next day in the cavalry barracks at Klagenfurt."

"So I am quite right," persisted George humorously. "He did fight for his sister's honour."

"No, I tell you. I was there when he once discussed the matter with Therese, and said to her: 'So far as I am concerned you can do whatever amuses you. You can flirt with any one you like'...."

"Only it's got to be a Jew, I suppose...." added George.

Anna shook her head. "He's really not like that."

"I know," replied George gently. "We have become quite good friends lately, your Leo and I.

"Why, only yesterday evening we met at the café again and he was really quite condescending to me. I think he really forgives me my lineage. Besides, I haven't told you that Therese was at Ehrenbergs', too."

And he described the appearance of the young girl in the Ehrenberg drawing-room and the impression she had made on Demeter.

Anna smiled with pleasure.

Later on, when they were again walking arm-in-arm in a quieter street, George began again. “But I still don’t know who your great passion was.”

Anna was silent and looked straight in front of her.

“Come, Anna, you promised me, didn’t you?”

Without looking at him she replied: “If you only had an idea how strange the whole thing seems to me to-day.”

“Why strange?”

“Because the man you’re trying to find out was quite an old man.”

“Thirty-five,” said George jestingly; “isn’t that so?”

She shook her head seriously. “He was fifty-eight or sixty.”

“And you?” asked George slowly.

“It is two years ago last summer. I was then twenty-one.”

George suddenly stood still. “I know now, it was your singing-master. Wasn’t it?”

Anna did not answer.

“So it was he, then?” said George, without being really surprised, for he was aware that all the celebrated master’s pupils fell in love with him in spite of his grey hairs.

“And did you love him most,” asked George, “of all the men you had come across?”

“Strange, isn’t it? but it’s a fact all the same.”

“Did he know it?”

“I think so.”

They had arrived at an open space with a small garden... that was only scantily lighted. At the back there towered a church with a reddish glow. As though drawn to a quieter place they wandered on under dark softly-waving branches.

“And what actually was there between you, if it is not a rude question?”

Anna was silent, and that moment George felt that everything was possible — even that Anna should have been that man’s mistress. But underneath the disquiet which he felt at that thought the desire arose gently and unconsciously to hear his fear confirmed. For if Anna had already belonged to some one else before she became his, the adventure could proceed as lightly and irresponsibly as possible.

“I will tell you the whole story,” said Anna at last. “It is really not so awful.”

“Well?” asked George, strangely excited.

“Once, after the lesson,” Anna began hesitatingly, “he gallantly helped me into my jacket. And then suddenly he drew me to him, took me in his arms and kissed me.”

“And you...?”

“I... I was quite intoxicated.”

“Intoxicated?...”

“Yes, it was something indescribable. He kissed me on the forehead and the hair, and then he took my hand and murmured all sorts of things that I didn’t hear properly....”

“And....”

“And then... then voices came near, he let go my hand and it was all over.”

“All over?”

“Yes, over... of course it was all over.”

“I certainly don’t think it such a matter of course. You saw him again, no doubt.”

“Of course, I still went on learning with him.”

“And...?”

“I tell you it was over... absolutely... as though it had never happened.”

George was surprised that he should feel reassured. “And he never tried again?” he asked.

“Never. It would have been so ridiculous, and as he was very clever he knew that quite well himself. It is quite true that up to then I had been very much in love with him, but after this episode he was nothing more to me than my old teacher. In some way he seemed even older than he really was. I don’t know if you can really understand what I mean. It was as though he had spent all the remains of his youth in that moment.”

“I quite understand,” said George. He believed her and loved her more than before. They went into the church. It was almost dark within the large building. There were only some dim candles burning in front of a side altar, and opposite, behind the small statue of a saint, there shone a feeble light. A broad stream of incense flowed between the dome and the flagstones. The verger was walking, jangling his keys softly. Motionless figures appeared vaguely on the seats at the back. George slowly walked forward with Anna and felt like a young husband on his honeymoon going sight-seeing in a church with his young wife. He said so to Anna. She only nodded.

“But it would be very much nicer,” whispered George, as they stood nestling close together in front of the chancel, “if we really were together somewhere abroad....”

She looked at him ecstatically and yet interrogatively: and he was frightened at his own words. Supposing Anna had taken it as a serious declaration or as a kind of wooing? Was he not obliged to enlighten her that he had not meant it in that way?... He remembered the conversation which they had had a short time ago, when they had gone out hanging on to one umbrella on a rainy windy day in the direction of Schönbrunn. He had suggested to her she should drive into the town with him and dine with him in a private room in some restaurant; she had answered with that iciness in which her whole being was sometimes frozen: “I don’t do that kind of thing.” He had not pressed her further.

And yet a quarter of an hour later she had said to him, apropos no doubt of a conversation about George’s mode of life, but yet with a smile of many possibilities: “You have no initiative, George.” And he had suddenly felt at that moment as though depths in her soul were revealing themselves, undreamt-of and dangerous depths, which it would be a good thing to beware of. He could not help now thinking of this again. What was passing within her mind?... What did she want and what was she ready for?... And what did he desire, what did he feel himself?

Life was so incalculable. Was it not perfectly possible that he should go travelling about the world with her, live with her a period of happiness and finally part from her just as he had parted from many another?... Yet when he thought of the end that was inevitably bound to come, whether death brought it or life itself, he felt a gentle grief in his heart.... She still remained silent. Did she think again that he was lacking in initiative?... Or did she think perhaps “I am really going to succeed, I shall be his wife?...”

He then felt her hand stroke his very gently, with a kind of new tenderness that did him great good.

“George,” she said.

“What is it?” he asked.

“If I were religious,” she replied, “I should like to pray for something now.”

“What for?” said George, feeling almost nervous.

“For you to do something, George — something that really counted. For you to become a genuine artist, a great artist."

He could not help looking at the floor, as though for very shame that her thoughts had travelled on paths that were so much cleaner than his own.

A beggar held open the thick green curtain. George gave the man a coin; they were in the open air. The street lights shone up, the noise of vehicles and closing shutters suddenly grew near. George felt as if a fine veil which the twilight of the church had woven around him and her had now been torn, and in a tone of relief he suggested a little ride. Anna agreed with alacrity. They got into an open fiacre, had the top pulled down over them, drove through the streets, then drove round the Ring, without seeing much of the buildings and gardens, spoke not a word and nestled closer and closer to each other. They were both conscious of each other's impatience and their own, and they knew it was no longer possible to go back.

When they were near Anna's home George said: "What a pity that you have got to go home now."

She shrugged her shoulders and smiled strangely. The depths, thought George again, but without fear and almost gaily. Before the vehicle stopped at the corner they arranged an appointment for the following morning in the Schwarzenberggarten and then got out. Anna rushed home and George slowly strolled towards the town.

He considered whether he should go into the café. He did not really feel keen on it. Bermann would probably stay to supper at the Ehrenbergs' to-day, one could rarely count on Leo Golowski coming: and George was not much attracted by the other young people, most of them Jewish writers, with whom he had recently struck up a casual acquaintance, even though he had thought many of them not at all uninteresting. Speaking broadly, he found their tone to each other now too familiar, now too formal, now too facetious, now too sentimental: not one of them seemed really free and unembarrassed with the others, scarcely indeed with himself.

Heinrich too had declared only the other day that he didn't want to have anything more to do with the whole set, who had become thoroughly antagonistic to him since his successes. George regarded it as perfectly possible that Heinrich, with his characteristic vanity and hypochondria, was scenting enmity and persecution where it was perhaps merely a case of indifference or antipathy. He for his part knew that it was not so much friendship that attracted him to the young author, as the curiosity to get to know a strange man more intimately. Perhaps also the interest of looking into a world which up to the present had been more or less foreign to him. For while he himself had remained somewhat reserved and had specially avoided any reference to his own relations with women, Heinrich had not only told him of his distant mistress, for whom he asserted he suffered pangs of jealousy, but also of a blonde and pretty young person with whom he had recently got into the habit of spending his evenings — merely to deaden his feelings as he ironically added; he not only told him of his life as a student and journalist in Vienna, which did not lie so far back, but also of his childhood and boyhood in that little provincial town in Bohemia where he had come into the world thirty years ago. The half-affectionate and half-disgusted tone, with its mixture of attachment and detachment, in which Heinrich spoke of his family and especially of his suffering father, who had been an advocate in that little town and a member of Parliament for a considerable period, struck George as strange and at times as almost painful. Why, he seemed to be even a little proud of the fact that when he was only twenty years old he had prophesied his blissfully confident parent's fate to the old man himself, exactly as it had subsequently fulfilled itself. After a short period of popularity and success the growth of the Anti-Semitic movement had driven him out of the German Liberal party, most of his friends had deserted and betrayed him, and a dissipated 'corps' student, who described at public meetings the Tschechs and Jews as the most dangerous enemies of Germanism, propriety and morality, while at home he thrashed his wife and had children by his servants, was his successor in the confidence of the electors and in Parliament. Heinrich, who had always felt a certain amount of irritation at his father's phrases, honest though they were, about Pan-Germanism, liberty and progress, had at first gloated over the spectacle of the old man's downfall. And it was only when the lawyer who had once been so much in demand began to lose his practice into the bargain, and the financial position of the family got worse from day to day, that the son began to experience a somewhat belated sympathy. He had given up his legal studies early enough, and had been compelled to come to the help of his family with his daily journalistic work. His first literary successes raised no echo in the melancholy household. There were sinister signs that madness was looming over his father, while now that the latter was falling into mental darkness his mother, for whom state and fatherland had ceased to exist, when her husband was not elected to Parliament, lost her grip of life and of the world. Heinrich's only sister, once a buxom clever girl, had developed melancholia after an unhappy passion for a kind of provincial Don Juan, and with morbid perverseness she put the blame for the family misfortune on the shoulders of her brother, though she had always got on with him perfectly well in her youth. Heinrich also told George about other relations whom he remembered in his early days, and a half-grotesque, half-pathetic series of strict bigoted old-fashioned Jews and Jewesses swept by George like shadows from another world. He eventually realised that Heinrich did not feel himself any homesickness for that small town with its miserable petty squabbles, or any call to return to the gloomy narrowness of his almost ruined family, and saw that Heinrich's egoism was at once his salvation and his deliverance.

It was striking nine from the tower of the Church of St. Michael when George stood in front of the café. He saw Rapp the critic sitting by a window not completely covered by the curtain, with a pile of papers in front of him on the table. He had just taken his glasses off his nose and was polishing them, and the dull eyes brought a look of absolute deadness into a face that was usually so alive with clever malice. Opposite him with gestures that swept over vacancy sat Gleissner the poet in all the brilliancy of his false elegance, with a colossal black cravat in which a red stone scintillated. When George, without hearing their voices, saw the lips of these two men move, while their glances wandered to and fro, he could scarcely understand how they could stand sitting opposite each other for a quarter of an hour in that cloud of hate. It flashed across him at once that this was the atmosphere in which the life of the whole set played its comedy, and through which there darted many a redeeming flash of wit and self-analysis.

What had he in common with these people? A kind of horror seized on him, he turned away and decided to look up his club once again instead of going into the café, the rooms of which he had not been in for months past. It was only a few steps away. George was soon walking up the broad marble staircase, went into the little dining-room with the light green curtain and was greeted as a long-lost friend by Ralph Skelton, the attaché of the English Embassy, and Doctor von Breitner. They talked about the tournament which was going to take place and about the banquet that was going to be organised in honour of the foreign fencing-masters; they gossiped about the new operetta at the Wiedner Theatre where Fräulein Lovan as a bayadère had come on to the stage almost naked, and about the duel between the manufacturer Heidenfeld and Lieutenant Novotny, in which the injured husband had fallen. George had a game of billiards with Skelton after the meal and won. He felt in better spirits and resolved henceforth to pay more frequent visits to these airy prettily-furnished rooms frequented by pleasant well-bred young men with whom one could converse lightly and pleasantly.

Felician appeared, told his brother that it had been very amusing at the Ehrenbergs' and that Frau Marianne sent her regards. Breitner, with one of his celebrated huge cigars in his mouth, joined the brothers, and began to speak about the hanging of the portraits of some of those members of the club who had conferred services on it, mentioning particularly the one of young Labinski who had ended all by suicide in the previous year. And George could not help thinking of Grace, of that strange hot-and-cold conversation with her in the cemetery in the melting February snow and of that wonderful night on the moonlit deck of the steamer that had brought them both from Palermo to Naples. He scarcely knew which woman he longed for the most at this particular moment: for Marianne whom he had deserted, for Grace who had vanished, or for the fair young creature with whom he had walked about in a dusky church a few hours ago like a honeymoon couple in a foreign town, and who had wanted to pray to heaven for him to become a great artist. The memory stirred a gentler emotion. Was it not almost as though she set more store by his artistic future than by him himself?... No.... Not more. She had only just spoken out what had lain slumbering all the time at the bottom of her soul. It was simply that he forgot as it were only too frequently that he was an artist. But all that must be changed. He had begun and prepared so much. Just a little industry and success was assured. And next year he would go out into the world. He would soon get a post as conductor and with a sudden leap he would find himself launched in a profession that brought both money and prestige. He would get to know new people, a different sky would shine above him and white unknown arms stretched towards him mysteriously as though from distant clouds. And while the young people at his side were weighing very seriously the chances of the champions at the approaching tournament, George went on dreaming in his corner of a future full of work, fame and love.

At the same time Anna was lying in her dark room. She was not asleep and her wide-open eyes were turned towards the ceiling. She had for the first time in her life the infallible feeling that there was a man in the world who could do anything he liked with her. Her mind was firmly made up to take all the happiness or all the sorrow that might lie in front of her, and she had a gentle hope, more beautiful than all her dreams of the past, of a serene and abiding happiness.

III

GEORGE AND HEINRICH dismounted from their cycles. The last villas lay behind them and the broad road with its gradual upward incline led into the forest. The foliage still hung fairly thickly on the trees, but every slight puff of wind brought away some leaves which slowly fluttered down. The shimmer of autumn floated over the yellow-reddish hills. The road ascended higher past an imposing restaurant garden approached by a flight of stone steps. Only a few people sat in the open air, most of them were in the glass verandah, as though they did not quite trust themselves to the faltering warmth of this late October day, through which a dangerous and chilly draught kept on penetrating.

George thought of the melancholy memory of the winter evening on which he and Frau Marianne had paid a visit here, and had had the place to themselves. He had been bored as he had sat by her side and listened impatiently to her prattle about yesterday's concert in which Fräulein Bellini had sung songs; and when he had been obliged to get out of the carriage in a suburban street on his way back on account of Marianne's nervousness, he had taken a deep breath of deliverance. A similar feeling of release, of course, almost invariably came over him whenever he left a mistress, even after some more or less beautiful hours. Even when he had left Anna on her doorstep a few days ago, after the first evening of complete happiness, the first emotion of which he was conscious was the joy of being alone again. And immediately in its train, even before the feeling of gratitude and the dim realisation of a genuine affinity with this gentle creature who enveloped his whole being with such intimate tenderness had managed to penetrate his soul, there fluttered through it a wistful dream of voyages over a shimmering sea, of coasts which approached seductively, of walks along shores which would vanish again on the next day, of blue distances, freedom from responsibility and solitude.

The next morning, when the atmosphere of the previous evening, pregnant as it was with memory and with presage, enveloped him as he woke up, the journey was of course put off to a later but not so distant though of course more convenient time. For George knew at this very hour, though without any touch of horror, that this adventure was predestined to have an end however sincerely and picturesquely it had begun. Anna had given herself to him without indicating by a word, a look or gesture that so far as she was concerned, what was practically a new chapter in her life was now beginning. And in the same way George felt quite convinced that the farewell to her, too, would be devoid of melancholy or of difficulty; a pressure of the hand, a smile and a quiet "it was very beautiful"; and he felt still easier in his mind when she came to him at their next meeting with a simple intimate greeting, quite free from that uneasy tone of nestling sorrow or accomplished fate which he had heard thrilling in the voice of many another woman, who had woken up to such a morning, though not for the first time in her life.

A faintly-defined line of mountains appeared in the distance and then vanished again as the road mounted through thick-wooded country up to the heights. Pine-wood and leaf-bearing wood grew peacefully next to each other, and the foliage of beeches and birch-trees shimmered with its autumn tints through the quieter tints of the firs. Ramblers could be seen, some with knapsack, alpine-stock and nailed shoes, as though equipped for serious mountaineering; now and again cyclists would come whizzing down the road in a feverish rush. Heinrich told his companion of a cycle-tour which he had made along the Rhine at the beginning of September.

"Isn't it strange," said George, "I have knocked about the world a fair bit, but I do not yet know the district where my ancestors' home was."

"Really?" queried Heinrich, "and you feel no emotion when you hear the word Rhine spoken?"

George smiled. "After all it is nearly a hundred years since my great-grandparents left Biebrich."

"Why do you smile, George? It's a much longer time since my ancestors wandered out of Palestine, and yet many otherwise quite rational people insist on my heart throbbing with homesickness for that country."

George shook his head irritably. "Why do you always keep bothering about those people? It will really soon become a positive obsession with you."

"Oh, you think I mean the Anti-Semites? Not a bit of it. I am not touchy any more about them, not usually, at any rate. But you just go and ask our friend Leo what his views are on this question."

"Oh, you mean him, do you? Well, he doesn't take it so literally but more or less symbolically... or from the political standpoint," he added uncertainly.

Heinrich nodded. "Both these ideas are very intimately connected in brains of that character." He sank into meditation for a while, thrust his cycle forward with slight impatient spurts and was soon a few paces in front again. He then began to talk again about his September tour. He thought of it again with what was almost emotion. Solitude, change of scene, movement: had he not enjoyed a threefold happiness? "I can scarcely describe to you," he said, "the feeling of inner freedom which thrilled through me. Do you know those moods in which all one's memories near or distant lose, as it were, their oppressive reality? all the people who have meant anything in one's life, whether it be grief, care or tenderness, seem to sweep by more like shadows, or, to put it more precisely, like forms which one has imagined oneself? And the creations of one's own imagination also come on the scene, of course, and are certainly quite as vivid as the people whom one remembers as having been real; and then one gets the most extraordinary complications between the figures of reality and of one's imagination. I could describe to you a conversation which took place between my great-uncle who is a rabbi and the Duke Heliodorus, the character you know who is the centre of my opera plot — a conversation which was amusing and profound to a degree which, speaking generally, neither life nor any opera libretto scarcely ever reaches.... Yes, such journeys are really wonderful, and so one goes on through towns which one has never seen before, and perhaps will never see again, past absolutely unknown faces which speedily vanish again for all eternity.... Then one whizzes again into the street between the rivers and the vineyards. Such moods really cleanse the soul. A pity that they are so rarely vouchsafed to one."

George always felt a certain embarrassment whenever Heinrich became tragic. "Perhaps we might go on a bit," he said, and they jumped on to their machines.

A narrow bumpy byroad between the forest and fields soon led them to a bare unimpressive two-storied house, which they recognised to be an inn by its brown surly signboard. On the green, which was separated from the house by the street, stood a large number of tables, many covered with cloths which had once been white, others with cloths which were embroidered. Ten or twelve young men who were members of a cycling club sat at some pushed-back tables. Several of them had taken off their coats, others with an affectation of smartness wore them with their sleeves hanging down. Designs in magnificent red and green knitting blazed on the sky-blue sweaters with their yellow edges.

A chorus rang out to the sky with more power than purity: "Der Gott der Eisen wachsen liess, der wollte keine Knechte."

Heinrich surveyed the company with a quick glance, half shut his eyes and said to George with clenched teeth and vehement emphasis: "I don't know if these youths are staunch, true and courageous, which they certainly think they are; but there is no doubt that they smell of wool and perspiration, and so I am all for our sitting down at a reasonable distance from them."

What does he want? thought George. Would he find it more congenial if a party of Polish Jews were to sit here and sing psalms?

Both pushed their machines to a distant table and sat down. A waiter appeared in black evening dress sprinkled with the relics of grease and vegetables, cleared the table energetically with a dirty napkin, took their orders and went off.

"Isn't it lamentable," said Heinrich, "that in the immediate outskirts of Vienna nearly all the inns should be in such a state of neglect? It makes one positively depressed."

George thought that this exaggerated regret was out of place. "Oh well, in the country," he said, "you have got to take things as you find them. It is almost part of the whole thing."

Heinrich would not admit the soundness of this point of view. He began to develop a plan for the erection of seven hotels on the borders of the Wienerwald, and was calculating that one would need at the outside three or four millions, when Leo Golowski suddenly appeared. He was in mufti, which, as was frequently the case with him, was not without a certain element of bizarreness. He wore to-day, in addition to a light-grey lounge suit, a blue velvet waistcoat and a yellow silk cravat with a smooth steel tie-ring. Both the others greeted him with delight and expressed their astonishment.

Leo sat down by them. "I heard you fixing up your excursion yesterday evening, and when we were discharged from the barracks at nine o'clock to-day, I at once thought how nice it would be to have a chat for an hour or so in the open air with a couple of keen and congenial men. So I went home, threw myself into mufti and started off." He spoke in his usual tone, which always fascinated George with its charm and semi-naïveté, though when he thought of it afterwards it always seemed to possess a certain touch of irony, of insincerity in fact. He had a knack of conducting serious conversations with a cut-and-dried definiteness that really impressed George. He had recently had an opportunity of listening to discussions in the café between Leo and Heinrich on questions dealing with the theory of art, especially the relation between the laws of music and mathematics. Leo thought he was on the track of the fundamental cause of major and minor keys affecting the human soul in such different ways. George took pleasure in following the chain of his acute and lucid analysis, even though he was instinctively on his guard against the audacious attempt to ascribe all the magic and mystery of sound to the rule of laws, which were as inexorable as those in accordance with which the earth and the planets revolved, and must necessarily spring from the same origin as those eternal principles. It was only when Heinrich tried to carry Leo's theories still further, and to apply them for instance to the products of literary style, that George became impatient and immediately felt himself tacit ally of Leo who invariably smiled gently at Heinrich's tangled and fantastic expositions.

The meal was served and the young men ate with appetite; Heinrich not less than the others, in spite of the fact that he expressed his opinion of the inferiority of the cooking in the most disparaging terms, and was inclined to regard the conduct of the proprietor, not merely as a sign of his personally low mind, but as characteristic of the decay of Austria in many other spheres. The conversation turned on the military position of the country, and Leo gave a satirical description of his comrades and superiors, with which both the others were very much amused. Much merriment, especially, was occasioned by a First-Lieutenant who had introduced himself to the volunteer contingent with the ominous words: "I shan't give you anything to laugh about, I am a fiend in human form."

While they were still eating a gentleman came up to the table, clicked his heels together, put his hand to his cycle cap by way of salutation, addressed them with a facetious "All hail," added a friendly "Hallo" for the benefit of Leo, and introduced himself to Heinrich. "My name is Josef Rosner." He then cheerily began the conversation with these words: "I suppose you gentlemen are also on a cycling expedition...." As no one answered him he continued: “One must make the best of the last fine days, the splendid weather won’t last much longer.”

“Won’t you sit down, Herr Rosner?” asked George politely.

“Much obliged but....” He pointed to his party.... “We have only just started out, we have still got a lot in front of us; going to ride down to Tull and then via Stockerau to Vienna. Excuse me, gentlemen.” He took a wooden vesta from the table and lighted his cigarette with dignity.

“What kind of a club are you in then, old chap?” asked Leo, and George was surprised at the “old chap,” till it occurred to him that they had both known each other from boyhood.

“This is the Sechshauser Cycle Club,” replied Josef. In spite of the fact that no astonishment was expressed, he added: “Of course you are surprised, gentlemen, at a real Viennese like myself belonging to this suburban club, but it is only because a great friend of mine is the captain there. You see that fat chap there, just slipping into his coat. That is Jalaudek, the son of the town councillor and member of Parliament.”

“Jalaudek...” repeated Heinrich with obvious loathing in his voice, and said nothing more.

“Oh yes,” said Leo, “that’s the man, you know, who in a recent debate about the popular education board gave this magnificent definition of science. Didn’t you read it?” He turned to the others.

They did not remember.

“‘Science,’” quoted Leo, “‘Science is what one Jew copies from another.’”

All laughed. Even Josef, who, however, immediately started explaining: “He is really not that sort at all — I know him quite well — only he is so crude in political life... simply because the opposing parties scratch each other’s eyes out in our beloved Austria. But in ordinary life he is a very affable gentleman. The boy is much more Radical.”

“Is your club Christian Socialist or National German?” asked Leo courteously.

“Oh, we don’t make any distinction. Only of course as things are going nowadays....” He stopped with sudden embarrassment.

“Come, come,” said Leo encouragingly. “It is perfectly obvious that your club is not tainted by a single Jew. Why, one notices that a mile off.”

Josef thought it was best form to laugh. He then said: “Excuse me, no politics in the mountains! Anyway, as we are on this topic you are labouring under a delusion, gentlemen. For instance, we have a man in the club who is engaged to a Jewish girl. But they are beckoning to me already. Goodbye, gentlemen; so long, Leo; goodbye, all.” He saluted again and swaggered off.

The others, smiling in spite of themselves, followed him with their eyes. Then Leo suddenly turned to George and asked: “And how is his sister getting on with her singing?”

“What?” said George, startled and blushing slightly.

“Therese has been telling me,” went on Leo quietly, “that you and Anna do music together sometimes. Is her voice all right now?”

“Yes,” replied George, hesitating, “I believe so; at any rate I think it is very pleasant, very melodious, especially in the deeper registers. It is a pity in my view that it is not big enough for larger rooms.”

“Not big enough?” repeated Leo meditatively.

“How would you describe it?”

Leo shrugged his shoulders and looked quietly at George. “It is like this,” he said. “I personally like the voice very much, but even when Anna had the idea of going on the stage... to speak quite frankly, I never thought anything would come of it.”

“You probably knew,” replied George with deliberate casualness, “that Fräulein Anna suffers from a peculiar weakness of the vocal chords."

"Yes, of course I knew that, but if she were cut out for an artistic career, really had it in her, I mean, she would certainly have overcome that weakness."

"You think so?"

"Yes, I do. That is my decided opinion. That's why I think that expressions like 'peculiar weakness' or 'her voice is not big enough' are more or less euphemisms for something more fundamental, more psychological. It's quite clear that her fate line says nothing about her being an artist, that's a fact. She was, so to speak, predestined from the beginning to end her days in respectable domesticity."

Heinrich enthusiastically caught up the theory of the fate line, and led their thoughts in his own erratic way from the sphere of cleverness to the sphere of sophistry, and from the sphere of sophistry to the sphere of the nonsensical.

He then suggested that they should bask for half an hour in the meadow in the sun. "It will probably not shine so warm again during this year."

The others agreed.

A hundred yards from the inn George and Leo stretched themselves out on their cloaks. Heinrich sat down on the grass, crossed his arms over his knees, and looked in front of him. At his feet the sward sloped down to the forest. Still deeper down rested the villas of Neuwaldegg, buried in loose foliage. The spire-crosses and dazzling windows of the town shone out from the bluish-grey clouds, and far away, as though lifted up by a moving haze, the plain swept away to a gradual darkness.

Pedestrians were walking over the fields towards the inn. Some gave them a greeting as they passed, and one of them, a slim young man who led a child by the hand, remarked to Heinrich: "This is a really fine day, just like May."

Heinrich felt at first his heart go out as it were involuntarily, as it often did towards casual and unexpected friendliness of this description. But he immediately pulled himself together, for of course he realised that the young man was only intoxicated, as it were, with the mildness of the day and the peace of the landscape; that at the bottom of his soul he too felt hostile to him, just like all the others who had strolled past him so harmlessly, and he himself found difficulty in understanding why the view of these gently sloping hills and the town merging into twilight should affect him with so sweet a melancholy, in view of the fact that the men who lived there meant so little good by him, and meant him even that little but rarely. The cycling club whizzed along the street which was quite close to them. The jauntily-worn coats fluttered, the badges gleamed and crude laughter rang out over the fields.

"Awful people," said Leo casually without changing his place.

Heinrich motioned down below with a vague movement of his head. "And fellows like that," he said with set teeth, "imagine that they are more at home here than we are."

"Oh, well," answered Leo quietly, "they aren't so far out in that, those fellows there."

Heinrich turned scornfully towards him: "Excuse me, Leo, I forgot for a moment that you yourself wish to count as only here on sufferance."

"I don't wish that for a minute," replied Leo with a smile, "and you need not misunderstand me so perversely. One really can't bear a grudge against these people if they regard themselves as the natives and you and me as the foreigners. After all, it is only the expression of their healthy instinct for an anthropological fact which is confirmed by history. Neither Jewish nor Christian sentimentalism can do anything against that and all the consequences which follow from it." And turning to George he asked him in a tone which was only too courteous: "Don't you think so too?"

George reddened and cleared his throat, but had no opportunity of answering, for Heinrich, on whose forehead two deep furrows now appeared, immediately began to speak with considerable bitterness.

"My own instinct is at any rate quite as much a rule of conduct for me as the instinct of Herren Jalaudek Junior and Senior, and that instinct tells me infallibly that my home is here, just here, and not in some land which I don't know, the description of which doesn't appeal to me the least bit and which certain people now want to persuade me is my fatherland on the strength of the argument that that was the place from which my ancestors some thousand years ago were scattered into the world. One might further observe on that point that the ancestors of the Herren Jalaudek and even of our friend Baron von Wergenthin were quite as little at home here as mine and yours."

"You mustn't be angry with me," retorted Leo, "but your standpoint in these matters is really somewhat limited. You are always thinking about yourself and the really quite irrelevant circumstance... excuse my saying irrelevant circumstance, that you are an author who happens to write in the German language because he was born in a German country, and happens to write about Austrian people and Austrian conditions because he lives in Austria. But the primary question is not about you, or about me either, or even about the few Jewish officials who do not get promoted, the few Jewish volunteers who do not get made officers, the Jewish lecturers who either get their Professorship too late or not at all — those are sheer secondary inconveniences so to speak; we have to deal, in considering this question, with quite another class of men whom you know either imperfectly or not at all. We have to deal with destinies to which, I assure you, my dear Heinrich, that in spite of your real duty to do so, I am sure you have not yet given sufficient thorough thought. I am sure you haven't.... Otherwise you wouldn't be able to discuss all these matters in the superficial and the... egoistic way you are now doing."

He then told them of his experiences at the Bâle Zionist Congress in which he had taken part in the previous year, and where he had obtained a deeper insight into the character and psychological condition of the Jewish people than he had ever done before. With these people, whom he saw at close quarters for the first time, the yearning for Palestine, he knew it for a fact, was no artificial pose. A genuine feeling was at work within them, a feeling that had never become extinguished and was now flaming up afresh under the stress of necessity. No one could doubt that who had seen, as he had, the holy scorn shine out in their looks when a speaker exclaimed that they must give up the hope of Palestine for the time being and content themselves with settlements in Africa and the Argentine. Why, he had seen old men, not uneducated men either, no, learned and wise old men, weeping because they must needs fear that that land of their fathers, which they themselves would never be able to tread, even in the event of the realisation of the boldest Zionist plans, would perhaps never be open to their children and their children's children.

George listened with surprise, and was even somewhat moved.

But Heinrich, who had been walking up and down the field during Leo's narrative, exclaimed that he regarded Zionism as the worst affliction that had ever burst upon the Jews, and that Leo's own words had convinced him of it more profoundly than any previous argument or experience.

National feeling and religion, those had always been the words which had embittered him with their wanton, yes malignant, ambiguity. Fatherland.... Why, that was nothing more than a fiction, a political idea floating in the air, changeable, intangible. It was only the home, not the fatherland which had any real significance... and so the feeling of home was synonymous with the right to a home. And so far as religions were concerned, he liked Christian and Jewish mythology quite as much as Greek and Indian; but as soon as they began to force their dogmas upon him, he found them all equally intolerable and repulsive. And he felt himself akin with no one, no, not with any one in the whole world: with the weeping Jews in Ble as little as with the bawling Pan-Germans in the Austrian Parliament; with Jewish usurers as little as with noble robber-knights; with a Zionist bar-keeper as little as with a Christian Socialist grocer. And least of all would the consciousness of a persecution which they had all suffered, and of a hatred whose burden fell upon them all, make him feel linked to men from whom he felt himself so far distant in temperament. He did not mind recognising Zionism as a moral principle and a social movement, if it could honestly be regarded in that light, but the idea of the foundation of a Jewish state on a religious and national basis struck him as a nonsensical defiance of the whole spirit of historical evolution. "And you too, at the bottom of your heart," he explained, standing still in front of Leo, "you don't think either that this goal will ever prove attainable; why, you don't even wish it, although you fancy yourself in your element trying to get there. What is your home-country, Palestine? A geographical idea. What does the faith of your father mean to you? A collection of customs which you have now ceased to observe and some of which seem as ridiculous and in as bad taste to you, as they do to me."

They went on talking for a long time, now vehemently and almost offensively, then calmly, and in the honest endeavour to convince each other. Frequently they were surprised to find themselves holding the same opinion, only again to lose touch with each other the next moment in a new contradiction. George, stretched on his cloak, listened to them. His mind soon took the side of Leo, whose words seemed to thrill with an ardent pity for the unfortunate members of his race, and who would turn proudly away from people who would not treat him as their equal. Soon he felt nearer again in spirit to Heinrich, who treated with anger and scorn the attempt, as wild as it was short-sighted, to collect from all the corners of the world the members of a race whose best men had always merged in the culture of the land of their adoption, or had at any rate contributed to it, and to send them all together to a foreign land, a land to which no homesickness called them. And George gradually appreciated how difficult those same picked men about whom Heinrich had been speaking, the men who were hatching in their souls the future of humanity, would find it to come to a decision. How dazed must be their consciousness of their existence, their value and their rights, tossed to and fro as they were between defiance and exhaustion, between the fear of appearing importunate and their bitter resentment at the demand that they must needs yield to an insolent majority, between the inner consciousness of being at home in the country where they lived and worked, and their indignation at finding themselves persecuted and insulted in that very place. He saw for the first time the designation Jew, which he himself had often used flippantly, jestingly and contemptuously, in a quite new and at the same time melancholy light. There dawned within him some idea of this people's mysterious destiny, which always expressed itself in every one who sprang from the race, not less in those who tried to escape from that origin of theirs, as though it were a disgrace, a pain or a fairy tale that did not concern them at all, than in those who obstinately pointed back to it as though to a piece of destiny, an honour or an historical fact based on an immovable foundation.

And as he lost himself in the contemplation of the two speakers, and looked at their figures, which stood out in relief against the reddish-violet sky in sharply-drawn, violently-moving lines, it occurred to him, and not for the first time, that Heinrich who insisted on being at home here, resembled both in figure and gesture some fanatical Jewish preacher, while Leo, who wanted to go back to Palestine with his people, reminded him in feature and in bearing of the statue of a Greek youth which he had once seen in the Vatican or the Naples museum. And he understood again quite well, as his eye followed with pleasure Leo's lively aristocratic gestures, how Anna could have experienced a mad fancy for her friend's brother years ago in that summer by the seaside.

Heinrich and Leo were still standing opposite each other on the grass, while their conversation became lost in a maze of words. Their sentences rushed violently against each other, wrestled convulsively, shot past each other and vanished into nothingness, and George noticed at some moment or other that he was only listening to the sound of the speeches, without being able to follow their meaning.

A cool breeze came up from the plain, and George got up from the sward with a slight shiver. The others, who had almost forgotten his presence, were thus called back again to actualities, and they decided to leave. Full daylight still shone over the landscape, but the sun was couched faint and dark on the long strip of an evening cloud.

"Conversations like this," said Heinrich, as he strapped his cloak on to his cycle, "always leave me with a sense of dissatisfaction, which even goes as far as a painful feeling in the neighbourhood of the stomach. Yes really. They just lead absolutely nowhere. And after all, what do political views matter to men who don't make politics their career or their business? Do they exert the slightest influence on the policy and moulding of existence? You, Leo, are just like myself; neither of us will ever do anything else, can ever do anything else, than just accomplish that which, in view of our character and our capacities, we are able to accomplish. You will never migrate to Palestine all your life long, even if Jewish states were founded and you were offered a position as prime-minister, or at any rate official pianist — —"

"Oh, you can't know that," interrupted Leo.

"I know it for a certainty," said Heinrich. "That's why I'll admit, into the bargain, that in spite of my complete indifference to every single form of religion I would positively never allow myself to be baptised, even if it were possible — though that is less the case to-day than ever it was — of escaping once and for all Anti-Semitic bigotry and villainy by a dodge like that."

"Hum," said Leo, "but supposing the mediæval stake were to be lighted again."

"In that case," retorted Heinrich, "I hereby solemnly bind myself to take your advice implicitly."

"Oh," objected George, "those times will certainly not come again."

Both the others were unable to help laughing at George being kind enough to reassure them in that way about their future, in the name, as Heinrich observed, of the whole of Christendom.

In the meanwhile they had crossed the field.

George and Heinrich pushed their cycles forward up the bumpy by-road, while Leo at their side walked on the turf with his cloak fluttering in the wind. They were all silent for quite a time, as though exhausted. At the place where the bad path turned off towards the broad high road, Leo remained stationary and said: "We will have to leave each other here, I am afraid." He shook hands with George and smiled. "You must have been pretty well bored to-day," he said.

George blushed. "I say now, you must take me for a...."

Leo held George's hand in a firm grip. "I take you for a very shrewd man and also for a very good sort. Do you believe me?"

George was silent.

"I should like to know," continued Leo, "whether you believe me, George. I am keen on knowing." His voice assumed a tone of genuine sincerity.

"Why, of course I believe you," replied George, still, however, with a certain amount of impatience.

"I am glad," said Leo, "for I really feel a sympathy between us, George." He looked straight into his eyes, then shook hands once more with him and Heinrich and turned to go.

But George suddenly had the feeling that this young man who with his fluttering cloak and his head slightly bent forward was striding down-hill in the middle of the broad street was not waiting to any "home," but to some foreign sphere somewhere, where no one could follow him. He found this feeling all the more incomprehensible since he had not only spent many hours recently with Leo in conversation at the café, but had also received all possible information from Anna about him, his family and his position in life. He knew that that summer at the seaside, which now lay six years back, as did Anna's youthful infatuation, had marked the last summer which the Golowski family had enjoyed free from trouble, and that the business of the old man had been completely ruined in the subsequent winter. It had been extraordinary, according to Anna's account, how all the members of the family had adapted themselves to the altered conditions, as though they had been long prepared for this revolution. The family removed from their comfortable house in the Rathaus quarter to a dismal street in the neighbourhood of the Augarten. Herr Golowski undertook all kinds of commission business while Frau Golowski did needlework for sale.

Therese gave lessons in French and English and at first continued to attend the dramatic school. It was a young violin player belonging to an impoverished noble Russian family who awakened her interest in political questions. She soon abandoned her art, for which, as a matter of fact, she had always shown more inclination than real talent, and in a short time she was in the full swing of the Social Democratic movement as a speaker and agitator. Leo, without agreeing with her views, enjoyed her fresh and audacious character. He often attended meetings with her, but as he was not keen on being impressed by magniloquence, whether it took the form of promises which were never fulfilled or of threats which disappeared into thin air, he found it good fun to point out to her, on the way home, with an irresistible acuteness, the inconsistencies in her own speeches and those of the members of her party. But he always made a particular point of trying to convince her that she would never have been able to forget so completely her great mission for days and weeks on end, if her pity for the poor and the suffering were really as deep an emotion as she imagined.

Leo's own life, moreover, had no definite object. He attended technical science lectures, gave piano lessons, sometimes went so far as to plan out a musical career, and practised five or six hours a day for weeks on end. But it was still impossible to forecast what he would finally decide on. Inasmuch it was his way to wait almost unconsciously for a miracle to save him from anything disagreeable, he had put off his year of service till he was face to face with the final time-limit, and now in his twenty-fifth year he was serving for the first time.

Their parents allowed Leo and Therese to go their own way, and in spite of their manifold differences of opinion there seemed to be no serious discord in the Golowski family. The mother usually sat at home, sewed, knitted and crocheted, while the father went about his business with increasing apathy, and liked best of all to watch the chess-players in the café, a pleasure which enabled him to forget the ruin of his life. Since the collapse of his business he seemed unable to shake off a certain feeling of embarrassment towards his children, so that he was almost proud when Therese would give him now and again an article which she had written to read, or when Leo was good enough to play a game on Sundays with him on the board he loved so well.

It always seemed to George as though his own sympathy for Leo were fundamentally connected with Anna's long-past fancy for him. He felt, and not for the first time, curiously attracted to a man to whom a soul which now belonged to him, had flown in years gone by.

George and Heinrich had mounted their cycles, and were riding along a narrow road through the thick forest that loomed darker and darker. A little later, as the forest retreated behind them again on both sides, they had the setting sun at their back, while the long shadows of their bodies kept running along in front of their cycles. The slope of the road became more and more pronounced and soon led them between low houses which were overhung with reddish foliage. A very old man sat in a seat in front of the door, a pale child looked out of an open window. Otherwise not a single human being was to be seen.

"Like an enchanted village," said George.

Heinrich nodded. He knew the place. He had been here with his love on a wonderful summer day this year. He thought of it and burning longing throbbed through his heart. And he remembered the last hours that he had spent with her in Vienna in his cool room with the drawn-down blinds, through whose interstices the hot August morning had glittered in: he remembered their last walk through the Sunday quiet of the cool stone streets and through the old empty courtyards — and the complete absence of any idea that all this was for the last time. For it was only the next day that the letter had come, the ghastly letter in which she had written that she had wished to spare him the pain of farewell, and that when he read these words, she would already be quite a long way over the frontier on her journey to the new foreign town.

The road became more animated. Charming villas appeared encircled with cosy little gardens, wooded hills sloped gently upwards behind the houses. They saw once again the expanse of the valley as the waning day rested over meadows and fields. The lamps had been lit in a great empty restaurant garden. A hasty darkness seemed to be stealing down from every quarter simultaneously. They were now at the cross-roads. George and Heinrich got off and lit cigarettes.

George looked at his watch. "Six,.. and I've got to be in town by eight."

"So I suppose we can't dine together?" said Heinrich.

"I am afraid not."

"It's a pity. Well, we'll take the short cut then through Sievering."

They lit their lamps and pushed their cycles through the forest in a long serpentine. One tree after another in succession sprang out of the darkness into the radiance of the globes of light and retreated again into the night. The wind soughed through the foliage with increased force and the leaves rustled underneath. Heinrich felt a quite gentle fear, such as frequently came over him when it was dark in the open country. He felt, as it were, disillusioned at the thought of having to spend the evening alone. He was in a bad temper with George, and was irritated into the bargain at the latter's reserve towards himself. He resolved also, and not for the first time, not to discuss his own personal affairs with George any more. It was better so. He did not need to confide in anybody or obtain anybody's sympathy. He had always felt at his best when he had gone his own way alone. He had found that out often enough. Why then reveal his soul to another? He needed acquaintances to go walks and excursions with, and to discuss all the manifold problems of life and art in cold shrewd fashion — he needed women for a fleeting embrace; but he needed no friend and no mistress. In that way his life would pass with greater dignity and serenity. He revelled in these resolutions, and felt a growing consciousness of toughness and superiority. The darkness of the forest lost its terror, and he walked through the gently rustling night as though through a kindred element.

The height was soon reached. The dark sky lay starless over the grey road and the haze-breathing fields that stretched on both sides towards the deceptive distance of the wooded hills. A light was shining from a toll-house quite near them. They mounted their cycles again and rode back as quickly as the darkness permitted. George wished to be soon at the journey's end. It struck him as strangely unreal that he was to see again in an hour and a half that quiet room which no one else knew of besides Anna and himself; that dark room with the oil-prints on the wall, the blue velvet sofa, the cottage piano, on which stood the photographs of unknown people and a bust of Schiller in white plaster; with its high narrow windows, opposite which the old dark grey church towered aloft.

Lamps were burning all the way along. The roads again became more open and they were given a last view of the heights. Then they went at top speed, first between well-kept villas, finally through a populous noisy main road until they got deeper into the town. They got off at the Votive Church.

“Good-bye,” said George, “and I hope to see you again in the café to-morrow.”

“I don’t know...” replied Heinrich, and as George looked at him questioningly he added: “It is possible that I shall go away.”

“I say, that is a sudden decision.”

“Yes, one gets caught sometimes by....”

“Lovesickness,” filled in George with a smile.

“Or fear,” said Heinrich with a short laugh.

“You certainly have no cause for that,” said George.

“Do you know for certain?” asked Heinrich.

“You told us so yourself.”

“What!”

“That you have news every day.”

“Yes, that is quite true, every day. I get tender ardent letters. Every day by the same post. But what does that prove? Why, I write letters which are yet more ardent and even more tender and yet....”

“Yes,” said George, who understood him. And he hazarded the question: “Why don’t you stay with her?”

Heinrich shrugged his shoulders. “Tell me yourself, George, wouldn’t it strike you as slightly humorous for a man to burn his boats on account of a love affair like that and trot about the world with a little actress....”

“Personally, I should regret it very much... but humorous... where does the humour come in?”

“No, I have no desire to do it,” said Heinrich in a hard voice.

“But if you... but if you were to take it very seriously... if you asked her point blank... mightn’t the young lady perhaps give up her career?”

“Possibly, but I am not going to ask her, I don’t want to ask her. No, better pain than responsibility.”

“Would it be such a great responsibility?” asked George. “What I mean is... is the girl’s talent so pronounced, is she really so keen on her art, that it would be really a sacrifice for her to give the thing up.”

“Has she got talent?” said Heinrich. “Why, I don’t know myself. Why, I even think she is the one creature in the world about whose talent I would not trust myself to give an opinion. Every time I have seen her on the stage her voice has rung in my ears like the voice of an unknown person, and as though, too, it came from a greater distance than all the other voices. It is really quite remarkable.... But you are bound to have seen her act, George. What’s your impression? Tell me quite frankly.”

“Well, quite frankly... I don’t remember her properly. You’ll excuse me, I didn’t know then, you see.... When you talk of her I always see in my mind’s eye a head of reddish-blonde hair that falls a little over the forehead — and very big black roving eyes with a small pale face.”

“Yes, roving eyes,” repeated Heinrich, bit his lips and was silent for a while. “Good-bye,” he said suddenly.

“You’ll be sure to write to me?” asked George.

“Yes, of course. Any way I am bound to be coming back again,” he added, and smiled stiffly.

“Bon voyage,” said George, and shook hands with him with unusual affection. This did Heinrich good. This warm pressure of the hand not only made him suddenly certain that George did not think him ridiculous, but also, strangely enough, that his distant mistress was faithful to him and that he himself was a man who could take more liberties with life than many others.

George looked after him as he hurried off on his cycle. He felt again as he had felt a few hours before, on Leo’s departure, that some one was vanishing into an unknown land; and he realised at this moment that in spite of all the sympathy he felt for both of them he would never attain with either that unrestrained sense of intimacy which had united him last year with Guido Schönstein and previously with poor Labinski.

He reflected whether perhaps the fundamental reason for this was not perhaps the difference of race between him and them, and he asked himself whether leaving out of account the conversation between the two of them, he would of his own initiative have realised so clearly this feeling of aloofness. He doubted it. Did he not as a matter of fact feel himself nearer, yes even more akin, to these two and to many others of their race than to many men who came from the same stock as his own? Why, did he not feel quite distinctly that deep down somewhere there were many stronger threads of sympathy running between him and those two men, than between him and Guido or perhaps even his own brother? But if that was so, would he not have been bound to have taken some opportunity this afternoon to have said as much to those two men? to have appealed to them? “Just trust me, don’t shut me out. Just try to treat me as a friend....” And as he asked himself why he had not done it, and why he had scarcely taken any part in their conversation, he realised with astonishment that during the whole time he had not been able to shake off a kind of guilty consciousness of having not been free during his whole life from a certain hostility towards the foreigners, as Leo called them himself, a kind of wanton hostility which was certainly not justified by his own personal experience, and had thus contributed his own share to that distrust and defiance with which so many persons, whom he himself might have been glad to take an opportunity to approach, had shut themselves off from him. This thought roused an increasing malaise within him which he could not properly analyse, and which was simply the dull realisation that clean relations could not flourish even between clean men in an atmosphere of folly, injustice and disingenuousness.

He rode homewards faster and faster, as though that would make him escape this feeling of depression. Arrived home, he changed quickly, so as not to keep Anna waiting too long. He longed for her as he had never done before. He felt as though he had come home from a far journey to the one being who wholly belonged to him.

IV

GEORGE STOOD BY the window. The stone backs of the bearded giants who bore on their powerful arms the battered armorial bearings of a long-past race were arched just beneath him. Straight opposite, out of the darkness of ancient houses the steps crept up to the door of the old grey church which loomed amid the falling flakes of snow as though behind a moving curtain. The light of a street lamp on the square shone palely through the waning daylight. The snowy street beneath, which, though centrally situated, was remote from all bustle, was even quieter than usual on this holiday afternoon, and George felt once more, as indeed he always did when he ascended the broad staircase of the old palace that had been transformed into an apartment house, and stepped into the spacious room with its low-arched ceiling, that he was escaping from his usual world and had entered the other half of his wonderful double life.

He heard a key grating in the door and turned round. Anna came in. George clasped her ecstatically in his arms, and kissed her on the forehead and mouth. Her dark-blue jacket, her broad-rimmed hat, her fur boa were all covered with snow.

"You have been working then," said Anna, as she took off her things and pointed to the table where music paper with writing on it lay close to the green-shaded lamp.

"I have just looked through the quintette, the first movement, there is still a lot to do to it."

"But it will be extraordinarily fine then."

"We'll hope so. Do you come from home, Anna?"

"No, from Bittner's."

"What, to-day, Sunday?"

"Yes, the two girls have got a lot behind-hand through the measles, and that has to be made up. I am very pleased too, for money reasons for one thing."

"Making your fortune!"

"And then one escapes for an hour or two at any rate from the happy home."

"Yes," said George, put Anna's boa over the back of a chair and stroked the fur nervously with his fingers. Anna's remark, in which he could detect a gentle reproach, as it were, a reproach too which he had heard before, gave him an unpleasant feeling. She sat down on the sofa, put her hands on her temples, stroked her dark blonde wavy hair backwards and looked at George with a smile. He stood leaning on the chest of drawers, with both hands in his jacket pocket, and began to tell her of the previous evening, which he had spent with Guido and his violinist. The young lady had, at the Count's wish, been for some weeks taking instruction in the Catholic religion with the confessor of an Arch-duchess; she, on her side, made Guido read Nietzsche and Ibsen. But according to George's account the only result of this course of study which one could report so far was that the Count had developed the habit of nicknaming his Mistress "the Rattenmamsell," after that wonderful character out of Little Eyolf.

Anna had nothing very bright to communicate about her last evening. They had had visitors. "First," Anna told him, "my mother's two cousins, then an office friend of my father's to play tarok. Even Josef was domesticated for once and lay on the sofa from three to five. Then his latest pal, Herr Jalaudek, who paid me quite a lot of attention."

"Really, really."

"He was fascinating. I'll just tell you: a violet cravat with yellow spots which puts yours quite into the shade. He paid me the honour too of suggesting that I should help him in a so-called charity-performance at the 'Wild Man,' for the benefit of the Wahringer Church Building Society."

"Of course you accepted?"

"I excused myself on account of my lack of voice and want of religious feeling."

"So far as the voice is concerned...."

She interrupted him. "No, George," she said lightly, "I have given up that hope at last."

He looked at her and tried to read her glance, but it remained clear and free. The organ from the church sounded softly and dully.

"Right," said George, "I have brought you the ticket for to-morrow's 'Carmen.'"

"Thanks very much," she answered, and took the card. "Are you going too, dear?"

"Yes, I have a box in the third tier, and I have asked Bermann to come. I am taking the music with me, as I did the other day at Lohengrin, and I shall practise conducting again. At the back, of course. You can have no idea what you learn that way. I should like to make a suggestion," he added hesitatingly. "Won't you come and have supper somewhere with me and Bermann after the theatre?"

She was silent.

He continued: "I should really like it if you got to know him better. With all his faults he is an interesting fellow and...."

"I am not a Rattenmamsell," she interrupted sharply, while her face immediately assumed its stiff conventional expression.

George compressed the corners of his mouth. "That doesn't apply to me, my dear child. There are many points of difference between Guido and me. But as you like." He walked up and down the room.

She remained sitting on the ottoman. "So you are going to Ehrenbergs' this evening?" she asked.

"You know I am. I have already refused twice recently, and I couldn't very well do so this time."

"You needn't make any excuses, George, I am invited too."

"Where to?"

"I am going to Ehrenbergs' too."

"Really?" he exclaimed involuntarily.

"Why are you so surprised?" she asked sharply; "it is clear that they don't yet know that I am not fit to be associated with any more."

"My dear Anna, what is the matter with you to-day? Why are you so touchy? Supposing they did know... do you think that would prevent people from inviting you? Quite the contrary. I am convinced that you would really go up in Frau Ehrenberg's respect."

"And the sweet Else, I suppose, would positively envy me. Don't you think so? Anyway, she wrote me quite a nice letter. Here it is. Won't you read it?" George ran his eye over it, thought its kindness was somewhat deliberate, made no further remark and gave it back to Anna.

"Here is another one too, if it interests you."

"From Doctor Stauber. Indeed? Would he mind if he knew that you gave it to me to read?"

"Why are you so considerate all of a sudden?" and as though to punish him she added, "there are probably a great many things that he would mind."

George read the letter quickly through to himself. Berthold described in his dry way, with an occasional tinge of humour, the progress of his work at the Pasteur Institute, his walks, his excursions and the theatres he had visited, and quite a lot of remarks also of a general character. But in spite of his eight pages the letter did not contain the slightest allusion to either past or future. George asked casually "How long is he staying in Paris?"

"As you see he doesn't write a single word about his return."

"Your friend Therese was recently of opinion that his colleagues in the party would like to have him back again."

"Oh, has she been in the café again?"

"Yes. I spoke to her there two or three days ago. She really amuses me a great deal."

"Really?"

"She starts off, of course, by always being very superior, even with me. Presumably because I am one of those who rot away their life with art and silly things like that, while there are so many more important things to do in the world. But when she warms up a bit it turns out that she is every bit as interested as we ordinary people in all kinds of silly things."

"She easily gets warmed up," said Anna imperturbably.

George walked up and down and went on speaking. "She was really magnificent the other day at the fencing tournament in the Musikverein rooms. By-the-bye, who was the gentleman who was up there in the gallery with her?"

Anna shrugged her shoulders. "I did not have the privilege of being at the tournament, and besides, I don't know all Therese's cavaliers."

"I presume," said George, "it was a comrade, in every sense of the term. At any rate he was very glum and was pretty badly dressed. When Therese clapped Felician's victory he positively collapsed with jealousy."

"What did Therese really tell you about Doctor Berthold?" asked Anna.

"Ho, ho!" said George jestingly, "the lady still appears to be keenly interested."

Anna did not answer.

"Well," reported George, "I can give you the information that they want to make him stand in the autumn for the Landtag. I can quite understand it too, in view of his brilliant gifts as a speaker."

"What do you know about it? Have you ever heard him speak?"

"Of course I have; don't you remember? At your place."

"There is really no occasion for you to make fun of him."

"I assure you I'd no idea of doing so."

"I noticed at once that he struck you at the time as somewhat funny. He and his father, too. Why, you immediately ran away from them."

"Not at all, Anna. You are doing me a great injustice in making such insinuations."

"They may have their weaknesses, both of them, but at any rate they belong to the people whom one can count on. And that is something."

"Have I disputed that, Anna? Upon my word, I have never heard you talk so illogically. What do you want me to do then? Did you want me by any chance to be jealous about that letter?"

"Jealous? that would be the finishing touch. You with your past."

George shrugged his shoulders. Memories swam up in his mind of similar wrangles in the course of previous relationships, memories of those mysterious sudden discords and estrangements which usually simply meant the beginning of the end. Had he really got as far as all that already with his good sensible Anna? He walked up and down the room moodily and almost depressed. At times he threw a fleeting glance towards his love who sat silent in her corner of the sofa, rubbing her hands lightly as though she were cold. The organ rang out more heavily than before in the silence of the room that had suddenly become so melancholy; the voices of singing men became audible and the window-panes rattled softly. George's glance fell on the little Christmas-tree which stood on the sideboard and whose candles had burnt the evening before last for the benefit of Anna and himself. Half-bored, half-nervous, he took a wooden vesta out of his pocket and began to light the little candles one after another.

Then Anna's voice suddenly rang out to him. "There is no one I should prefer to old Doctor Stauber to confide in about anything serious."

George turned coldly towards her and blew out a burning vesta which he still held in his hand. He knew immediately what Anna meant, and felt surprised that he had never given it another thought since their last meeting. He went up to her and took hold of her hand. Now for the first time she looked up. Her expression was impenetrable, her features immobile. "I say, Anna...." He sat down by her side on the ottoman with both her hands in his.

She was silent.

"Why don't you speak?"

She shrugged her shoulders. "There is nothing new to tell you," she explained simply.

"I see," he said slowly. It passed through his mind that her strange sensitiveness to-day was to be regarded as symptomatic of the condition to which she was alluding, and the uneasiness in his soul increased. "But you can't tell definitely for a good time yet," he said in a somewhat cooler tone than he really meant. "And... even supposing..." he added with artificial cheerfulness.

"So you would forgive me?" she asked with a smile.

He pressed her to him and suddenly felt quite transported. A vivid and almost pathetic feeling of love flamed up in him for the soft good creature whom he held in his arms, and who could never occasion him, he felt deeply convinced, any serious suffering. "It really wouldn't be so bad," he said cheerily, "you would just leave Vienna for a time, that's all."

"Well, it certainly wouldn't be as simple as you seem all of a sudden to think it would."

"Why not? You can soon find an excuse; besides, whom does it concern? Us two. No one else. But as far as I am concerned. I can get away any day as you know; can stay away too as long as I want to. I have not yet signed any contract for next year," he added with a smile. He then got up to put out the Christmas candles, whose tiny flames had almost burnt down to the end, and went on speaking with increasing liveliness. "It would be positively delightful; just think of it, Anna! We should go away at the end of February or the beginning of March. South, of course, Italy, or perhaps the sea. We would stay at some quiet place where no one knows us, in a beautiful hotel with enormous grounds. And wouldn't one be able to work there, by Jove?"

"So that's why!" she said, as though she suddenly understood him. He laughed, held her more tightly in his arms and she pressed herself against his breast. There was no longer any noise from outside. The last sounds of the organ and the men's voices had died away. The snow curtains swept down in front of the window.... George and Anna were happy as they had never been before.

While they were at peace in the darkness he spoke about his musical plans for the near future, and told her, so far as he was able, about Heinrich's opera plot. The room became filled with shimmering shadows. The clatter of a wedding-feast swept through the fantastic hall of an ancient king. A passionate youth stole in and thrust his dagger into the prince. A dark sentence was pronounced more sinister than death itself. A sluggish ship sailed on a darkling flood towards an unknown goal. At the youth's feet there rested a princess, who had once been the betrothed of a duke. An unknown man approached the shining boat with strange tidings; fools, star-gazers, dancers, courtiers swept past. Anna had listened in silence. When he had finished George was curious to learn what impression the fleeting pictures had made upon her.

"I can't say properly," she replied. "I certainly feel quite puzzled to-day, how you are going to make anything real out of this more or less fantastic stuff."

"Of course you can't realise it yet to-day — particularly after just hearing me describe it.... But you do feel, don't you? the musical atmosphere. I have already noted down a few motifs — and I should be really very glad if Bermann would soon get to work seriously."

"If I were you, George... may I tell you something?"

"Of course, fire ahead."

"Well, if I were you, I'd first get the quintette really finished. It can't want much doing to it now."

"Not much, and yet... besides, you mustn't forget that I've started all kinds of other things lately. The two pianoforte pieces, then the orchestra scherzo — I've already got pretty far with that. But it certainly ought to be made part of a symphony."

Anna made no answer. George noticed that her thoughts were roving, and he asked her where she had run away to this time.

"Not so far," she replied; "it only just passed through my mind what a lot of things can happen before the opera is really ready."

"Yes," said George slowly, with a slight trace of embarrassment. "If one could just look into the future."

She sighed quite softly and he pressed her nearer to him, almost as though he pitied her. "Don't worry, my darling, don't worry," he said. "I am here all right, and I always shall be here." He thought he felt what she was thinking; can't he say anything better than that?... anything stronger? anything to take away all my fear — take it away from me for ever? And he asked her disingenuously, as though conscious of running a risk: "What are you thinking of?" And as she was obstinately silent he said once more: "Anna, what are you thinking of?"

"Something very strange," she answered gently.

"What is it?"

"That the house is already built, where it will come into the world — that we have no idea where... that is what I couldn't help thinking of."

"Thinking of that!" he said, strangely moved. And pressing her to his heart with a love that flamed up afresh, "I will never desert you, you two...."

When the room was lighted again they were in very good spirits, plucked the last forgotten sweets from the branches of the little Christmas-tree and looked forward to their next meeting among people who were absolutely indifferent to them, as though it were quite a jolly adventure, laughed and talked exuberant nonsense.

As soon as Anna had gone away George locked his music manuscript up in a drawer, put out the lamp and opened the window. The snow was falling lightly and thinly. An old man was coming up the steps and his laboured breathing sounded through the still air. Opposite the silent church towered aloft... George remained awhile standing at the window. He felt almost convinced at this moment that Anna was mistaken in her surmise. He felt almost reassured as there came into his mind that remark of Leo Golowski's that Anna was destined to end her days in respectable middle-class life. Having a child by a lover really could not be part of her fate line. It was not part of his fate line either to carry the burden of serious obligation, to be tied fast from to-day and perhaps for all time to a person of the other sex; to become a father when he was still so young, a father... the word sank into his soul, oppressive, almost sinister.

He went into the Ehrenbergs' drawing-room at eight o'clock in the evening. He was met by the sound of waltz music. Old Eissler sat at the piano with his long grey beard almost drooping on to the keys. George remained at the entrance in order not to disturb him, and met welcoming glances from every quarter. Old

Eissler was playing his celebrated Viennese dances and songs with a soft touch and powerful rhythm, and George enjoyed, as he always did, the sweet crooning melodies.

"Splendid," said Frau Ehrenberg, when the old man got up.

"Keep your big words for great occasions, Leonie," answered Eissler, whose time-honoured privilege it was to call all women and girls by their Christian names. And it seemed to do everybody good to hear themselves spoken to by this handsome old man with his deep ringing voice, in which there quivered frequently, as it were, a sentimental echo of the vivid days of his youth.

George asked him if all his compositions had appeared in print.

"Very few, dear Baron. Unfortunately I can scarcely write a single note."

"It would certainly be an awful pity if these charming melodies were to be absolutely lost."

"Yes, I have often told him that," put in Frau Ehrenberg, "but unfortunately he is one of those men who have never taken themselves quite seriously."

"No, that is a mistake, Leonie. You know how I began my artistic career: I wanted to compose a great opera. Of course I was seventeen years old at the time and madly in love with a great singer."

Frau Oberberger's voice rang out from the table towards the corner: "I am sure it was a chorus girl."

"You are making a mistake, Katerina," answered Eissler. "Chorus girls were never my line. It was, as a matter of fact, a platonic love, like most of the great passions of my life."

"Were you so clumsy?" queried Frau Oberberger.

"I was often that as well," replied Eissler, in his sonorous voice and with dignity. "For as far as I can see I could have had as much luck as a hussar riding-master, but I don't regret having been clumsy."

Frau Ehrenberger nodded appreciatively.

"Then one would not be making a mistake, Herr Eissler," remarked Nürnberger, "if one attributed the chief part in your life to melancholy memories?"

Frau Ehrenberger nodded again. She was delighted whenever any one was witty in her drawing-room.

"Why did you say," she inquired, "that you could have had as much happiness as a hussar riding-master? It is not true for a minute that officers have any particular luck with women, even though my sister-in-law once had an affair with a First-Lieutenant...."

"I don't believe in platonic love," said Sissy, and beamed through the room.

Frau Wyner gave a slight shriek.

"Fräulein Sissy is probably right," said Nürnberger; "at any rate I am convinced that most women take platonic love either as an insult or an excuse."

"There are young girls here," Frau Ehrenberg reminded him gently.

"One sees that already," said Nürnberger, "from the fact of their joining in the conversation."

"All the same, I would like to take the liberty of adding a little anecdote to the chapter of platonic love," said Heinrich.

"But not a Jewish one," put in Else.

"Of course not. A blonde little girl...."

"That proves nothing," interrupted Else.

"Please let him finish his story," remonstrated Frau Ehrenberg.

"Well then, a blonde little girl," began Heinrich again, "once expressed her conviction to me, quite different, you see, from Fräulein Sissy, that platonic love did, as a matter of fact, exist, and do you know what she suggested as a proof of it? giving... an experience out of her own life. She had, you know, once spent a whole hour in a room with a lieutenant and...."

“That is enough!” cried Frau Ehrenberg nervously.

“And,” finished Heinrich, quite unperturbed and in a reassuring voice, “nothing at all happened in that hour.”

“So the blonde girl says,” added Else.

The door opened. George saw a strange lady enter in a clear blue square-cut dress, pale, simple and dignified. It was only when she smiled that he realised that the lady was Anna Rosner, and he felt something like pride in her.

When he shook hands with his love he felt Else’s look turn towards him.

They went into the next room, where the table was laid with a moderate show of festivity. The son of the house was not there. He was at Neuhaus at his father’s factory. But Herr Ehrenberg suddenly turned up at the table when the supper was served. He had just come back from his travels, which as a matter of fact had taken him to Palestine. When he was asked by Hofrat Wilt about his experiences he was at first reluctant to let himself go; finally it turned out that he had been disappointed in the scenery, annoyed by the fatigue of the journey, and had practically seen nothing of the Jewish settlements which, according to reliable information, were in process of springing up.

“So we have some ground to hope,” remarked Nürnberger, “that we may keep you here even in the event of a Jewish state being founded in the imminent future?”

Ehrenberg answered brusquely: “Did I ever tell you that I intended to emigrate? I am too old for that.”

“Really,” said Nürnberger, “I didn’t know that you had only visited the district for the benefit of Fräulein Else and Herr Oskar.”

“I am not going to quarrel with you, my dear Nürnberger. Zionism is really too good to serve as small talk at meals.”

“We’ll take it for granted,” said Hofrat Wilt, “that it is too good, but it is certainly too complicated, if only for the reason that everybody understands something different by it.”

“Or wants to understand,” added Nürnberger, “as is usually the case with most catchwords, not only in politics either — that’s why there is so much twaddle talked in the world.”

Heinrich explained that of all human creatures the politician represented in his eyes the most enigmatic phenomenon. “I can understand,” he said, “pickpockets, acrobats, bank — directors, hotel — proprietors, kings... I mean I can manage without any particular trouble to put myself into the souls of all these people. Of course the logical result is that I should only need certain alterations in degree, though no doubt enormous ones, to qualify myself to play in the world the rôle of acrobat, king or bank-director. On the other hand I have an infallible feeling that even if I could raise myself to the *n*th power I could never become what one calls a politician, a leader of a party, a member, a minister.”

Nürnberger smiled at Heinrich’s theory of the politician representing a particular type of humanity, inasmuch as it was only one of the superficial and by no means essential attributes of his profession to pose as a special human type, and to hide his greatness or his insignificance, his feats or his idleness behind labels, abstractions and symbols. What the nonentities or charlatans among them represented, why, that was obvious: they were simply business people or swindlers or glib speakers, but the people who really counted, the people who did things — the real geniuses of course, they at the bottom of their souls were simply artists. They too tried to create a work, and one, too, that raised in the sphere of ideas quite as much claim to immortality and permanent value as any other work of art. The only difference was that the material in which they worked was one that was not rigid or relatively stable, like tones or words, but that, like living men, it was in a continual state of flux and movement.

Willy Eissler appeared, apologised to his hostess for being late, sat down between Sissy and Frau Oberberger and greeted his father like a friend long lost. It turned out that though they both lived together they had not seen each other for several days.

Willy was complimented all round on his success in the aristocratic amateur performance where he had played the part of a marquis with the Countess Liebenburg-Rathony in a French one-act play. Frau Oberberger asked him, in a voice sufficiently loud for her neighbours to catch it, where his assignations with the countess took place and if he received her in the same pied-à-terre quarter as his more middle-class flames. The conversation became more lively, dialogues were exchanged and became intertwined all over the room.

But George caught isolated snatches, including part of a conversation between Anna and Heinrich which dealt with Therese Golowski. He noticed at the same time that Anna would occasionally throw a dark inquisitive look at Demeter Stanzides, who had appeared to-night in evening dress with a gardenia in his buttonhole; and though he had no actual consciousness of jealousy he felt strangely affected. He wondered if at this moment she was really thinking that she was perhaps bearing a child by him under her bosom. The idea of "the depths..." came to him again. She suddenly looked over to him with a smile, as though she were coming home from a journey. He felt an inner sense of relief and appreciated with a slight shock how much he loved her. Then he raised his glass to his lips and drank to her. Else, who up to this time had been chatting with her other neighbour Demeter, now turned to George. With her deliberately casual manner and with a look towards Anna she remarked: "She does look pretty, so womanly. But that's always been her line. Do you still do music together?"

"Frequently," replied George coolly.

"Perhaps I'll ask you to start accompanying me again at the beginning of the new year. I don't know why we have not done so before."

George was silent.

"And how are you getting on" — she threw a look at Heinrich— "with your opera?"

"Nothing is done so far. Who knows if anything will come of it?"

"Of course nothing will come of it."

George smiled. "Why are you so stern with me to-day?"

"I am very angry with you."

"With me! Why?"

"That you always go on giving people occasion to regard you as a dilettante."

This was a home thrust. George actually felt a slight sense of malice against Else, then quickly pulled himself together and answered: "That perhaps is just what I am. And if one isn't a genius it is much better to be an honest dilettante than... than an artist with a swollen head."

"Nobody wants you to do great things all at once, but all the same one really should not let oneself go in the way you do in both your inner and your outward life."

"I really don't understand you, Else. How can one contend.... Do you know that I am going to Germany in the autumn as a conductor?"

"Your career will be ruined by your not turning up to the rehearsals at ten o'clock sharp."

The taunt was still gnawing at George. "And who called me a dilettante, if I may ask?"

"Who did? Good gracious, why it has already been in the papers."

"Really," said George feeling reassured, for he now remembered that after the concert in which Fräulein Bellini had sung his songs a critic had described him as an aristocratic dilettante. George's friends had explained at the time that the reason for this malicious critique was that he had omitted to call on the gentleman in question, who was notoriously vain. So that was it once again. There were always extrinsic reasons for people criticising one unfavourably, and Else's touchiness to-day, what was it at bottom but sheer jealousy....

The table was cleared. They went into the drawing-room.

George went up to Anna, who was leaning on the piano, and said gently to her: "You do look beautiful, dear."

She nodded with satisfaction.

He then went on to ask: "Did you have a pleasant talk with Heinrich? What did you speak about? Therese, isn't that so?"

She did not answer, and George noticed with surprise that her eyelids suddenly drooped and that she began to totter. "What is the matter?" he asked, frightened.

She did not hear him, and would have fallen down if he had not quickly caught hold of her by the wrists. At the same moment Frau Ehrenberg and Else came up to her.

"Did they notice us?" thought George.

Anna had already opened her eyes again, gave a forced smile and whispered: "Oh, it is nothing. I often stand the heat so badly."

"Come along!" said Frau Ehrenberg in a motherly tone. "Perhaps you will lie down for a moment."

Anna, who seemed dazed, made no answer and the ladies of the house escorted her into an adjoining room.

George looked round. The guests did not seem to have noticed anything. Coffee was handed round. George took a cup and played nervously with his spoon. "So after all," he thought, "she will not finish up in middle-class life." But at the same time he felt as far away from her psychologically, as though the matter had no personal interest for him.

Frau Oberberger came up to him. "Well, what do you really think about platonic love? You are an expert, you know."

He answered absent-mindedly. She went on talking, as was her way, without bothering whether he was listening or answering. Suddenly Else returned. George inquired how Anna was, with polite sympathy.

"I am certain it is not anything serious," said Else and looked him strangely in the face.

Demeter Stanzides came in and asked her to sing.

"Will you accompany me?" She turned to George.

He bowed and sat down at the piano.

"What shall it be?" asked Else.

"Anything you like," replied Wilt, "but nothing modern." After supper he liked to play the reactionary at any rate in artistic matters.

"Right you are," said Else, and gave George a piece of music.

She sang the Das Alte Bild of Hugo Wolf in her small well-trained and somewhat pathetic voice. George played a refined accompaniment, though he felt somewhat distrait. In spite of his efforts he could not help feeling a little annoyed about Anna. After all no one seemed to have really noticed the incident except Frau Ehrenberg and Else.

After all, what did it really come to?... Supposing they did all know?... Whom did it concern? Yes, who bothered about it? Why, they are all listening to Else now, he continued mentally, and appreciating the beauty of this song. Even Frau Oberberger, though she is not a bit musical, is forgetting that she is a woman for a few minutes and her face is quiet and sexless. Even Heinrich is listening spell-bound and perhaps for the moment is neither thinking of his work, nor of the fate of the Jews, nor of his distant mistress. Is perhaps not even giving a single thought to his present mistress, the little blonde girl, to please whom he has recently begun to dress smartly. As a matter of fact he does not look at all bad in evening dress, and his tie is not a ready-made one, such as he usually wears, but is carefully tied.... Who is standing so close behind me? thought George, so that I can feel her breath over my hair.... Perhaps Sissy.... If the world were to be destroyed to-morrow morning it would be Sissy whom I should choose for to-night. Yes, I am sure of it. And there goes Anna with Frau Ehrenberg; it seems I am the only one who notices it, although I have got to attend simultaneously to both my own playing and Else's singing. I welcome her with my eyes. Yes, I welcome you, mother of my child.... How strange life is!...

The song was at an end. The company applauded and asked for more. George played Else's accompaniment to some other songs by Schumann, by Brahms; and finally, by general request, two of his own, which had become distasteful to him personally, since somebody or other had suggested that they were reminiscent of Mendelssohn.

While he was accompanying he felt that he was losing all touch with Else and therefore made a special effort in his playing to win back again her sense of sympathy. He played with exaggerated sensibility, he specifically wooed her and felt that it was in vain. For the first time in his life he was her unhappy lover.

The applause after George's songs was great.

"That was your best period," said Else gently to him while she put the music away, "two or three years ago."

The others made kind remarks to him without going into distinctions about the periods of his artistic development.

Nürnberger declared that he had been most agreeably disillusioned by George's songs. "I will not conceal the fact from you," he remarked, "that going by the views I have frequently heard you express, my dear Baron, I should have imagined them considerably less intelligible."

"Quite charming, really," said Wilt, "all so simple and melodious without bombast or affectation."

"And he is the man," thought George grimly, "who dubbed me a dilettante."

Willy came up to him. "Now you just say, Herr Hofrat, that you can manage to whistle them, and if I know anything about physiognomy the Baron will send two gentlemen to see you in the morning."

"Oh no," said George, pulling himself together and smiling; "fortunately, the songs were written in a period which I have long since got over, so I don't feel wounded by any blame or by any praise."

A servant brought in ices, the groups broke up and Anna stood alone with George by the pianoforte.

He asked her quickly "What does it really mean?"

"I don't know," she replied, and looked at him in astonishment.

"Do you feel quite all right now?"

"Absolutely," she answered.

"And is to-day the first time you have had anything like it?" asked George, somewhat hesitatingly.

She answered: "I had something like it yesterday evening at home. It was a kind of faintness. It lasted some time longer, while we were sitting at supper, but nobody noticed it."

"But why did you tell me nothing about it?"

She shrugged her shoulders lightly.

"I say, Anna dear," he said, and smiled guiltily, "I would like to have a word with you at any rate. Give me a signal when you want to go away. I will clear out a few minutes before you, and will wait by the Schwarzenbergplatz till you come along in a fly. I'll get in and we will go for a little drive. Does that suit you?”

She nodded.

He said: “Good-bye, darling,” and went into the smoking-room.

Old Ehrenberg, Nürnberger and Wilt had sat down at a green card-table to play tarok. Old Eissler and his son were sitting opposite each other in two enormous green leather arm-chairs and were utilising the opportunity to have a good chat with one another after all this time. George took a cigarette out of a box, lighted it and looked at the pictures on the wall with particular interest. He saw Willy’s name written in pale red letters down below in the corner on the green field in a water-colour painted in the grotesque style, that represented a hurdle race ridden by gentlemen in red hunting-coats. He turned involuntarily to the young man and said: “I never knew that one before.”

“It is fairly new,” remarked Willy lightly.

“Smart picture, eh?” said old Eissler.

“Oh, something more than that,” replied George.

“Yes, I hope to be able to look forward to doing something better than that,” said Willy.

“He is going to Africa, lion hunting,” explained old Eissler, “with Prince Wangenheim. Felician is also supposed to be of the party, but he has not yet decided.”

“Why not?” asked Willy.

“He wants to pass his diplomatic examination in the spring.”

“But that could be put off,” said Willy; “lions are dying out, but unfortunately one can’t say the same thing of professors.”

“You play the Mæcenas later on, father Ehrenberg?” said Willy. “As I’ve said, I’ll take you two on.” [A reference to the Faro game]

“Raise you,” replied Ehrenberg, and continued: “If I can order anything for myself, Willy, please paint me a desert landscape showing Prince Wangenheim being gobbled up by the lions... but as realistic as possible.”

“You are making a mistake about the person, Herr Ehrenberg,” said Willy; “the celebrated Anti-Semite you are referring to is the cousin of my Wangenheim.”

“For all I care,” replied Ehrenberg, “the lions, too, may be making a mistake. Every Anti-Semite, you know, isn’t bound to be celebrated.”

“You will ruin the party if you don’t look out,” admonished Nürnberger.

“You should have bought an estate and settled in Palestine,” said Hofrat Wilt.

“God save me from that,” replied Ehrenberg.

“Well, since he has done that in everything up to the present,” said Nürnberger, and put down his hand.

“It seems to me, Nürnberger, that you are reproaching me again for not goin’ about peddlin’ ole clo’.”

“Then you would certainly have the right to complain of Anti-Semitism,” said Nürnberger, “for who feels anything of it in Austria except the peddlars... only they, one might almost say.”

“And some people with a sense of self-respect,” retorted Ehrenberg. “Twenty-seven... thirty-one... thirty-eight.... Well, who’s won the game?”

Willy had gone back into the drawing-room again. George sat smoking on the arm of an easy-chair. He suddenly noticed old Eissler’s look directed towards him in a strange benevolent manner and felt himself reminded of something without knowing what.

“I had a few words the other day,” said the old gentleman, “with your brother Felician at Schönstein’s; it is striking how you resemble your poor father, especially to one like me, who knew your father as a young man."

It flashed across George at once what old Eissler's look reminded him of. Old Doctor Stauber's eyes had rested on him at Rosner's with the same fatherly expression.

"These old Jews!" he thought sarcastically, but in a remote corner of his soul he felt somewhat moved. It came into his mind that his father had often gone for morning walks in the Prater with Eissler, for whose knowledge of art he had had a great respect. Old Eissler went on speaking.

"You, George, take after your mother more, I think."

"Many say so. It is very hard to judge, oneself."

"They say your mother had such a beautiful voice."

"Yes, in her early youth. I myself never really heard her sing. Of course she tried now and again. Two or three years before her death a doctor in Meran even advised her to practise singing. The idea was that it should be a good exercise for her lungs, but unfortunately it wasn't much of a success."

Old Eissler nodded and looked in front of him. "I suppose you probably won't be able to remember that my poor wife was in Meran at the same time as your late mother?"

George racked his memory. It had escaped him.

"I once travelled in the same compartment as your father," said old Eissler, "at night time. We were both unable to sleep. He told me a great deal about you two — you and Felician I mean."

"Really...."

"For instance, that when you were a boy you had played one of your own compositions to some Italian virtuoso, and that he had foretold a great future for you."

"Great future.... Great heavens, but it wasn't a virtuoso, Herr Eissler. It was a clergyman, from whom, as a matter of fact, I learned to play the organ."

Eissler continued: "And in the evening, when your mother had gone to bed, you would often improvise for hours on end in the room."

George nodded and sighed quietly. It seemed as though he had had much more talent at that time. "Work!" he thought ardently, "work!..."

He looked up again. "Yes," he said humorously, "that is always the trouble, infant prodigies so seldom come to anything."

"I hear you want to be a conductor, Baron."

"Yes," replied George resolutely, "I am going to Germany next autumn. Perhaps as an accompanist first in the municipal theatre of some little town, just as it comes along."

"But you would not have any objection to a Court theatre?"

"Of course not. What makes you say that, Herr Eissler? if it is not a rude question."

"I know quite well," said Eissler with a smile, as he dropped his monocle, "that you have not sought out my help, but I can quite appreciate on the other hand that you would not mind perhaps being able to get on without the intermediaryship of agents and others of that kind.... I don't mean because of the commissions."

George remained cold. "When one has once decided to take up a theatrical career one knows at the same time all that one's bargaining for."

"Do you know Count Malnitz by any chance?" inquired Eissler, quite unconcerned by George's air of worldly wisdom.

"Malnitz! Do you mean Count Eberhard Malnitz, who had a suite performed a few years ago?"

"Yes, I mean him."

"I don't know him personally, and as for the suite...."

With a wave of the hand Eissler dismissed the composer Malnitz. “He has been manager at Detmold since the beginning of this season,” he then said. “That is why I asked you if you knew him. He is a great friend of mine of long standing. He used to live in Vienna. For the last ten or twelve years we have been meeting every year in Carlsbad or Ischl. This year we want to make a little Mediterranean trip at Easter. Will you allow me, my dear Baron, to take an opportunity of mentioning your name to him, and telling him something about your plans to be a conductor?”

George hesitated to answer, and smiled politely.

“Oh please don’t regard my suggestion as officious, my dear Baron. If you don’t wish it, of course I will sit tight.”

“You misunderstand my silence,” replied George amiably, but not without hauteur; “but I really don’t know....”

“I think a little Court theatre like that,” continued Eissler, “is just the right place for you for the beginning. The fact of your belonging to the nobility won’t hurt you at all, not even with my friend Malnitz, however much he likes to play the democrat, or even at times the anarchist... with the exception of bombs, of course; but he is a charming man and really awfully musical.... Even though he isn’t exactly a composer.”

“Well,” replied George, somewhat embarrassed, “if you would have the kindness to speak to him.... I can’t afford to let any chance slip. At any rate, I thank you very much.”

“Not at all, I don’t guarantee success, it is just a chance, like any other.”

Frau Oberberger and Sissy came in, escorted by Demeter.

“What interesting conversation are we interrupting?” said Frau Oberberger. “The experienced platonic lover and the inexperienced rake? One should really have been there.”

“Don’t upset yourself, Katerina,” said Eissler, and his voice had again its deep vibrating ring. “One sometimes talks about other things, such as the future of the human race.”

Sissy put a cigarette between her lips, allowed George to give her a light and sat down in the corner of the green leather sofa. “You are not bothering about me at all to-day,” she began with that English accent of hers which George liked so well. “As though I positively didn’t exist. Yes, that’s what it is. I am really a more constant nature than you are, am I not?”

“You constant, Sissy?”... He pushed an arm-chair quite near to her. They spoke of the past summer and the one that was coming.

“Last year,” said Sissy, “you gave me your word you would come wherever I was, and you didn’t do it. This year you must keep your word.”

“Are you going into the Isle of Wight again?”

“No, I am going into the mountains this time, to the Tyrol or the Salzkammergut. I will let you know soon. Will you come?”

“But you are bound to have a large following anywhere.”

“I won’t trouble about any one except you, George.”

“Even supposing Willy Eissler happens to stay in your vicinity?”

“Oh,” she said, with a wanton smile and put out her cigarette by pressing it violently upon the glass ash-tray.

They went on talking. It was just like one of those conversations they had had so often during the last few years. It began lightly and flippantly, and eventually finished in a blaze of tender lies which were true for just one moment. George was once again fascinated by Sissy.

“I would really prefer to go travelling with you,” he whispered quite near her.

She just nodded. Her left arm rested on the broad back of the ottoman. “If one could only do as one wanted,” she said, with a look that dreamt of a hundred men.

He bent down over her trembling arm, went on speaking and became intoxicated with his own words. “Somewhere where nobody knows us, where nobody bothers about any one, that is where I should like to be with you, Sissy, many days and nights.”

Sissy shuddered. The word “nights” made her shudder with fear.

Anna appeared in the doorway, signalled to George with a look and then disappeared again. He felt an inward sense of reluctance, and yet he felt that this was just the psychological moment to leave Sissy.

In the doorway of the drawing-room he met Heinrich, who accosted him. “If you are going you might tell me, I should like to speak to you.”

“Delighted! But I must... promised to see Fräulein Rosner home, you see. I’ll come straight to the café, so till then....”

A few minutes later he was standing on the Schwarzenberg bridge. The sky was full of stars, the streets stretched out wide and silent. George turned up his coat collar, although it was no longer cold, and walked up and down. Will anything come of the Detmold business? he thought. Oh well, if it is not in Detmold it will be in some town or other. At any rate I mean real business now, and a great deal, a great deal will then lie behind me.

He tried to consider the matter quietly. How will it all turn out? We are now at the end of December. We must go away in March — at the latest. We shall be taken for a honeymoon couple. I shall go walking with her arm-in-arm in Rome and Posilippo, in Venice.... There are women who grow very ugly in that condition... but not she, no, not she.... There was always a certain touch of the mother in her appearance.... She must stay the summer in some quiet neighbourhood where no one knows her... in the Thuringian Forest perhaps, or by the Rhine.... How strangely she said that to-day. The house in which the child will come into the world is already in existence. Yes.... Somewhere in the distance, or perhaps quite near here, that house is standing.... And people are living there whom we have never seen. How strange.... When will it come into the world? At the end of the summer, about the beginning of September. By that time, too, I am bound to have gone away. How shall I manage it?... And a year from to-day the little creature will be already four months old. It will grow up... become big. There will be a young man there one fine day, my son, or a young girl; a beautiful little girl of seven, my daughter.... I shall be forty-four then.... When I am sixty-four I can be a grandfather... perhaps a director of an opera or two and a celebrated composer in spite of Else’s prophecies; but one has got to work for that, that is quite true. More than I have done so far. Else is right, I let myself go too much, I must be different... I shall too. I feel a change taking place within me. Yes, something new is taking place within me also.

A fly came out of the Heugasse, some one bent out of the window. George recognised Anna’s face under the white shawl. He was very glad, got in and kissed her hand. They enjoyed their talk, joked a little about the party from which she had just come and found it really ridiculous to spend an evening in so inept a fashion. He held her hands in his and was affected by her presence. He got out in front of her house and rung. He then came to the open door of the carriage and they arranged an appointment for the following day.

“I think we have got a lot to talk about,” said Anna.

He simply nodded. The door of the house was open. She got out of the fly, gave George a long look full of emotion and disappeared into the hall.

My love! thought George, with a feeling of happiness and pride. Life lay before him like something serious and mysterious, full of gifts and full of miracles.

When he went into the café, Heinrich was sitting in a window niche. Next to him was a pale young beardless man whom George had casually spoken to several times, in a dinner-jacket with a velvet collar but with a shirt-front of doubtful cleanliness.

When George came in the young man looked up with ardent eyes from a paper that he was holding in his restless and not very well-kept hands.

"Am I disturbing you?" said George.

"Oh, not a bit of it," replied the young man, with a crazy laugh, "the larger the audience the better."

"Herr Winternitz," explained Heinrich, as he shook hands with George, "was just reading me a series of his poems, but we will break off now." Slightly touched by the disappointed expression of the young man George assured him that he would be delighted to hear the poems if he might be permitted to do so.

"It won't last much longer," explained Winternitz gratefully. "It is only a pity that you missed the beginning. I could — —"

"What! Does it all hang together?" said Heinrich in astonishment.

"What, didn't you notice?" exclaimed Winternitz, and laughed again crazily.

"I see," said Heinrich. "So it's always the same woman character whom your poems deal with. I thought it was always a different one."

"Of course it is always the same one, but her special characteristic is that she always seems to be a fresh person."

Herr Winternitz read softly but insistently, as though inwardly consumed. It appeared from his series that he had been loved as never a man had been loved before, but also deceived as never a man had been deceived before, a circumstance which was to be attributed to certain metaphysical causes and not at all to any deficiencies in his own personality. He showed himself, however, in his last poem completely freed of his passion, and declared that he was now ready to enjoy all the pleasures, which the world could offer him. This poem had four stanzas; the last verse of every stanza began with a "hei," and it concluded with the exclamation: "Hei, so career I through the world."

George could not help recognising that the recitation had to a certain extent impressed him, and when Winternitz put the book down and looked around him with dilated pupils, George nodded appreciatively and said: "Very beautiful!"

Winternitz looked expectantly at Heinrich, who was silent for a few seconds and finally remarked: "It is fairly interesting on the whole... but why do you say 'hei,' if it isn't a rude question? Positively, no one will believe it."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Winternitz.

"Rather ask your own conscience, if you honestly mean that 'hei.' I believe all the rest which you read to me, I mean I believe it in the highest sense of the term, although not a single word is true. I believe you when you tell me that you have been seducing a girl of fifteen, that you have been behaving like a hardened Don Juan, that you have been corrupting the poor creature in the most dreadful way. That she deceived you with... what was it now?..."

"A clown, of course," exclaimed Winternitz, with a mad laugh.

"That a clown was the man she deceived you with, that on account of that creature you had adventures which grew more and more sinister, that you wanted to kill your mistress and yourself as well, and that finally you get fed up with the whole business and go travelling about the world, or even careering as far as Australia for all I care: yes, I can believe all that, but that you are the kind of man to cry out 'hei,' that, my dear Winternitz, is a rank swindle."

Winternitz defended himself. He swore that this ‘hei’ had come from his most inward being, or at any rate from a certain element in his most inward being. When Heinrich made further objections, he gradually became more and more reserved, and finally declared that some time or other he hoped to win his way to that inward freedom where he would be allowed to cry out “hei.”

“That time will never come,” replied Heinrich positively. “You may perhaps get some time to the epic or the dramatic ‘hei,’ but the lyrical or subjective ‘hei’ will remain, my dear Winternitz, a closed book to people like you and me for all eternity.”

Winternitz promised to alter the last poem, to make a point of continuing his development and to work at his inward purification.

He stood up, a proceeding which caused his starched shirt front to crack and a stud to break, held out his somewhat clammy hand to Heinrich and George, and went off to the literary men’s table at the back.

George expressed discreet appreciation of the poems which he had heard.

“I like him the best of the whole set, at any rate personally,” said Heinrich. “He at least has the good sense to maintain with me a certain mutual reserve in really intimate matters. Yes, you need not look at me again as though you were catching me in an attack of megalomania, but I can assure you, George, I have had nearly enough of the sort of people” (he swept the further table with a cursory glance) “who have always got an ‘ä soi’ on their lips.”

“What is always on their lips?”

Heinrich smiled. “You must know the story of the Polish Jew who was sitting in a railway compartment with an unknown man and behaved very conventionally — until he realised by some remark of the other’s that he was a Jew too, and on the strength of it immediately proceeded to stretch out his legs on the seat opposite with an ‘ä soi’ of relief.”

“Quite good,” said George.

“It is more than that,” explained Heinrich sternly, “it is deep; like so many other Jewish stories it gives a bird’s-eye view into the tragi-comedy of present-day Judaism. It expresses the eternal truth that no Jew has any real respect for his fellow Jew, never. As little as prisoners in a hostile country have any real respect for each other, particularly when they are hopeless. Envy, hate, yes frequently, admiration, even love; all that there can be between them, but never respect, for the play of all their emotional life takes place in an atmosphere of familiarity, so to speak, in which respect cannot help being stifled.”

“Do you know what I think?” remarked George. “That you are a more bitter Anti-Semite than most of the Christians I know.”

“Do you think so?” he laughed; “but not a real one. Only the man who is really angry at the bottom of his heart at the Jews’ good qualities and does everything he can to bring about the further development of their bad ones is a real Anti-Semite. But you are right up to a certain point, but I must finish by confessing that I am also an Anti-Aryan. Every race as such is naturally repulsive, only the individual manages at times to reconcile himself to the repulsive elements in his race by reason of his own personal qualities. But I will not deny that I am particularly sensitive to the faults of Jews. Probably the only reason is that I, like all others — we Jews, I mean — have been systematically educated up to this sensitiveness. We have been egged on from our youth to look upon Jewish peculiarities as particularly grotesque or repulsive, though we have not been so with regard to the equally grotesque and repulsive peculiarities of other people. I will not disguise it — if a Jew shows bad form in my presence, or behaves in a ridiculous manner, I have often so painful a sensation that I should like to sink into the earth. It is like a kind of shame that perhaps is akin to the shame of a brother who sees his sister undressing. Perhaps the whole thing is egoism too. One gets embittered at being always made responsible for other people's faults, and always being made to pay the penalty for every crime, for every lapse from good taste, for every indiscretion for which every Jew is responsible throughout the whole world. That of course easily makes one unjust, but those are touches of nervousness and sensitiveness, nothing more. Then one pulls oneself together again. That cannot be called Anti-Semitism. But there are Jews whom I really hate, hate as Jews. Those are the people who act before others, and often before themselves, as though they did not belong to the rest at all. The men who try to offer themselves to their enemies and despisers in the most cowardly and cringing fashion, and think that in that way they can escape from the eternal curse whose burden is upon them, or from what they feel is equivalent to a curse. There are of course always Jews like that who go about with the consciousness of their extreme personal meanness, and consequently, consciously or unconsciously, would like to make their race responsible. Of course that does not help them the least bit. What has ever helped the Jews? the good ones and the bad ones. I mean, of course," he hastily added, "those who need something in the way of material or moral help." And then he broke off in a deliberately flippant tone: "Yes, my dear George, the situation is somewhat complicated and it is quite natural that every one who is not directly concerned with the question should not be able to understand it properly."

"No, you really should not...."

Heinrich interrupted him quickly. "Yes, I should, my dear George, that is just how it is. You don't understand us, you see. Many perhaps get an inkling, but understand? no. At any rate we understand you much better than you do us. Although you shake your head! Do we not deserve to? We have found it more necessary, you see, to learn to understand you than you did to learn to understand us. This gift of understanding was forced to develop itself in the course of time... according to the laws of the struggle for existence if you like. Just consider, if one is going to find one's way about in a foreign country, or, as I said before, in an enemy's country, to be ready for all the dangers and ambushes which lurk there, it is obvious that the primary essential is to get to know one's enemies as well as possible — both their good qualities and their bad."

"So you live among enemies? Among foreigners! You would not admit as much to Leo Golowski. I don't agree with him either, not a bit of it. But how strangely inconsistent you are when you — —"

Heinrich interrupted him, genuinely pained. "I have already told you the problem is far too complicated to be really solved. To find a subjective solution is almost impossible. A verbal solution even more so. Why, at times one might believe that things are not so bad. Sometimes one really is at home in spite of everything, feels one is as much at home here — yes, even more at home — than any of your so-called natives can ever feel. It is quite clear that the feeling of strangeness is to some extent cured by the consciousness of understanding. Why, it becomes, as it were, steeped in pride, condescension, tenderness; becomes dissolved — sometimes, of course, in sentimentalism, which is again a bad business."

He sat there with deep furrows in his forehead and looked in front of him.

"Does he really understand me better?" thought George, "than I do him, or is it simply another piece of megalomania...?"

Heinrich suddenly started as though emerging from a dream. He looked at his watch. "Half-past two! And my train goes at eight to-morrow."

"What, you are going away?"

"Yes, that is what I wanted to speak to you about so much. I shall have to say goodbye to you for a goodish time, I'm sorry to say. I am going to Prague. I am taking my father away, out of the asylum home to our own house."

“Is he better, then?”

“No, but he is in that stage when he is not dangerous to those near him.... Yes, that came quite quickly too.”

“And about when do you think you will be back?”

Heinrich shook his shoulders. “I can’t tell to-day, but however the thing develops, I certainly cannot leave my mother and sisters alone now.”

George felt a genuine regret at being deprived of Heinrich’s society in the near future. “It’s possible that you won’t find me in Vienna again when you come back. I shall probably go away this spring, you see.” And he almost felt a desire to take Heinrich into his confidence.

“I suppose you are travelling south?” asked Heinrich.

“Yes, I think so. To enjoy my freedom once again, just for a few months. Serious life begins next autumn, you see. I am looking out for a position in Germany at some theatre or other.”

“Really?”

The waiter came to the table. They paid and went.

They met Rapp and Gleissner together in the doorway. They exchanged a few words of greeting.

“And what have you been doing all this time, Herr Rapp?” asked George courteously.

Rapp took off his pince-nez. “Oh, my melancholy old job all the time. I am engaged in demonstrating the vanity of vanities.”

“You might make a change, Rapp,” said Heinrich. “Try your luck for once and praise the splendour of splendours.”

“What is the point?” said Rapp, and put on his glasses.

“That will prove itself in the course of time. But as a rule rotten work only keeps alive during its good fortune and its fame, and when the world at last realises the swindle, it has either been in the grave for a long time or has taken refuge in its presumable immortality.”

They were now in the street and all turned up their coat collars, since it had begun again to snow violently.

Gleissner, who had had his first great dramatic success a few weeks ago, quickly told them that the seventh performance of his work, which had taken place to-day, had also been sold out.

Rapp used that as a peg on which to hang malicious observations on the stupidity of the public. Gleissner answered with gibes at the impotence of the critic when confronted with true genius — and so they walked away through the snow with turned-up collar, quite enveloped in the steaming hate of their old friendship.

“That Rapp has no luck,” said Heinrich to George. “He’ll never forgive Gleissner for not disappointing him.”

“Do you consider him so jealous?”

“I wouldn’t go as far as that. Matters are rarely sufficiently simple to be disposed of in a single word. But just think what a fate it is to go about the world in the belief that you carry with you as deep a knowledge of it as Shakespeare had, and to feel at the same time that you aren’t able to express as much of it as, for instance, Herr Gleissner, although perhaps one is quite as much good as he is — or even more.”

They walked on together for a time in silence. The trees in the Ring were standing motionless with their white branches. It struck three from the tower of the Rathaus. They walked over the empty streets and took the way through the silent park. All around them the continuous fall of snow made everything shine almost brightly.

“By the way, I have not told you the latest news,” started Heinrich suddenly, looking in front of him and speaking in a dry tone.

“What is it?”

“That I have been receiving anonymous letters for some time.”

“Anonymous letters? What are the contents?”

“Oh, you can guess.”

“I see.” It was clear to George that it could only be something about the actress. Heinrich had returned in greater anguish than ever from the foreign town, where he had seen his mistress act the part of a depraved creature in a new play, with a truth and realism which he found positively intolerable. George knew that he and she had since then been exchanging letters full of tenderness and scorn, full of anger and forgiveness, full of broken anguish and laboured confidence.

“The delightful messages,” explained Heinrich, “have been coming along every morning for eight days. Not very pleasant, I can assure you.”

“Good gracious, what do they matter to you? You know yourself anonymous letters never contain the truth.”

“On the contrary, my dear George, they always do, but letters like that always contain a kind of higher truth, the great truth of possibilities. Men haven’t usually got sufficient imagination to create things out of nothing.”

“That is a charming way of looking at things. Where should we all get to, then? It makes things a bit too easy for libellers of all kinds.”

“Why do you say libellers? I regard it as highly improbable that there are any libels contained in the anonymous letters which I have been receiving. No doubt exaggerations, embellishments, inaccuracies....”

“Lies.”

“No, I am sure they are not lies; some, no doubt, but in a case like this how is one to separate the truth from the lies?”

“There is a very simple way of dealing with that. You go there.”

“Me go there?”

“Yes, of course that is what you ought to do. When you are on the spot you are bound to get at once to the real truth.”

“It would certainly be possible.”

They were walking under arcades on the wet stone. Their voices and steps echoed. George began again. “Instead of going on being demoralised with all this annoyance, I should try and convince myself personally as to how matters stood.”

“Yes, that would certainly be the soundest thing to do.”

“Well, why don’t you do it?”

Heinrich remained stationary and jerked out with clenched teeth: “Tell me, my dear George, have you not really noticed that I am a coward?”

“Nonsense, one doesn’t call that being a coward.”

“Call it whatever you like. Words never hit things off exactly. The more precisely they pretend to do so the less they really do. I know what I am. I would not go there for anything in the world. To make a fool of myself once more, no, no, no....”

“Well, what will you do?”

Heinrich shook his shoulders as though the matter really did not concern him.

Somewhat irritated, George went on questioning him. “If you will allow me to make a remark, what does the... lady chiefly concerned have to say?”

“The lady who is chiefly concerned, as you call her, with a wit, which though unconscious is positively infernal, does not know for the time being anything about my getting anonymous letters.”

“What an idea! We write daily to each other as we did before. She the most tender and lying letters, I the meanest you can possibly imagine — disingenuous, reserved letters, that torture me to the quick.”

Heinrich laughed out loud. “No, I am not noble. I clearly was not born to be that.”

“And when one thinks that after all these are sheer libels — —” George for his part had of course no doubt that the anonymous letters contained the truth. In spite of that he was honestly desirous that Heinrich should travel to the actual spot, convince himself, do something definite, box somebody’s ears or shoot somebody down. He imagined Felician in a similar position, or Stanzides or Willy Eissler. All of them would have taken it better or in a different way, one for which he certainly could have felt more sympathy. Suddenly the question ran through his brain as to what he would probably do, if Anna were to deceive him. Anna deceive him... was that really possible? He thought of her look that evening, that dark questioning look which she had sent over to Demeter Stanzides. No, that did not signify anything, he was sure of it, and the old episodes with Leo and the singing-master, they were harmless, almost childish. But he thought of something that was different and perhaps more significant — a strange question which she had put to him the other day when she had stayed unduly late in his company and had had to hurry off home with an excuse. Was he not afraid, she had asked him, to have it on his conscience that he was making her into a liar? It had rung half like a reproach and half like a warning, and if she herself was so little sure of herself could he trust her implicitly? Did he not love her? He... and did he not deceive her in spite of it, or was ready to do so at any moment, which, after all, came to the same thing?

Only an hour ago, in the fly, when he held her in his arms and kissed her, she had of course no idea that he had other thoughts than for her. And yet at a certain moment, with his lips on hers, he had longed for Sissy. Why should it not happen that Anna should deceive him? After all, it might have already happened... without his having an idea of it.... But all these ideas had as it were no substance, they swept through his mind, like fantastic almost amusing possibilities. He was standing with Heinrich in front of the closed door in the Floriani Gassi and shook hands with him.

“Well, God bless you,” he said; “when we see each other again I hope you will be cured of your doubts.”

“And would that be much good?” asked Heinrich. “Can one reassure oneself with certainties in matters of love? The most one can do is to reassure oneself with bad news, for that lasts, but being certain of something good is at the best an intoxication.... Well, goodbye, old chap. I hope we will see each other again in May. Then, whatever happens, I shall come here for a time, and we can talk again about our glorious opera.”

“Yes, if I shall be back again in Vienna in May. It may be that I shall not come back before the autumn.”

“And then go off again on your new career?”

“It is quite possible that it will turn out like that,” and he looked Heinrich in the face with a kind of childlike defiant smile that seemed to say: “I’m not going to tell you.”

Heinrich seemed surprised. “Look here, George, perhaps this is the very last time we are standing together in front of this door. Oh, I am far from thrusting myself into your confidence. This somewhat one-sided relationship will no doubt have to go on on its present lines. Well, it doesn’t matter.”

George looked straight in front of him.

“I hope things go all right,” said Heinrich as the door opened, “and drop me a line now and then.”

“Certainly,” answered George, and suddenly saw Heinrich’s eyes resting upon him with an expression of real sympathy which he had never expected. “Certainly... and you must write to me, too. At any rate give me news of how things are at home and what you are working at. At all events,” he added sincerely, “we must continue to keep in touch with each other.”

The porter stood there with dishevelled hair and an angry sleepy expression, in a greenish-brown dressing-gown, with slippers on his bare feet.

Heinrich shook hands with George for the last time. “Goodbye, my dear friend,” he said, and then in a gentler voice, as he pointed to the porter: “I cannot keep him waiting any longer. You will find no particular difficulty in reading in his noble physiognomy, which is obviously the genuine native article, the names he is calling me to himself at this particular moment. Adieu.”

George could not help laughing. Heinrich disappeared. The door clanged and closed.

George did not feel the least bit sleepy and determined to go home on foot. He was in an excited exalted mood. He was envisaging the days which were now bound to come with a peculiar sense of tension. He thought of to-morrow’s meeting with Anna, the things they were going to talk over, the journey, the house that already stood somewhere in the world, which his imagination had already roughly pictured like a house out of a box of toys, light-green with a bright red roof and a black chimney. His own form appeared before him like a picture thrown on a white screen by a magic lantern: he saw himself sitting on a balcony in happy solitude, in front of a table strewn with music paper. Branches rocked in front of the railings. A clear sky hung above him, while below at his feet lay the sea, with a dreamy blueness that was quite abnormal.

V

GEORGE GENTLY OPENED the door of Anna's room. She still lay asleep in bed and breathed deeply and peacefully. He went out of the slightly darkened room, back again into his own and shut the door. Then he went to the open window and looked out. Clouds bathed in sunshine were sweeping over the water. The mountains opposite with their clearly-defined lines were floating in the brilliancy of the heavens, while the brightest blue was glittering over the gardens and houses of Lugano.

George was quite delighted to breathe in once more the air of this June morning, which brought to him the moist freshness of the lake and the perfume of the plane-trees, magnolias and roses in the hotel park; to look out upon this view, whose spring-like peace had welcomed him like a fresh happiness every morning for the last three weeks.

He drank his tea quickly, ran down the stairs as quickly and expectantly as he had once, when a boy, hurried off to his play, and took his accustomed way along the bank in the grey fragrance of the early shade. Here he would think of his own lonely morning walks at Palermo and Taormina in the previous spring, walks which he had frequently continued for hours on end, since Grace was very fond of lying in bed with open eyes until noon.

That period of his life, over which a recent though no doubt much-desired farewell seemed to squat like a sinister cloud, usually struck him as more or less bathed in melancholy. But this time all painful things seemed to lie in the far distance, and at any rate he had it in his power to put off the end as long as he wanted, if it did not come from fate itself.

He had left Vienna with Anna at the beginning of March, as it was no longer possible to conceal her condition. In January, in fact, George had decided to speak to her mother. He had more or less prepared himself for it, and was consequently able to make his communication quietly and in well-turned phraseology. The mother listened in silence and her eyes grew large and moist. Anna sat on the sofa with an embarrassed smile and looked at George as he spoke, with a kind of curiosity. They sketched out the plan for the ensuing months. George wanted to stay abroad with Anna until the early summer. Then a house was to be taken in the country in the neighbourhood of Vienna, so that her mother should not be far away in the time of greatest need, and the child could without difficulty be given out to nurse in the neighbourhood of the town. They also thought out an excuse for officious inquisitive people for Anna's departure and absence.

As her voice had made substantial progress of late — which was perfectly true — she had gone off to a celebrated singing mistress in Dresden, to complete her training.

Frau Rosner nodded several times, as though she agreed with everything, but the features of her face became sadder and sadder. It was not so much that she was oppressed by what she had just learnt, as she was by the realisation that she was bound to be so absolutely defenceless, poor middle-class mother that she was, sitting opposite the aristocratic seducer.

George, who noticed this with regret, endeavoured to assume a lighter and more sympathetic tone. He came closer to the good woman, he took her hand and held it for some seconds in his own. Anna had scarcely contributed a word to the whole discussion, but when George got ready to go she got up, and for the first time in front of her mother she offered him her lips to kiss, as though she were now celebrating her betrothal to him.

George went downstairs in better spirits, as though the worst were now really over. Henceforth he spent whole hours at the Rosners' more frequently than before, practising music with Anna, whose voice had now grown noticeably in power and volume. The mother's demeanour to George became more friendly. Why, it often seemed to him as though she had to be on her guard against a growing sympathy for him, and there was one evening in the family circle when George stayed for supper, improvised afterwards to the company from the Meistersingers and Lohengrin with his cigar in his mouth, could not help enjoying the lively applause, particularly from Josef, and was almost shocked to notice as he went home that he had felt quite as comfortable, as though it had been a home he had recently won for himself.

When he was sitting over his black coffee with Felician a few days later the servant brought in a card, the receipt of which made a slight blush mount to his cheek. Felician pretended not to notice his brother's embarrassment, said good-bye and left the room. He met old Rosner in the doorway, inclined his head slightly in answer to his greeting and took no further notice.

George invited Herr Rosner, who came in in his winter coat with his hat and umbrella, to sit down, and offered him a cigar. Old Rosner said: "I have just been smoking," a remark which somehow or other reassured George, and sat down, while George remained leaning on the table.

Then the old man began with his accustomed slowness: "You will probably be able to imagine, Herr Baron, why I have taken the liberty of troubling you. I really wanted to speak to you in the earlier part of the day, but unfortunately I could not get away from the office."

"You would not have found me at home in the morning, Herr Rosner," answered George courteously.

"All the better then that I didn't have my journey for nothing. My wife has told me this morning... what has happened...." He looked at the floor.

"Yes," said George, and gnawed at his upper lip. "I myself intended.... But won't you take off your overcoat? It is very warm in the room."

"No thank you, thank you, it is not at all too warm for me. Well, I was horrified when my wife gave me this information. Indeed I was, Herr Baron.... I never would have thought it of Anna... never thought it possible... it is... really dreadful...." He spoke all the time in his usual monotonous voice, though he shook his head more often than usual.

George could not help looking all the time at his head with its thin yellow-grey hair, and felt nothing but a desolate boredom. "Really, Herr Rosner, the thing is not dreadful," he said at last. "If you knew how much I... and how sincere my affection for Anna is, you would certainly be very far from thinking the thing dreadful. At any rate, I suppose your wife has told you about our plans for the immediate future... or am I making a mistake...?"

"Not at all, Herr Baron, I have been informed of everything this morning. But I must say that I have noticed for some weeks that something was wrong in the house. It often struck me that my wife was very nervous and was often on the point of crying."

"On the point of crying! There is really no occasion for that, Herr Rosner. Anna herself, who is more concerned than any one else, is very well and is in her usual good spirits...."

"Yes, Anna at any rate takes it very well, and that, to speak frankly, is more or less my consolation. But I cannot describe to you, Baron, how hard hit... how, I could almost say... like a bolt from the blue... I could never, no, never have... have believed it...." He could not say any more. His voice trembled.

"I am really very concerned," said George, "that you should take the matter like this, in spite of the fact that your wife is bound to have explained everything to you, and that the measures we have taken for the near future presumably meet with your approval. I would prefer not to talk about a time which is further, though I hope not too far off, because phrases of all kinds are more or less distasteful to me, but you may be sure, Herr Rosner, that I certainly shall not forget what I owe to a person like Anna.... Yes, what I owe to myself." He gulped.

In all his memory there was no moment in his life in which he had felt less sympathy for himself. And now, as is necessarily the case in all pointless conversations, they repeated themselves several times, until Herr Rosner finally apologised for having troubled him, and took his leave of George, who accompanied him to the stairs.

George felt an unpleasant aftermath in his soul for some days after this visit. The brother would be the finishing touch, he thought irritably, and he could not help imagining a scene of explanation in the course of which the young man would endeavour to play the avenger of the family honour, while George put him in his place with extraordinarily trenchant expressions.

George nevertheless felt a sense of relief after the conversation with Anna's parents had taken place, and the hours which he spent with his beloved alone in the peaceful room opposite the church were full of a peculiar feeling of comfort and safety. It sometimes seemed to them both as though time stood still.

It was all very well for George to bring guide-books, Burckhardt's Cicerone, and even maps to their meetings, and to plan out with Anna all kinds of routes; he did not as a matter of fact seriously think that all this would ever be realised.

So far, however, as the house in which the child was to be born was concerned, they were both impressed with the necessity of its being found and taken before they left Vienna. Anna once saw an advertisement in the paper which she was accustomed to read carefully for that very object, of a lodge near the forest, and not far from a railway station, which could be reached in one and a half hours from Vienna. One morning they both took the train to the place in question and they had a memory of a snow-covered lonely wooden building with antlers over the door, an old drunken keeper, a young blonde girl, a swift sleigh-ride over a snowy winter street, an extraordinarily jolly dinner in an enormous room in the inn, and then home in a badly-lighted over-heated compartment. This was the only time that George tried to find with Anna the house that must be standing somewhere in the world and waiting to be decided upon. Otherwise he usually went alone by train or tramway to look round the summer resorts which were near Vienna. Once, on a spring day that had come straight into the middle of the winter, George was walking through one of the small places situated quite near town, which he was particularly fond of, where village buildings, unassuming villas and elegant country houses lay close upon each other. He had completely forgotten, as often happened, why he had taken the journey, and was thinking with emotion of the fact that Beethoven and Schubert had taken the same walk as he, many years ago, when he unexpectedly ran up against Nürnberger. They greeted each other, praised the fine day, which had enticed them so far out into the open, and expressed regret that they so rarely saw each other since Bermann had left Vienna.

"Is it long since you heard anything of him?" asked George.

"I have only had a card from him," replied Nürnberger, "since he left. It is much more likely he would correspond regularly with you than with me."

"Why is it more likely?" inquired George, somewhat irritated by Nürnberger's tone, as indeed be frequently was.

"Well, at any rate you have the advantage over me of being a new acquaintance, and consequently offering more exciting subject-matter for his psychological interest than I can."

George detected in the accustomed flippancy of these words a certain sense of grievance which he more or less understood, for, as a matter of fact, Heinrich had bothered very little about Nürnberger of late, though he had previously seen a great deal of him, it being always his way to draw men to him and then drop them with the greatest lack of consideration, according as their character did or did not fit in with his own mood.

"In spite of that I am not much better off than you," said George. "I haven't had any news of him for some weeks either. His father, too, appears to be in a bad way according to the last letter."

"So I suppose it will soon be all up with the poor old man now."

"Who knows? According to what Bermann writes me, he can still last for months."

Nürnberger shook his head seriously.

"Yes," said George lightly. "The doctors ought to be allowed in cases like that... to shorten the matter."

"You are perhaps right," answered Nürnberger, "but who knows whether our friend Heinrich, however much the sight of his father's incurable malady may put him off his work and perhaps many other things as well — who knows whether he might not all the same refuse the suggestion of finishing off this hopeless matter by a morphia injection?"

George felt again repulsed by Nürnberger's bitter, ironic tone, and yet when he remembered the hour when he had seen Heinrich more violently upset by a few obscure words in the letter of a mistress than by his father's madness, he could not drive out the impression that Nürnberger's opinion of their friend was correct. "Did you know old Bermann?" he asked.

"Not personally, but I still remember the time when his name was known in the papers, and I remember, too, many extremely sound and excellent speeches which he made in Parliament. But I am keeping you, my dear Baron. Goodbye. We will see each other no doubt one of these days in the café, or at Ehrenbergs'."

"You are not keeping me at all," replied George with deliberate courtesy. "I am quite at large, and I am availing myself of the opportunity of looking at houses for the summer."

"So you are going in the country, near Vienna this year?"

"Yes, for a time probably, and apart from that a family I know has asked me if I should chance to run across...." He grew a little red, as he always did when he was not adhering strictly to the truth. Nürnberger noticed it and said innocently: "I have just passed by some villas which are to let. Do you see, for instance, that white one with the white terrace?"

"It looks very nice. We might have a look at it, if you won't find it too dull coming with me. Then we can go back together to town."

The garden which they entered sloped upwards and was very long and narrow. It reminded Nürnberger of one in which he had played as a child. "Perhaps it is the same," he said. "We lived for years and years you know in the country in Grinzing or Heiligenstadt."

This "we" affected George in quite a strange way. He could scarcely realise Nürnberger's ever having been quite young, ever having lived as a son with his father and mother, as a brother with his sisters, and he felt all of a sudden that this man's whole life had something strange and hard about it.

At the top of the garden an open arbour gave a wonderfully fine view of the town, which they enjoyed for some time. They slowly went down, accompanied by the caretaker's wife, who carried a small child wrapped in a grey shawl in her arms. They then looked at the house — low musty rooms with cheap battered carpets on the floor, narrow wooden beds, dull or broken mirrors.

"Everything will be done up again in the spring," explained the caretaker, "then it will look very cheerful." The little child suddenly held out its tiny hand towards George, as if it wanted him to take it up in his arms. George was somewhat moved and smiled awkwardly.

As he rode with Nürnberger into the town on the platform of the tramway and chatted to him he felt that he had never got so close to him on all the many previous occasions when they had been together, as during this hour of clear winter sunshine in the country. When they said goodbye it was quite a matter of course that they should arrange a new excursion on a day in the immediate future. And so it came about that George was several times accompanied by Nürnberger, when he continued his househunting in the neighbourhood of Vienna. On these occasions the fiction was still kept up that George was looking for a house for a family whom he knew, that Nürnberger believed it and that George believed that Nürnberger believed it.

On these excursions Nürnberger frequently came to speak of his youth, to speak about the parents whom he had lost very early, of a sister who had died young and of his elder brother, the only one of his relatives who was still alive. But he, an ageing bachelor like Edmund himself, did not live in Vienna, but in a small town in Lower Austria, where he was a teacher in a public school, where he had been transferred fifteen years ago as an assistant. He could easily have managed afterwards to have got an appointment again in the metropolis, but after a few years of bitterness, and even defiance, he had become so completely acclimatised to the quiet petty life of the place where he was staying that he came to regard a return to Vienna as more a sacrifice than anything else, and he now lived on, passionately devoted to his profession and particularly to his studies in philology, far from the world, lonely, contented, a kind of philosopher in the little town. When Nürnberger spoke of this distant brother George often felt as though he were hearing him speak about some one who had died, so absolutely out of the question seemed every possibility of a permanent reunion in the future. It was in quite a different tone, almost as though he were speaking of a being who could return once again, that he would talk with a perpetual wistfulness of the sister who had been dead several years. It was on a misty February day, while they were at the railway station waiting for the train to Vienna, and walking up and down with each other on the platform, that Nürnberger told George the story of this sister, who when a child of sixteen had become possessed as it were by a tremendous passion for the theatre, and had run away from home without saying goodbye in a fit of childish romanticism. She had wandered from town to town, from stage to stage, for ten years, playing smaller and smaller parts, since neither her talent nor her beauty appeared to be sufficient for the career which she had chosen, but always with the same enthusiasm, always with the same confidence in her future, in spite of the disillusions which she experienced and the sorrow which she saw. In the holidays she would come to the brothers, who were still living together, sometimes for weeks, sometimes only for days, and tell them about the provincial halls in which she had acted as though they were great theatres; about her few successes as though they were triumphs which she had won, about the wretched comedians at whose side she worked as though they were great artists, tell them about the petty intrigues that took place around her as though they were powerful tragedies of passion. And instead of gradually realising the miserable world in which she was living a life which was as much to be pitied as that of any one else, she spun every year the essence of her soul into more and more golden dreams. This went on for a long time, until at last she came home, feverish and ill. She lay in bed for months on end with flushed cheeks, raving in her delirium of a fame and happiness which she had never experienced, got up once again in apparent health, and went away once more, only to come back home, this time after a few weeks, in complete collapse with death written on her forehead. Her brother now travelled with her to the South; to Arco, Meran, to the Italian Lakes, and it was only as she lay stretched out in southern gardens beneath flowering trees, far away from the whirl that had dazed and intoxicated her throughout the years that she realised at last that her life had been simply a racketing about beneath a painted sky and between paper walls — that the whole essence of her existence had been an illusion. But even the little everyday incidents, the apartments and inns of the foreign town, seemed to her memory simply scenes which she had played in as an actress by the footlights, and not scenes which she had really lived, and as she approached nearer and nearer to the grave, there awoke within her an awful yearning for that real life which she had missed, and the more surely she knew that it was lost to her for ever, the clearer became the gaze with which she realised the fullness of the world. And the strangest touch of all was the way in which, in the last weeks of her life, that talent to which she had sacrificed her whole existence without ever really possessing it manifested itself with diabolic uncanniness.

"It seems to me, even to-day," said Nürnberger, "that I have never heard verses so declaimed, never seen whole scenes so acted, even by the greatest actress, as I did by my sister in the hotel room at Cadenabbia, looking out on to the Lake of Como, a few days before she died. Of course," he added, "it is possible, even probable, that my memory is deceiving me."

"But why?" asked George, who was so pleased with this finale that he did not want to have it spoiled. And he endeavoured to convince Nürnberger, who listened to him with a smile, that he could not have made a mistake, and that the world had lost a great actress in that strange girl who lay buried in Cadenabbia.

George did not find on his excursions with Nürnberger the house in the country for which he was looking. In fact it seemed to become more difficult to find every time he went out. Nürnberger made occasional jokes about George's exacting requirements. He seemed to be looking for a villa which was to be faced in front by a well-kept road, while it was to have at the back a garden door which led into the natural forest. Eventually George himself did not seriously believe that he would now succeed in finding the desired house, and relied on the pressure of necessity after his return from his travels.

It seemed more essential to get as soon as possible into touch with a doctor, but George put this off too from one day to another. But one evening Anna informed him that she had been suddenly panic-stricken by a new attack of faintness, had visited Doctor Stauber and explained her condition to him. He had been very nice, had not expressed any astonishment, had thoroughly reassured her and only expressed the wish to speak to George before they went away.

A few days afterwards George went to see the doctor in accordance with his invitation.

The consultation hours were over. Doctor Stauber received him with the friendliness which he had anticipated, seemed to treat the whole matter as being as regular and as much a matter of course as it could possibly be, and spoke of Anna just as though she had been a young wife, a method of procedure which affected George in a strange but not unpleasant way.

When the practical discussion was over the doctor inquired about the destination of their journey. George had not yet mapped out any programme, only this much was decided, that the spring was to be spent in the south, probably in Italy. Doctor Stauber took the opportunity to talk about his last stay in Rome, which was ten years back. He had been in personal touch on this occasion, as he had been once before, with the director of the excavations and spoke to George in almost ecstatic terms of the latest discoveries on the Palatine, about which he had written monographs as a young man, which he had published in the antiquarian journals. He then showed George, and not without pride, his library, which was divided into two sections, medicine and the history of art, and took out and offered to lend him a few rare books, one printed in the year 1834 on the Vatican collections and also a history of Sicily. George felt highly excited as he realised with such vividness the rich days that lay in front of him. He was overcome by a kind of homesickness for places which he knew well and had missed for a long time. Half-forgotten pictures floated up in his memory, the pyramids of Cestius stood on the horizon in sharp outlines, as they had appeared to him when he had ridden back as a boy into the town at evening with the prince of Macedon; the dim church, where he had seen his first mistress step up to the altar as a bride, opened its doors; a bark under a dark sky with strange sulphur yellow sails drew near to the coast.... He began to speak about the several towns and landscapes of the south which he had seen as a boy and as a youth, explained the longing for those places which often seized on him like a genuine homesickness, his joy at being able to take in with mature appreciation all the differing things which he had longed for, reserved for himself and then forgotten, and many new things besides, and this time too in the society of a being who was able to appreciate and enjoy everything with him, and whom he held dear.

Doctor Stauber, who was in the act of putting a book back on the shelf, turned round suddenly to George, looked gently at him and said: "I am very glad of that." As George answered his look with some surprise he added: "It was the first tender allusion to your relationship to Annerl that I have noticed in the course of the last hour. I know, I know that you are not the kind of man to take a comparative stranger into your confidence, but if only because I had no reason to expect it, it has really done me good. It came straight from your heart, one could see it; and I should have been really sorry for Annerl — excuse me, I always call her that — if I had been driven to think that you are not as fond of her as she deserves."

"I really don't know," replied George coolly, "what gave you cause to doubt it, doctor."

"Did I say anything about doubts?" replied Stauber good-humouredly. "But, after all, it has happened before that a young man who has had all kinds of experiences does not appreciate a sacrifice of this kind sufficiently, for it still is a sacrifice, my dear Baron. We can be as superior to all prejudices as much as we like — but it is not a trifle even to-day for a young girl of good family to make up her mind to do a thing like that, and I won't conceal it from you — of course I did not let Annerl notice anything — it gave even me a slight shock when she came to me the other day and told me all about it."

"Excuse me, Herr Doctor," replied George, irritated but yet polite, "if it gave you a shock that is surely some proof against your being superior to prejudices...."

"You are right," said Stauber with a smile, "but perhaps you will overlook this lapse when you consider that I am somewhat older than you and belong to another age. Even a more or less independent man... which I flatter myself I am... cannot quite escape from the influence of his age. It is a strange thing, but believe me, even among the young people, who have grown up on Nietzsche and Ibsen, there are quite as many Philistines as there were thirty years ago. They won't own up to it, but it does go against the grain with them, for instance, if some one goes and seduces their sister, or if one of their worthy wives suddenly takes it into her head that she wants to live her own life.... Many, of course, are consistent and carry their pose through... but that is more a matter of self-control than of their real views, and in the old days, you know, the age to which I belong, when ideas were so immovably hide-bound, when every one for instance was quite sure of things like this: one has to honour one's parents or else one is a knave... or... one only loves really once in one's life... or it's a pleasure to die for one's fatherland... in that time, mind you, when every decent man held up some flag or other, or at any rate had something written on his banner... believe me, the so-called modern ideas had more adherents than you suspect. The only thing was that those adherents did not quite know it themselves, they did not trust their own ideas, they thought themselves, as it were, debauchees or even criminals. Shall I tell you something, Herr Baron? There are really no new ideas at all. People feel with a new intensity — that's what it is. But do you seriously think that Nietzsche discovered the superman, Ibsen the fraud of life and Anzengruber the truth that the parents who desire love and honour from their children ought to 'come up to the scratch' themselves? Not a bit of it. All the ethical ideas have always been there, and one would really be surprised if one knew what absolute blockheads have thought of the so-called great new truths, and have even frequently given them expression long before the geniuses to whom we owe these truths, or rather the courage to regard these truths as true. If I have gone rather too far forgive me. I really only wanted to say... and you will believe me, I am sure.... I know as well as you, Baron, that there is many a virgin girl who is a thousand times more corrupt than a so-called fallen woman; and that there is many a young man who passes for respectable who has worse things on his conscience than starting a liaison with an innocent girl. And yet... it is just the curse of my period..." he interpolated with a smile, "I could not help it, the first moment Annerl told me her story certain unpleasant words which in their day had their own fixed meaning began to echo through my old head in their old tones, silly out-of-date words like... libertine... seduction... leaving in the lurch... and so on, and that is why I must ask you once more to forgive me, now that I have got to know you somewhat more intimately... that is why I felt that shock which a modern man would certainly not own that he experienced. But to talk seriously once again, just consider a minute how your poor father, who did not know Anna, would have taken the matter. He was certainly one of the shrewdest and most unprejudiced men whom one can imagine... and all the same you have not the slightest doubt that the matter would not have passed off without his feeling something of a shock as well."

George could not help holding out his hand to the doctor. The unexpectedness of this sudden allusion caused so intense a longing to spring up within him that the only thing he could do to assuage it was to begin to talk of him who had passed away. The doctor was able to tell him of many meetings with the late baron, mostly chance casual encounters in the street, at the sessions of the scientific academy, at concerts. There came another of those moments in which George thought himself strangely guilty in his attitude towards the dead man and registered a mental vow to become worthy of his memory.

"Remember me kindly to Annerl," said the doctor as he said goodbye, "but I would rather you did not tell her anything about the shock. She is a very sensitive creature, that you know well enough, and now it is particularly important to save her any excitement. Remember, my dear Baron, there is only one question before us now — to see that a healthy child comes into the world, everything else.... Well, give her my best regards. I hope we shall all see each other again in the summer in the best of health."

George went away with a heightened consciousness of his responsibilities towards the being who had given herself to him and to that other who would wake up to existence in a few months. He thought first of making a will and leaving it behind with a lawyer. But on further consideration he thought it more proper to confide in his brother, who after all stood nearer to him in sentiment than any one else. But with that peculiar embarrassment which was characteristic of the really intimate relationship between the brothers he let day after day go by, until at last Felician's departure on the hunting expedition in Africa was quite imminent.

The night before, on the way home from the club, George informed his brother that he was thinking of taking a long journey in the near future.

"Really! For how long shall you be away?" asked Felician.

George caught the note of a certain anxiety in these words and felt that it was incumbent on him to add: "It will probably be the last long journey I shall take for some years. I hope to find myself in a permanent position in the autumn."

"So you have quite made up your mind?"

"Yes, of course."

"I am very glad, George, for different reasons, as you can imagine, that you want at last to do something serious. And besides, it's a very sound thing, that it is not a case of one of us going out into the world while the other remains at home alone. That would really have been rather sad."

George knew quite well that Felician would get a foreign diplomatic post in the following autumn, but he had never realised so clearly that in a few months that brotherly life which had lasted for so many years, that common life in the old house opposite the park, yes, his whole youth so to speak, would be irrevocably over and done with. He saw life lying in front of him, serious, almost menacing. "Have you any idea," he asked, "where they will send you?"

"There is some chance of Athens."

"Would you like that?"

“Why not? The society ought to be fairly interesting. Bernburg was there for three years and was sorry to leave. And they have transferred him to London, too, and that’s certainly not to be sniffed at.”

They walked in silence for a while and took their usual way through the park. An atmosphere suggesting the approaching spring was around them, although small white flakes of snow still gleamed on the lawns.

“So you are going to Italy?” asked Felician.

“Yes.”

“As far down South as last spring?”

“I don’t know yet.”

Again a short silence. Suddenly Felician’s voice came out of the darkness. “Have you heard anything of Grace since then?”

“Of Grace?” repeated George, somewhat surprised, for it had been a long time since Felician had mentioned that name. “I have heard nothing more of Grace. Besides, that is what we arranged. We took farewell of each other for ever at Genoa. That is already more than a year ago....”

A gentleman was sitting on a seat quite in the darkness in a fur coat with a top hat and white gloves. “Ah, Labinski,” thought George for a whole minute; the next minute he of course remembered that he had shot himself. This was not the first time that he had thought he had seen him. A man had sat in broad daylight in the botanical garden at Palermo under a Japanese ash-tree whom George had taken for a whole second for Labinski; and recently George had thought he had recognised the face of his dead father behind the shut windows of a fiacre.

The houses gleamed behind the leafless branches. One of them was the house in which the brothers lived. The time has come, thought George, for me to mention the matter at last. And to bring matters to a head, he observed lightly: “Besides, I am not going to Italy alone this year.”

“Hm! Hm!” said Felician, and looked in front of him.

George felt at the same moment that he had not taken the right tone. He was apprehensive of Felician’s thinking something like this: “Oh yes, he has got an adventure again with some shady person or other.” And he added seriously: “I say, Felician, I have something serious I should like to talk to you about.”

“What! Serious!”

“Yes.”

“Well, George,” said Felician gently, and looked at him sideways, “what is up, then? You are not thinking of marrying by any chance?”

“Oh no,” replied George, and then felt irritated that he had repudiated that possibility with such definiteness. “No, it is not a question of marriage, but of something much more vital.”

Felician remained standing for a moment. “You have a child?” he asked seriously.

“No, not yet. That’s just it, that is why we are leaving.”

“Indeed,” said Felician.

They had got out of the park. Involuntarily both looked up to the window of their house, from which only a year ago their father had so often nodded his welcome to them both. Both felt with sorrow that somehow since their father’s death they had gradually slipped away from each other — and felt at the same time a slight fear of how much further from each other life could still take them.

“Come into my room,” said George when they got upstairs. “That’s the most comfortable place.”

He sat down on his comfortable chair by his secretary. Felician lounged in the corner on a little green leather ottoman which was near the writing-table and listened quietly.

George told him the name of his mistress, spoke of her with heartfelt sympathy, and asked Felician, in case anything should happen to him, George, in the near future to undertake to look after the mother and her child. He left so much of his fortune as was still available to the child, of course. The mother was to have the usufruct until the child became of age.

When George had finished Felician said with a smile after a short silence: “Oh well, you’ve got every reason to hope that you will come back as whole and sound from your journey as I will from Africa, and so our conversation has probably only an academic significance.”

“I hope so too, of course. But at any rate it reassures me, Felician, that you know all about my secret, and that I can be free from anxiety in every way.”

“Yes, of course you can.” He shook hands with his brother. Then he got up and walked up and down the room. Finally he said: “You have no thought of legitimising your relationship?”

“Not for the time being. One can never tell what the future may bring forth.”

Felician remained standing. “Well....”

“Are you in favour of my marrying?” exclaimed George with some astonishment.

“Not at all.”

“Felician, be frank, please.”

“Look here, one should not advise any one in affairs like that. Not even one’s own brother.”

“But if I ask you, Felician? It seems to me as though there is something in the business you didn’t quite like.”

“Well, it is like this, George.... You won’t misunderstand me.... I know of course that you are not thinking of leaving her in the lurch. On the contrary, I am convinced that you will behave all through far more nobly than any ordinary man in your position. But the question is really this, would you have let yourself go into the thing if you had considered the consequences from every point of view?”

“That of course is very hard to answer,” said George.

“I mean just this: Did you intend... not to make her your companion for life, but to have a child by her all the same?”

“Great heavens, who thinks of that? Of course if one had wanted to be so absolutely on the safe side — —”

Felician interrupted him. “Does she know that you are not thinking of marrying her?”

“Why, you don’t think, surely, I promised her marriage?”

“No. But you did not promise to leave her stranded either.”

“It would have been equally mean if I had promised, Felician. The whole thing came about as affairs like that always do, developed without any definite plan right up to the present time.”

“Yes, that is all right. The only question is whether one is not more or less under an obligation to have definite plans in really vital matters.”

“Possibly.... But that was never my line, unfortunately.”

Felician remained standing in front of George, looked at him affectionately and nodded a few times.

“That is quite true, George. You are not angry with me.... But now that we are talking about it.... Of course I am not suggesting I have any right to lecture you on your mode of life....”

“Go ahead, Felician.... I mean if.... It really does me good.” He stroked him lightly on the hand which lay on the back of the ottoman.

“Well, there is not much more to be said. I only mean that in everything you do there is just... the same lack of system. Look here, to talk of another important matter, I personally am quite convinced of your talent and many others are, too. But you really work damned little, don’t you? And fame doesn’t come of itself, even when one....”

“Quite so. But I don’t work as little as you think, Felician, it is only that work is such a peculiar business with people of my temperament. Frequently when one is out for a walk or even asleep one gets all kinds of ideas.... And then in the autumn....”

“Yes, yes, we hope so, though I am afraid that you won’t be able to live on your salary at the commencement, and it is very questionable how long your little money will hold out with your mode of life. I tell you candidly, when you mentioned a few moments ago the sum which you were able to leave to your child I had quite a shock.”

“Be patient, Felician. In three or five years, when I have my opera finished....” He spoke in an ironical tone.

“Are you really writing an opera, George?”

“I am beginning one shortly.”

“Who is doing the libretto for you?”

“Heinrich Bermann. Of course you scowl again.”

“My dear George, I have always been very far from lecturing you in any way about the people you associate with. It is quite natural that you with your intellectual tastes should live in a different set and mix with different people to those I do, people whom I should probably find rather less to my taste. But so long as Herr Bermann’s libretto is good you have my blessing... and Herr Bermann, of course, too.”

“The libretto is not ready yet, only the scenario.”

Felician could not help laughing. “So that’s how your opera stands! I only hope the theatre is already built at which you are going to get a post as conductor.”

“Come, come,” said George, somewhat hurt.

“Forgive me,” replied Felician, “I have not really any doubts about your future. I should only like you yourself to do a bit more towards it. I really should be so... proud, George, if you were to do anything great, and it, I’m sure, only depends on yourself. Willy Eissler, who is a man of genuine musical gifts, told me again only the other day that he thinks more of you than of most of the young composers.”

“On the strength of the few songs of mine which he knows? You’re a good fellow, Felician, but there is really no need for you to encourage me. I already know what I have got in me, only I must be more industrious, and my going away will do me quite a lot of good. It does one good to get out of one’s usual surroundings for a time, like this. And this time it is quite different from last. It is the first time, Felician, that I have had anything to do with a person who is absolutely my equal, who is more... whom I can treat as a true friend as well, and the consciousness that I am going to have a child, and by her, too, is, in spite of all the accompanying circumstances, rather pleasant.”

“I can quite understand that,” said Felician, and contemplated George seriously and affectionately.

The clock on the writing-table struck two.

“What, so late already,” cried Felician, “and I have got to pack early to-morrow. Well, we can talk over everything at breakfast to-morrow. Well, good-night, George.”

“Good-night, Felician. Thank you,” he added with emotion.

“What are you thanking me for, George? You really are funny!” They shook hands and then kissed each other, which they had not done for quite a long time, and George resolved to call his child Felician if it was to be a boy, and he rejoiced at the good omen of a name which had so happy a ring.

After his brother’s departure George felt as deserted as though he had never had another friend. Living in the great lonely house, where he seemed to be weighed down by a mood like that which had followed the first weeks after his father's death, made him feel depressed.

He regarded the days which still had to elapse before the departure as a transition period, in which it was not worth while starting anything. The hours he spent with his mistress in the room opposite the church became colourless and blank. A psychological change, too, seemed to be now taking place in Anna herself. She was frequently irritable, then taciturn again, almost melancholy, and George was often overcome by so great a sense of ennui when he was with her that he felt quite nervous of the next month in which they would be thrown completely into each other's society. Of course the journey in itself promised change enough, but how would it be in the subsequent months which would have to be spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of Vienna? He must also think about a companion for Anna; but he was still putting off speaking to her about it, when Anna herself came to him with a piece of news which was calculated to remove that difficulty, and at the same time to raise another one, in the simplest way conceivable. Anna had recently, particularly since she had gradually given up her lessons, become more and more intimate with Therese, and had confided everything to her, and so it soon came about that Therese's mother was also in the secret. This lady was much more congenial to Anna than her own mother, who after a slight glimmer of understanding had held aloof, aggrieved and depressed, from her erring daughter.

Frau Golowski not only declared herself ready to live with Anna in the country, but even promised to discover the little house which George had not been able to find, while the young couple were away. However much this willingness suited George's convenience, he found it none the less somewhat painful to be under an obligation to this old woman, who was a stranger to him, and in moments when he was out of temper it struck him as almost grotesque that it should be Leo's mother and Berthold's father, of all people, who should be fated to play so important a part in so momentous an event in Anna's life.

George paid his farewell visit at Ehrenbergs' on a fine May afternoon three days before he went away.

He had only rarely shown himself there since that Christmas celebration and his conversations with Else had remained on the most innocent of footings. She confessed to him, as though to a friend who could not now misunderstand remarks of that character, that she felt more and more unsettled at home. In particular the atmosphere of the house, as George had frequently noticed before, seemed to be permanently overcast by the bad relations between father and son. When Oskar came in at the door with his nonchalant aristocratic swagger and began to talk in his Viennese aristocratic accent, his father would turn scornfully away, or would be unable to suppress allusions to the fact that he could make an end this very day of all that aristocracy by stopping or lowering his so-called allowance, which as a matter of fact was neither more nor less than pocket-money. If, on his side, his father began to talk Yiddish, as he was most fond of doing in front of company, and with obvious malice, Oskar would bite his lips and make a point of leaving the room. So it was only very rarely during the last few months that father and son stayed in Vienna or in Neuhaus at the same time. They both found each other's presence almost intolerable.

When George came in to Ehrenbergs' the room was almost in darkness. The marble Isis gleamed from behind the pianoforte, and the twilight of the late afternoon was falling in the alcove where mother and daughter sat opposite each other. For the first time the appearance of these two women struck George as somewhat strangely pathetic. A vague feeling floated up in his mind that perhaps this was the last time he would see this picture, and Else's smile shone towards him with such sweet melancholy, that he thought for a whole minute: might I not have found my happiness here, after all?

He now sat next to Frau Ehrenberg (who was going on quietly knitting) opposite Else, smoked a cigarette and felt quite at home. He explained that, fascinated by the tempting spring weather, he was starting on his projected journey earlier than he had intended, and that he would probably prolong it until the summer.

“And we are going to Auhof as early as the middle of May this time,” said Frau Ehrenberg, “and we certainly count upon seeing you down there this year.”

“If you are not elsewhere engaged,” added Else with a perfectly straight face.

George promised to come in August, at any rate for some days. The conversation then turned on Felician and Willy, who had started with their party a few days ago from Biskra on their hunting expedition in the desert; on Demeter Stanzides, who announced his immediate intention of resigning from the army and retiring to an estate in Hungary; and finally on Heinrich Bermann of whom no one had had any news for some weeks.

“Who knows if he will ever come back to Vienna at all?” said Else.

“Why shouldn’t he? What makes you think that, Fräulein Else?”

“Upon my word, perhaps he’ll marry that actress and trot about the world with her.”

George shrugged his shoulders... he didn’t know personally of any actress with whom Heinrich was mixed up, and he ventured to express a doubt whether Heinrich would ever marry any one, whether she was a Princess or a circus rider.

“It would be rather a pity if Bermann were to,” said Frau Ehrenberg, without taking any notice of George’s discretion. “I certainly think that young people take these matters either too lightly or too seriously.”

Else followed up the idea: “Yes, it is strange, all you men are either cleverer or much sillier in these matters than in any other, although really it is just in such crucial moments of one’s life, that one ought as far as possible to be one’s ordinary self.”

“My dear Else,” said George casually, “once one’s passions are set going — —”

“Yes, when they are set going,” emphasised Frau Ehrenberg.

“Passions!” exclaimed Else. “I believe that like all other great things in the world, they are really something quite rare.”

“What do you know, my child?” said Frau Ehrenberg.

“At any rate I’ve never so far seen anything of that kind in my immediate environment,” explained Else.

“Who knows if you would discover it,” remarked George, “even though it did come once in a way quite near you? Viewed from outside a flirtation and a life’s tragedy may sometimes look quite the same.”

“That is certainly not true,” said Else. “Passion is something that is bound to betray itself.”

“How do you manage to know that, Else?” objected Frau Ehrenberg. “Passions can often conceal themselves deeper than any ordinary trumpery little emotion, for the very reason that there is usually more at stake.”

“I think,” replied George, “that it is a very personal matter. There are, of course, people who have everything written on their forehead, and others who are impenetrable; being impenetrable is quite as much a talent as anything else.”

“It can be trained too, like anything else,” said Else.

The conversation stuck for a moment, as is apt to occur when the personal application that lies behind some general observation flashes out only too palpably.

Frau Ehrenberg started a new topic. “Have you been composing anything nice, George?” she asked.

“A few trifles for the piano. My quintette will soon be ready too.”

“The quintette is beginning to grow mythical,” said Else discontentedly.

“Else!” said her mother.

“Well, it really would be a good thing, if he were to be more industrious.”

“You are perhaps right about that,” replied George.

“I think artists used to work much more in former days than they do now.”

"The great ones," qualified George.

"No, all," persisted Else.

"Perhaps it is a good thing that you are going to travel," said Frau Ehrenberg, "for apparently you've too many distractions here."

"He'll let himself be distracted anywhere," asserted Else sternly. "Even in Iglau, or wherever else he happens to be next year."

"That's why I've never yet thought of your going away," said Frau Ehrenberg and shook her head; "and your brother will be in Sophia or Athens next year and Stanzides in Hungary... it's really a great pity to think of all the nicest men being scattered like this to the four corners of the world."

"If I were a man," said Else, "I would scatter too."

George smiled. "You're dreaming of a journey round the world in a white yacht, Madeira, Ceylon, San Francisco."

"Oh no, I shouldn't like to be without a profession, but I should probably have been an officer in the merchant service."

"Won't you be kind enough" — Frau Ehrenberg turned to George— "to play us one or two of your new things?"

"Delighted, I'm sure." He got up from the recess and walked towards the window into the darkness of the room. Else got up and turned on the light on top. George opened the piano, sat down and played his ballads.

Else had sat down in an arm-chair and as she sat there, with her arm resting on the side of the chair and her head resting on her arm in the pose of a grande dame and with the melancholy expression of a precocious child, George felt again strangely thrilled by her look. He was not feeling very satisfied with his ballad to-day, and was fully conscious that he was endeavouring to help out its effect by putting too much expression into his playing.

Hofrat Wilt stepped softly into the room and made a sign that they were not to disturb themselves. He then remained standing by the door leaning against the wall, tall, superior, good-natured, with his closely-cropped grey hair, until George ended his performance with some emphatic harmonies. They greeted each other. Wilt congratulated George on being a free man and being now able to travel South. "I'm sorry to say I can't do it," he added, "and all the same one has at times a vague notion that even though one were not to visit one's office for a year on end, not the slightest change would take place in Austria." He talked with his usual irony about his profession and his Fatherland. Frau Ehrenberg retorted that there was not a man who was more patriotic, and took his calling more seriously than he himself. He agreed. But he regarded Austria as an infinitely complicated instrument, which only a master could handle properly, and said that the only reason for its sounding badly so often was that every muddler tried his art upon it. "They'll go on knocking it about," he said dismally, "until all the strings break and the frame too."

When George went Else accompanied him into the empty room. She still had a few words to say to him about his ballads. She had particularly liked the middle movement. It had had such an inner glow. Anyway, she hoped he would have a good time on his journey.

He thanked her.

"So," she said suddenly, when he already had his hat in his hand, "it's really a case now of saying a final farewell to certain dreams."

"What dreams?" he asked in surprise.

"Mine of course, which you are bound to have known about by this time."

George was very astonished. She had never been so specific. He smiled awkwardly and sought for an answer. “Who knows what the future will bring forth?” he said at last lightly.

She puckered her forehead. “Why aren’t you at any rate as straight with me as I am with you? I know quite well that you are not travelling alone... I also know who is going with you... what is more I know the whole thing. Good gracious, what haven’t I known since we have known each other?”

And George heard grief and rage quivering below the surface of her words. And he knew that if he ever did make her his wife, she would make him feel that she had had to wait for him too long. He looked in front of him and maintained a silence that seemed at once guilty and defiant.

Then Else smiled brightly, held out her hand and said once again: “Bon voyage.”

He pressed her hand as though he were bound to make some apology. She took it away from him, turned round and went back into the room. He still waited for a few seconds standing by the door and then hurried into the street. On the same evening George saw Leo Golowski again in the café, for the first time for many weeks. He knew from Anna that Leo had recently had to put up with a great deal of unpleasantness as a volunteer and that that “fiend in human form” in particular had persecuted him with malice, with real hatred in fact. It occurred to George to-day that Leo had greatly altered during the short time in which he had not seen him. He looked distinctly older.

“I’m very glad to get a chance of seeing you again before I leave,” said George and sat down opposite him at the café table.

“You are glad,” replied Leo, “that you happened to run across me again, while I positively needed to see you once again, that is the difference.” His voice had even a tenderer note than usual. He looked George in the face with a kind, almost fatherly expression.

At this moment George no longer had any doubt that Leo knew everything. He felt as embarrassed for a few seconds as though he were responsible to him, was irritated at his own embarrassment and was grateful to Leo for not appearing to notice it. This evening they talked about practically nothing except music. Leo inquired after the progress of George’s work, and it came about during the course of the conversation that George declared himself quite willing to play one of his newest compositions to Leo on the following Sunday afternoon. But when they took leave of each other, George suddenly had the unpleasant feeling of having passed with comparative success a theoretical examination, and of being faced to-morrow with a practical examination. What did this young man, who was so mature for his years, really want of him? Was George to prove to him that his talent entitled him to be Anna’s lover or her child’s father? He waited for Leo’s visit with genuine repugnance. He thought for a minute of refusing to see him. But when Leo appeared with all that innocent sincerity which he so frequently liked to affect, George’s mood soon became less harsh. They drank tea and smoked cigarettes and George showed him his library, the pictures which were hanging in the house, the antiquities and the weapons, and the examination feeling vanished. George sat down at the pianoforte, played a few of his earlier pieces and also his latest ones as well as the ballads, which he rendered much better than he had done yesterday at Ehrenbergs’, and then some songs, while Leo followed the melody with his fingers, but with sure musical feeling. Eventually he started to play the quintette from the score. He did not succeed and Leo stationed himself at the window with the music and read it attentively.

“One can’t really tell at all so far,” he said. “A great deal of it indicates a dilettante with a lot of taste, other parts an artist without proper discipline. It’s rather in the songs that one feels... but feels what?... talent... I don’t know. One feels at any rate that you have distinction, real musical distinction.”

“Well, that’s not so much.”

“As a matter of fact it’s pretty little, but it doesn’t prove anything against you either, since you have worked so little — worked very little and felt little.”

“You think...” George forced a sarcastic laugh.

“Oh, you’ve probably lived a great deal but felt... you know what I mean, George?”

“Yes, I can imagine well enough, but you’re really making a mistake; why I rather think that I have a certain tendency to sentimentalism, which I ought to combat.”

“Yes, that’s just it. Sentimentalism, you know, is something which is the direct antithesis to feeling, something by means of which one reassures oneself about one’s lack of feeling, one’s essential coldness. Sentimentalism is feeling which one has obtained, so to speak, below cost price. I hate sentimentalism.”

“Hm, and yet I think that you yourself are not quite free from it.”

“I am a Jew, it’s a national disease with us. Our respectable members are working to change it into rage or fury. It’s a bad habit with the Germans, a kind of emotional slovenliness so to speak.”

“So there is an excuse for you, not for us.”

“There is no excuse for diseases either if, fully realising what one is doing, one has missed one’s opportunity of protecting oneself against them. But we are beginning to babble in aphorism and are consequently only on the way to half or quarter truths. Let’s go back to your quintette. I like the theme of the adagio best.”

George nodded. “I heard it once in Palermo.”

“What,” said Leo, “is it supposed to be a Sicilian melody?”

“No, it rippled to me out of the waves of the sea when I went for a walk one morning along the shore. Being alone is particularly good for my work, so is change of scene. That’s why I promise myself all kinds of things from my trip.” He told him about Heinrich Bermann’s opera plot, which he found very stimulating. When Heinrich came back again, Leo was to make him seriously start on the libretto.

“Don’t you know yet,” said Leo, “his father is dead?”

“Really? When? How do you know?”

“It was in the paper this morning.”

They spoke about Heinrich’s relationship to the dead man and Leo declared that the world would perhaps get on better if parents would more frequently learn by the experiences of their children instead of asking their children to adapt themselves to their own hoary wisdom. The conversation then turned on the relations between fathers and sons, on true and false kinds of gratefulness, on the dying of people one held dear, on the difference between mourning and grief, on the dangers of memory and the duty of forgetting. George felt that Leo was a very serious thinker, was very solitary and knew how to be so. He felt almost fond of him when the door closed behind him in the late twilight hour and the thought that this man had been Anna’s first infatuation did him good.

The remaining days passed more quickly than he anticipated, what with purchases, arrangements and all kinds of preparations. And one evening George and Anna drove after each other to the station in two separate vehicles and jestingly greeted each other in the vestibule with great politeness, as though they had been distant acquaintances who had met by accident.

“My dear Fräulein Rosner, what a fortunate coincidence! are you also going to Munich by any chance?”

“Yes, Herr Baron.”

“Hullo, that’s excellent! and have you a sleeping-car, my dear Fräulein?”

“Oh yes, Herr Baron, berth number five.”

“How strange now, I have number six.”

They then walked up and down on the platform. George was in a very good temper, and he was glad that in her English dress, narrow-brimmed travelling hat and blue veil Anna looked like an interesting foreigner.

They went the length of the entire train until they came to the engine, which stood outside the station and was sending violent puffs of light-grey steam up to the dark sky. Outside green and red lamps glowed on the track with a faint light. Nervous whistles came from somewhere out of the distance and a train slowly struggled out of the darkness into the station. A red light waved magically to and fro over the ground, seemed to be miles away, stopped and was suddenly quite near. And outside, shining and losing themselves in the invisible, the lines went their way to near and far, into night and morning, into the morrow, into the inscrutable.

Anna climbed into the compartment. George remained standing outside for a while and derived amusement from watching the other travellers, those who were in an excited rush, those who preserved a dignified calm, and those who posed as being calm — and all the various types of people who were seeing their friends off: the depressed, the jolly, the indifferent.

Anna was leaning out of the window. George chatted with her, behaved as though he had not the slightest idea of leaving and then jumped in at the last minute. The train went away. People were standing on the platform, incomprehensible people who were remaining behind in Vienna, and who on their side seemed to find all the others who were now really leaving Vienna equally incomprehensible. A few pocket-handkerchiefs fluttered. The station-master stood there impressively and gazed sternly after the train. A porter in a blue-and-white striped linen blouse held a yellow bag high up and looked inquisitively into every window. Strange, thought George casually, there are people who are going away and yet leave their yellow bags behind in Vienna. Everything vanished, handkerchiefs, bags, station-master, station. The brightly-lighted signal-box, the Gloriette, the twinkling lights of the town, the little bare gardens along the embankment; and the train whizzed on through the night. George turned away from the window. Anna sat in the corner. She had taken off her hat and veil. Gentle little tears were running down her cheeks.

"Come," said George, as he embraced her and kissed her on the eyes and mouth. "Come, Anna," he repeated even more tenderly, and kissed her again. "What are you crying for, dear? It will be so nice."

"It's easy enough for you," she said, and the tears streamed on down her smiling face.

They had a beautiful time. They first stopped in Munich. They walked about in the lofty halls of the Pinakothek, stood fascinated in front of the old darkening pictures, wandered into the Glyptothek between marble gods, kings and heroes; and when Anna with a sudden feeling of exhaustion sat down on a settee she felt George's tender glance lingering over her head. They drove through the English garden, over broad avenues beneath the still leafless trees, nestling close to each other, young and happy, and were glad to think that people took them for a honeymoon couple. And they had their seats next to each other at the opera, Figaro, The Meistersingers, and Tristan, and they felt as though a resonant transparent veil were woven around them alone out of the notes they loved so well, which separated them from all the rest of the audience. And they sat, unrecognised by any one at prettily-laid little restaurant tables, ate, drank and talked in the best of spirits. And through streets that had the wondrous atmosphere of a foreign land, they wandered home to where the gentle night waited for them in the room they shared, slept peacefully cheek by cheek, and when they awoke there smiled to them from the window a friendly day with which they could do whatever they liked. They found peace in each other as they had never done before, and at last belonged to each other absolutely. Then they travelled further to meet the call of the spring; through long valleys on which the snow shone and melted, then, as though traversing one last white winter dream, over the Brenner to Bozen, where they basked in the sunbeams at noon in the dazzling market-place. On the weather-worn steps of the vast amphitheatre of Verona, beneath the cool sky of an Easter evening, George found himself at last in sight of that world of his heart's desire into which a real true love was now vouchsafed to accompany him. His own vanished boyhood greeted him out of the pale reddish distance together with all the eternal memories, in which other men and women had their share as well. Why, even a breath of those bygone days when his mother had still lived seemed to thrill already through this air with its familiar and yet foreign atmosphere. He was glad to see Venice, but it had lost its magic and was as well known as though he had only left it yesterday. He was greeted in the Piazza St. Marco by some casual Viennese acquaintances, and the veiled lady by his side in the white dress earned many an inquisitive glance. Once only, late at evening, on a gondola journey through the narrow canals did the looming palaces, which in the daylight had gradually degenerated into artificial scenery, appear to him in all the massive splendour of the dark golden glories of their past. Then came a few days in towns, which he scarcely knew or did not know at all, in which he had only spent a few hours as a boy, or had never been in at all. They walked into a dim church out of a sultry Padua afternoon, and going slowly from altar to altar contemplated the simple glorious pictures in which saints accomplished their miracles and fulfilled their martyrdoms. On a dismal rainy day a jolty gloomy carriage took them past a brick-red fort, round which lay greenish-grey water in a broad moat, through a market-square where negligently dressed citizens sat in front of the café; among silent mournful streets, where grass grew between the cobble-stones, and they had perforce to believe that this pitifully-dying petty town bore the resounding name of Ferrara. But they breathed again in Bologna, where the lively flourishing town does not simply content itself with a mere pride in its bygone glories. But it was only when George gazed at the hills of Fiesole that he felt himself greeted as it were by a second home. This was the town in which he had ceased to be a boy, the town in which the stream of life had begun to course through his veins. At many places memories floated up in his mind which he kept to himself; and when in the cathedral, where the Florentine girl had given him her final look from beneath her bridal veil, he only spoke to Anna about that hour in the Altlerchenfelder Church in that autumn evening, when they had both begun to talk with some dim presentiment about this journey, which had now become realised with such inconceivable rapidity. He showed Anna the house in which he had lived nine years ago. The same shops in which coral-dealers, watch-makers and lace-dealers hawked their wares were still underneath. As the second story was to let George would have had no difficulty in seeing immediately the room in which his mother had died. But he hesitated for a long time to set foot in the house again. It was only on the day before their departure, as though feeling that he should not put it off any more, that alone and without any previous word to Anna, he went into the house, up the stairs and into the room. The aged porter showed him round and did not recognise him. The same furniture was still all there.

His mother's bedroom looked exactly the same as it had done ten years ago, and the same brown wooden bed with its dark-green silver embroidered velvet coverlet still stood in the same corner. But none of the emotions which George had expected stirred within him. A tired memory which seemed flatter and duller than it had ever been before, ran through his soul. He stayed a long time in front of the bed with the deliberate intention of conjuring up those emotions which he felt it was his duty to feel. He murmured the word "mother," he tried to imagine the way in which she had lain here in this bed for many days and nights. He remembered the hours in which she had felt better, and he had been able to read aloud to her or to play to her on the piano in the adjoining room. He looked at the little round table standing in the corner over which his father and Felician had spoken in a soft whisper because his mother had just gone to sleep; and finally there arose up in his mind with all the sharp vividness of a theatrical scene the picture of that dreadful evening, when his father and brother had gone out, and he himself had sat at his mother's bedside quite alone with her hand in his... he saw and heard it all over again. He remembered how she had suddenly felt ill after an extremely quiet day, how he had hurriedly opened the windows and the laughter and speeches of strange people had penetrated into the room with the warm March air, how she lay there at last with open eyes that were already blank, while her hair that only a few seconds ago had streamed in waves over her forehead and temple lay dry and dishevelled on the pillow, and her left arm hung down naked over the edge of the bed with still fingers stretched far apart. This image arose in his mind with such terrible vividness that he saw again mentally his own boyish face and heard once again his own long sobbing... but he felt no pain. It was far too long ago — nearly ten years.

"E bellissima la vista di questa finestra," suddenly said the porter behind him as he opened the window — and human voices at once rang into the room from down below just as they had done on that long-past evening. And at the same moment he heard his mother's voice in his ear, just as he had heard it then entreating, dying... "George... George"... and out of the dark corner in the place where the pillows had used to lie he saw something pale shine out towards him. He went to the window and agreed: "Bellissima vista," but in front of the beautiful view there lay as it were a dark veil. "Mother," he murmured, and once again "Mother"... but to his own amazement he did not mean the woman who had borne him and had been buried long ago; the word was for that other woman, who was not yet a mother but who was to be in a few months... the mother of a child of which he was the father. And the word suddenly rang out, as though some melody that had never been heard or understood before, were now sounding, as though bells with mystic chiming were swinging in the distant future. And George felt ashamed that he had come here alone, had, as it were, almost stolen here. It was now quite out of the question to tell Anna that he had been here.

The next day they took the train to Rome. And while George felt fresher, more at home, more in the vein for enjoyment, with each succeeding day, Anna began to suffer seriously from a feeling of exhaustion with increasing frequency. She would often remain behind alone in the hotel, while he strolled about the streets, wandered through the Vatican, went to the Forum and the Palatine. She never kept him back, but he nevertheless felt himself bound to cheer her up before he went out, and got into the habit of saying: "Well, you'll keep that for another time, I hope we shall soon be coming here again." Then she would smile in her arch way, as though she did not doubt now that she would one day be his wife; and he himself could not help owning that he no longer regarded that development as impossible. For it had gradually become almost impossible for him to realise that they were to say goodbye for ever and to go their several ways this autumn. Yet during this period the words with which they spoke about a remote future were always vague. He had fear of it, and she felt that she would be doing well not to arouse that fear, and it was just during these Roman days, when he would often walk about alone in the foreign town for hours on end, that he felt as though he were at times slipping away from Anna in a manner that was not altogether unpleasant.

One evening he had wandered about amid the ruins of the Imperial Palace until the approach of dusk and from the height of the Palatine Hill he had seen the sun set in the Campagna with all the proud delight of the man who is alone. He had then gone driving for a while along the ancient wall of the city to Monte Pincio, and when as he leant back in the corner of his carriage he swept the roofs with his look till he saw the cupola of St. Peter's, he felt with deep emotion that he was now experiencing the most sublime hour of the whole journey. He did not get back to the hotel till late, and found Anna standing by the window pale and in tears, with red spots on her swollen cheeks. She had been dying of nervousness for the last two hours, had imagined that he had had an accident, had been attacked, had been killed. He reassured her, but did not find the words of affection which she wanted, for he felt in some unworthy way a sense of being tied and not free. She felt his coldness and gave him to understand that he did not love her enough; he answered with an irritation that verged on despair. She called him callous and selfish. He bit his lip, made no further answer, and walked up and down the room. Still unreconciled they went into the dining-room, where they took their meal in silence, and went to bed without saying good-night.

The following days were under the shadow of this scene. It was only on the journey to Naples, when they were alone in the compartment, that in their joy over the new scenery to which they were flying they found each other again. From henceforward he scarcely left her a single minute, she seemed to him helpless and somewhat pathetic. He gave up visiting museums since she could not accompany him. They drove together to Posilippo and walked in the Villa Nationale. In the excursion through Pompeii he walked next to her sedan-chair like a patient affectionate husband, and while the guide was giving his descriptive account in bad French, George took Anna's hand, kissed it and endeavoured in enthusiastic words to make her share in the delight that he himself felt once more in this mysterious roofless town, which after a burial of two thousand years had gradually returned street by street, house by house, to meet the unchanging light of that azure sky. And when they stopped at a place where some labourers were just engaged in extricating with careful movements of their shovels a broken pillar out of the ashes he pointed it out to Anna with eyes which shone as brightly as though he had been storing up this sight for her for a long time, and as though everything which had happened before had simply been leading up to the fulfilment of his purpose of taking her to this particular place at this particular minute and showing her this particular wonder.

On a dark blue May night they lay in two chairs covered with tarpaulins on the deck of the ship that was taking them to Genoa. An old Frenchman with clear eyes, who had sat opposite them at dinner, stood near them for a while and drew their attention to the stars that hung in the infinitude like heavy silver drops. He named some of them by name, politely and courteously, as though he felt it incumbent upon him to introduce to each other the shining wanderers of heaven and the young married couple. He then said good-night and went down into his cabin. But George thought of his lonely journey over the same route and under the same sky in the previous spring after his farewell from Grace. He had told Anna about her, not so much from any emotional necessity, as in order to free his past from that atmosphere of sinister mystery in which it often seemed to Anna to disappear, by the conjuring up into life of a specific shape and the designation of a specific name. Anna knew of Labinski's death, of George's conversation with Grace at Labinski's grave, of George's stay with her in Sicily. He had even shown her a picture of Grace; and yet he thought to himself with a slight shudder how little Anna herself knew of this very epoch of his life, which he had described to her with an almost reckless lack of reserve; and he felt how impossible it was to give any other person any idea of a period which that person had not actually lived through, and of the contents of so many days and nights every minute of which had been full of vivid life. He realised the comparative insignificance of the little lapses from truth of which he frequently allowed himself to be guilty in his narrative, compared with that ineradicable taint of falseness to which every memory gives birth on its short journey from the lips of one person to the ear of another. And if Anna herself at some later time wanted to describe to some friend, some new lover, as honestly as she possibly could, the time which she spent with George, what after all could that friend really learn? Not much more than a story such as he had read hundreds of times over in books: a story of a young creature who had loved a young man, had travelled about with him, had felt ecstasy and at times tedium, had felt herself at one with him, and yet had frequently felt lonely. And even if she should make an attempt to give a specific account of every minute... there still remained an irrevocable past, and for him who has not lived through it himself the past can never be the truth.

The stars glistened above him. Anna's head had sunk slowly upon his breast and he supported it gently with his hands. Only the slight ripple in the depths betrayed that the ship was sailing onward. But it still went on towards the morning, towards home, towards the future.

The hour which had loomed over them so long in silence seemed now about to strike and to begin. George suddenly felt that he no longer had his fate in his own hand. Everything was going its course. And he now felt in his whole body, even to the hairs of his head, that the ship beneath his feet was relentlessly hurrying forward.

They only remained a day in Genoa. Both longed for rest, and George for his work as well. They meant to stay only a few weeks at an Italian lake and to travel home in the middle of June. The house in which Anna was going to live would be bound to be ready by then. Frau Golowski had found out half-a-dozen suitable ones, sent specific details to Anna and was waiting for her decision, though she still continued looking for others in case of emergency. They travelled from Milan to Genoa, but they could not stand the noisy life of a town any longer and left for Lugano the very next day.

They had been staying here for a period of four weeks and every morning George went along the road which took him, as it did to-day, along the cheerful shore of the lake, past Paradiso to the bend, where there was a view which every time he longed to see again. Only a few days of their stay were still before them. In spite of the excellent state of Anna's health since the beginning of their stay the time had arrived to return to the vicinity of Vienna, so as to be able to be ready confidently for all emergencies. The days in Lugano struck George as the best he had experienced since his departure from Vienna. And he asked himself during many a beautiful moment, if the time he was spending here was not perhaps the best time of his whole life. He had never felt himself so free from desire, so serene both in anticipation and memory, and he saw with joy that Anna also was completely happy. Expectant gentleness shone in her forehead, her eyes gleamed with arch merriment, as at the time when George had wooed for their possession. Without anxiety, without impatience and lifted by the consciousness of her budding motherhood far above the memory of home prejudices or any question of future complications, she anticipated with ecstasy the great hour when she was to give back to the waiting world as an animate creature, that which her body had drunk in during a half-conscious moment of ecstasy. George saw with joy the maturing in her of the comrade that he had hoped to find in her from the beginning, but who had so frequently escaped him in the course of the last few months. In their conversations about his works (all of which she had carefully gone through), about the theory of the song, about the more general musical questions, she revealed to him more knowledge and feeling than he had ever suspected she had in her. And he himself, though he did not actually compose much, felt as though he were making real strides forward. Melodies resounded within him, harmonies heralded their approach, and he remembered with deep understanding a remark of Felician's, who had once said after he had not had a sword in his hand for months on end, that his arm had had some good ideas during this period. The future, too, occasioned him no anxiety. He knew that serious work would begin as soon as he got back to Vienna, and then his way would lie before him, clear and unencumbered.

George stood for a long time by the bend in the road which had been the object of his walk. A short broad tongue of land, thickly overgrown with low shrubs, stretched from here straight into the lake, while a narrow gently sloping path led in a few steps to a wooden seat which was invisible from the street and on which George was always accustomed to sit down a little before returning to the hotel.

"How many more times," he could not help thinking to-day. "Five or six times perhaps and then back to Vienna again." And he asked himself what would happen if they did not go back, if they settled down in some house somewhere in Italy or Switzerland, and began to build up with their child a new life in the double peacefulness of Nature and distance. What would happen?... Nothing. Scarcely any one would be particularly surprised. And no one would miss either him or her, miss them with real grief. These reflections made his mood flippant rather than melancholy; the only thought that made him depressed was that he was frequently overcome by a kind of homesickness, a kind of desire in fact to see certain specific persons. And even now, while he was drinking in the lake air, surrendering himself to the blue of this half foreign, half familiar sky above him and enjoying all the pleasure of solitude and retirement, his heart would beat when he thought of the woods and hills around Vienna, of the Ringstrasse, the club and his big room with the view of the Stadtpark. And he would have felt anxious if his child had not been going to be born in Vienna. It suddenly occurred to him that another letter from Frau Golowski must have arrived to-day together with many other communications from Vienna, and he therefore decided to take the road round by the post-office before going back to the hotel. For following his habit during the whole trip he had his letters addressed there and not to the hotel, since he felt that this would give him a freer hand in dealing with any outside emergency. He did not, as a matter of fact, get many letters from Vienna. There was usually in spite of their brevity a certain element in Heinrich's letters which, as George quite appreciated, was less due to any particular need of sympathy on the part of the author than to the circumstance that it was an integral part of his literary calling to breathe the breath of life into all the sentences which he wrote. Felician's letters were as cool as though he had completely forgotten that last heartfelt talk in George's room and that brotherly kiss with which they had taken leave of each other.... He presumes, no doubt, thought George, that his letters will be read by Anna too, and does not feel himself bound to give this stranger an insight into his private affairs and his private feelings. Nürnberger had sent a few short answers to George's picture-postcards, while in answer to a letter from Rome, in which George had referred to his sincere appreciation of the walks they had had together in the early spring, Nürnberger expressed his regret in ironically apologetic phrases that he had told George on those excursions such a lot about his own family affairs which could not interest him in the slightest. A letter from old Eissler had reached him at Naples, informing him that there was no prospect of a vacancy for the following year at the Detmold Court Theatre, but that George had been invited through Count Malnitz to be present at the rehearsals and performances as a "visitor by special request," and that this was an opportunity which might perhaps pave the way to something more definite in the future. George had given the proposition his polite consideration, but had little inclination for the time being to stay in the foreign town for any length of time with such vague prospects, and had decided to look out for a permanent appointment as soon as he arrived at Vienna.

Apart from this there was no personal note in any of the letters from home. The remembrances to him which Frau Rosner felt in duty bound to append to her letters to her daughter made no particular appeal, although recently they had been addressed not to the Herr Baron but to George. He felt certain that Anna's parents were simply resigned to what they could not alter, but that they felt it grievously all the same, and had not shown themselves as broad-minded as would have been desirable.

In accordance with his habit George did not go back along the bank. Passing through narrow streets between garden walls, then under arcades and finally over a wide space from which there was another clear view of the lake, he arrived in front of the post-office, whose bright yellow paint reflected the dazzling rays of the sun. A young lady whom George had already seen in the distance walking up and down the pavement, remained standing as he approached. She was dressed in white and carried a white sunshade spread out over a broad straw hat with a red ribbon. When George was quite near she smiled, and he now suddenly saw a well-known face beneath the white spotted tulle veil.

"Is it really you, Fräulein Therese?" he exclaimed as he took the hand which she held out to him.

"How do you do, Baron?" she replied innocently, as though this meeting were the most ordinary event imaginable. "How is Anna?"

"Very well, thanks. Of course you will come and see her?"

"If I may."

"But tell me now, what are you doing here? Can it be that you" — and his glance swept her in amazement from top to toe— “are making a political tour?”

“I can’t exactly say that,” she replied, pushing out her chin, without that movement having its usual effect of making her face appear ugly, “it’s more of a holiday jaunt.” And her face shone with a genuine smile as she saw George’s glance turn towards the door, from which Demeter Stanzides had just come out in a striped black-and-white flannel suit. He lifted his grey felt hat in salutation and shook hands with George.

“Good-morning, Baron. Glad to see you again.”

“I am very glad, too, Herr Stanzides.”

“No letter for me?” Therese turned to Demeter.

“No, Therese. Only a few cards for me,” and he put them in his pocket.

“How long have you been here?” inquired George, endeavouring to exhibit as little surprise as possible.

“We arrived yesterday,” replied Demeter.

“Straight from Vienna?” asked George.

“No, from Milan. We have been travelling for eight days. We were first in Venice, that is the orthodox thing to do,” added Therese, pulled down her veil and took Demeter’s arm.

“You been away much longer?” said Demeter. “I saw a card from you some weeks back at Ehrenbergs’, the house of the Vettii, Pompeii.”

“Yes, I’ve had a wonderful trip.”

“Well, we’ll have a look round the place a bit,” said Therese, “and besides, we don’t want to detain the Baron any more. I am sure he wants to go and fetch his letters.”

“Oh, there is no hurry about that. Anyway, we’ll see each other again.”

“Will you give us the pleasure, Baron,” said Demeter, “of lunching with us to-day at the Europe? That’s where we put up.”

“Thanks very much, but I’m afraid it’s impossible. But... but perhaps you could manage to dine with... with... us at the Park Hotel, yes? At half-past seven if that’s all right for you. I’ll have it served in the garden, under an awfully fine plane-tree, where we usually take our meals.”

“Yes,” said Therese, “we accept with thanks. Perhaps I’ll come in an hour earlier and have a quiet chat with Anna.”

“Good,” replied George, “she will be very glad.”

“Well, till the evening, Baron,” said Demeter, shook hands with him heartily and added: “Please give my kind regards at home.”

Therese flashed George an appreciative look, and then went on her way with Demeter towards the bank of the lake.

George looked after them. If I hadn’t known her, he thought, Demeter could have introduced her to me straight away as his wife, née Princess X. How strange, those two.... He then went into the hall, had his correspondence given to him at the counter and ran cursorily through it. The first thing which caught his eye was a card from Leo Golowski. There was nothing on it except “Dear George, mind you have a good time.” Then there was a card from the Waldsteingarten in the Prater, “We have just emptied our glasses to the health of our runaway friend. Guido Schönstein, Ralph Skelton, the Rattenmamsell.”

George wanted to read the letters from Felician, Frau Rosner and Heinrich quietly at home with Anna. He was also in a hurry to inform Anna of the news of the strange couple’s arrival. He was not quite free from anxiety, for Anna’s conventional instincts had a knack of waking up occasionally in a quite unexpected manner. Anyway, George decided to tell her of his invitation to Demeter and Therese as though it were an absolute matter of course and was quite ready, in case she should feel hurt or irritated or even have doubts about the matter, to oppose such an attitude firmly and resolutely. He himself was very glad of the evening which was before him after the many weeks that he had spent exclusively in Anna's society. He almost felt a little envious of Demeter, who was on an irresponsible pleasure-trip like he himself when he had gone travelling with Grace in the previous year. Then it occurred to him that he liked Therese better than ever. In spite of the numerous pretty women whom he had met in the course of the last month he had never felt seriously tempted, even though Anna was losing more and more of her womanly grace. To-day for the first time he felt a desire for new embraces.

He soon saw Anna's light-blue morning dress shining through the railings of the balcony. George whistled the first notes of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which was his usual method of announcing himself, and the pale gentle face of his beloved immediately appeared over the railings and her big eyes greeted him with a smile. He held up the packet of letters, she nodded with pleasure and he hurried quickly up to her room and on to the balcony. She was reclining in a cane chair in front of the little table with the green coverlet, on which some needlework was lying, as was nearly always the case when George came home from his morning walk. He kissed her on the forehead and on the mouth. "Well, whom do you think I met?" he asked hurriedly.

"Else Ehrenberg," answered Anna, without considering.

"What an idea? How could she get here?"

"Well," said Anna slyly, "she might have travelled off to find you."

"She might, but she didn't. So guess again. I give you three guesses."

"Heinrich Bermann."

"Nowhere near it. Besides there is a letter from him. So guess again."

She reflected. "Demeter Stanzides," she then said.

"What, do you really know something?"

"What should I know? Is he really here?"

"By Jove, you are positively blushing. Ho ho!" He knew of her weakness for Demeter's melancholy cavalier beauty but did not feel the slightest trace of jealousy.

"So it is Stanzides?" she asked.

"Yes, it is Stanzides right enough. But with all the will in the world I can't find anything remarkable about that. It's not remarkable, either. But if you guess whom he is with...."

"With Sissy Wyner."

"But...."

"Well, I was thinking of marriage.... That happens too sometimes."

"No, not with Sissy, and not married, but with your friend Therese, and as unmarried as possible."

"Get along...."

"I tell you, with Therese. They've been travelling for eight days. What have you got to say to that? They have been in Venice and Milan. Had you any idea of it?"

"No."

"Really not?"

"Really not. You know of course that Therese only once wrote me a line, and you read her letter with your well-known interest."

"You're not astonished enough."

"Good gracious, I always knew that she had good taste."

"So has Demeter," exclaimed George with conviction.

"Elective affinities," remarked Anna, elevating her eyebrows, and went on crocheting.

“And so this is the mother of my child,” said George, with a merry shake of his head.

She looked at him with a smile. “When is she coming to see me, then?”

“In the afternoon about six, I think. And... and Stanzides is coming too... a bit later. They are going to dine with us. You don’t mind?”

“Mind? I’m very glad,” replied Anna simply.

George was agreeably surprised. If Anna in her present condition had met Stanzides in Vienna!... he thought. How being away from one’s usual environment frees and purifies!

“What news did they tell you?” asked Anna.

“We stood chatting together at the post-office for scarcely three minutes. He sends his regards to you, by the way.”

Anna made no answer and it seemed to George as though her thoughts were travelling again on extremely conventional lines.

“Have you been up long?” he asked quickly.

“Yes, I have been sitting here on the balcony for quite a long time. I even went to sleep a bit, the air is so enervating to-day somehow. And I dreamed, too.”

“What did you dream about?”

“Of the child,” she said.

“Again?”

She nodded. “Just the same as the other day. I was sitting here on the balcony in my dream, and had it in my arms at the breast....”

“But what was it, a boy or a girl?”

“I don’t know. Just a child. So tiny and so sweet. And the joy was so.... No I won’t give it up,” she said softly with closed eyes.

He stood leaning on the railing and felt the light noon wind stroke his hair. “If you don’t want to give it out to nurse,” he said, “well you mustn’t.” And the thought ran through his mind, “Wouldn’t it be the most convenient thing to marry her?...” But something or other kept him back from saying so. They were both silent. He had laid the letters in front of him on the table. He now took them up and opened one. “Let’s see, first, what your mother writes?” he said.

Frau Rosner’s letter contained the news that all was well at home, that they would all be very glad to see Anna again, and that Josef had got a post on the staff of the Volksbote with a salary of fifty gulden a month. Further, an inquiry had come from Frau Bittner as to when Anna was coming back from Dresden, and if it was really certain that she would be back again next autumn, because otherwise they would of course have to look about for a new teacher.... Anna stood motionless and expressed no opinion.

Then George read out Heinrich’s letter. It ran as follows:

“Dear George,

“I am very glad that you will be back so soon, and prefer to tell you so to-day, because once you are there I shall never tell you how very glad I shall be to see you. A few days ago, when I went for a lonely cycle ride along the Danube, I genuinely missed you. What an overwhelming atmosphere of loneliness these banks have! I remember having once felt like that five or six years ago on a Sunday, when I was in what is technically known as ‘jolly company,’ and was sitting in the Kloster-neuburger beer-house in the large garden with its view of the mountains and the fields. How it ascends from the depths of the waters, loneliness I mean, which certainly is quite a different thing to what one usually thinks it is. It is very far from being the opposite of society. Yet it is only perhaps when one is with other people that one has a right to feel lonely. Just take this as an aphoristical humorously untrue special supplement, or treat it as such and lay it aside. To come back to my ride along the banks of the Danube — it was on that same rather sultry evening that I had all kinds of good ideas, and I hope soon to be able to tell you a lot of startling news about Ägidius, for that's the name that the murderous melancholy youth has got at last, about the deep-thinking impenetrable prince, about the humorous Duke Heliodorus, the name by which I have the honour of introducing to you the Princess's betrothed, and especially about the princess herself, who seems to be a far more remarkable person than I originally supposed."

"That's to do with the opera plot?" asked Anna, dropping her work.

"Of course," replied George, and went on reading.

"You must also know, my dear friend, that I have finished during the last week some verses for the first act, which so far are not particularly immortal, verses which until some further development, so long I mean, as they are without your music, will hop about the world like wingless angels. The subject-matter appeals to me extraordinarily, and I myself am curious to know what I am really going to make of it. I've begun all kinds of other things as well... sketched things out... thought things over. And to put it shortly and with a certain amount of cheek I feel as though a new phase were heralding itself within me. This sounds of course greater cheek than it really is. For chimney-sweeps, ice-cream vendors and colour-sergeants have their phases as well. People of our temperament always recognise it at once. What I regard as very probable is that I shall soon leave the fantastic element in which I now feel so much at home, and will either move up or move down into something extremely real. What would you say, for example, if I were to go in for a political comedy? I feel already that the word 'real' is not quite the right one. For in my view politics is the most fantastic element in which persons can possibly move, the only thing is they don't notice it.... This is the point I ought to drive home. This occurred to me the other day when I was present at a political meeting (untrue, I always get these thoughts). Yes — a meeting of working men and women in the Brigittenau in which I found myself next to Mademoiselle Therese Golowski, and at which I was compelled to hear seven speeches about universal suffrage. Each of the speakers — Therese was one of them, too — spoke just as though the solution of that question was the most important thing in the world to him or her personally, and I don't think that any of them had an idea that the whole question was a matter of colossal indifference to them at the real bottom of their hearts. Therese was very indignant of course when I enlightened her on the point, and declared that I had been infected by the poisonous scepticism of Nürnberger, of whom as a matter of fact I'm seeing far too much. She always makes a point of running him down, since he asked her some time ago in the café whether she was going to have her hair done high or in plaits at her next trial for high treason. Anyway, I find it very nice seeing a lot of Nürnberger. When I'm having my bad days, there is no one who receives me with more kindness. Only there are many days whose badness he doesn't suspect or doesn't want to know of. There are various troubles which I feel that he fails to appreciate and which I've given up talking to him about."

"What does he mean?" interrupted Anna.

"The affair with the actress, clearly," replied George, and went on reading.

"On the other hand he is inclined to make up for that by taking other troubles of mine too seriously. That is probably my fault and not his. He manifested a sympathy towards me for the loss I sustained by my father's death, which I confess made me positively ashamed; for though it hit me dreadfully hard we had grown so aloof from one another quite a long time before his madness burst upon him, that his death simply signified a further and more ghastly barrier rather than a new experience."

"Well?" asked Anna, as George stopped.

"I've just got an idea."

"What is it?"

"Nürnberger's sister lies buried in the Cadenabbia cemetery. I told you about her. I'll run over one of these days."

Anna nodded. "Perhaps I'll go too, if I feel all right. From all I hear of him I find Nürnberger much more sympathetic than that horrible egoist your friend Heinrich."

"You think so?"

"But really, the way he writes about his father. It is almost intolerable."

"Hang it all! if people who have grown so estranged as those two — —"

"All the same, I haven't really very much in common with my own parents temperamentally either, and yet.... If I.... No, no, I prefer not to talk about such things. Won't you go on reading?"

George read:

"There are more serious things than death, things which are certainly sadder, because these other things lack the finality which takes away the sadness of death, if viewed from the higher standpoint. For instance, there are living ghosts who walk about the streets in the clear daylight with eyes that have died long ago and yet see, ghosts who sit down next to one and talk with a human voice that has a far more distant ring than if it came from a grave. And one might go so far as to say that the essential awfulness of death is revealed to a far greater extent in moments when one has experiences like this, than at those times when one stands near and watches somebody being lowered into the earth... however near that somebody was."

George involuntarily dropped the letter and Anna said with emphasis: "Well, you can certainly keep him to yourself — your friend Heinrich."

"Yes," replied George slowly. "He is often a bit affected, and yet... hallo, there goes the first bell for lunch. Let's read quickly through to the end."

"But I must now tell you what happened yesterday: the most painful and yet ridiculous affair which I have come across for a long time, and I am sorry to say the persons concerned are our good friends the Ehrenbergs, father and son."

"Oh," cried Anna involuntarily.

George had quickly run through the lines which followed and shook his head.

"What is it?" inquired Anna.

"It is.... Just listen," and he went on reading.

"You are no doubt aware of the growing acuteness of the relations between Oskar and the old man in the course of the last year. You also know the real reasons for it, so that I can just inform you of what has taken place without going into the motives for it any further. Well, it's just like this. Yesterday Oskar passes by the Church of St. Michael about twelve o'clock midday and takes off his hat. You know that at the present time piety is about the smartest craze going, and so perhaps it is unnecessary to go into any further explanation, as, for example, that a few young aristocrats happened just to be coming out of church and that Oskar wanted to behave as a Catholic for their special benefit. God knows how often he has previously been guilty of this imposture without being found out, but as luck would have it, it happens yesterday that old Ehrenberg comes along the road at the same moment. He sees Oskar taking off his hat in front of the church door... and attacked by a fit of uncontrollable rage he gives his offspring a box on the ears then and there. A box on the ears! Oskar the lieutenant in the reserve! Midday in the centre of the town! So it is not particularly remarkable that the story was known all over the town the very same evening. It is already in some of the papers to-day. The Jewish ones leave it severely alone, except for a few scandal-mongering rags, the Anti-Semitic ones of course go for it hot and strong. The Christliche Volksbote is the best, and insists on both the Ehrenbergs being brought before a jury for sacrilege or blasphemy. Oskar is said to have travelled off, no one knows where, for the time being."

"A nice family!" said Anna with conviction.

George could not help laughing against his will. "My dear girl, Else is really absolutely innocent of the whole business."

The bell rang for the second time. They went into the dining-room and took their places at a little table by the window which was always laid for them alone. Scarcely more than a dozen visitors were sitting at the long table in the middle of the room, mostly Englishmen and Frenchmen, and also a man no longer in the first flush of youth, who had been there for two days and whom George took for an Austrian officer in mufti. Anyway he bothered about him as little as he did about the others. George had put Heinrich's letter in his pocket. It occurred to him that he had not yet read it through to the end, and he took it out again over the coffee and perused the remainder.

"What more does he write?" asked Anna.

"Nothing special," answered George. "About people who probably wouldn't interest you particularly. He seems to have got in again with his café set; more in fact than he likes and clearly more than he owns up to."

"He'll fit in all right," said Anna flippantly.

George smiled reflectively. "It is a funny set anyway."

"And what is the news with them?" asked Anna.

George had put the letter down by the cup and now looked at it. "Little Winternitz... you know... the fellow who once recited his poems to me and Heinrich last winter... is going to Berlin as reader to a newly-founded theatre. And Gleissner, the man who stared at us once so in the museum...."

"Oh yes, that abominable fellow with the eyeglass."

"Well, he declares that he is going to give up writing to devote himself exclusively to sport...."

"To sport?"

"Yes, quite a sport of his own. He plays with human souls."

"What?"

"Just listen." He read:

"This buffoon is now asserting that he is simultaneously engaged in the solution of the two following psychological problems, which supplement each other in quite an ingenious way. The first is to bring a young and innocent creature to the lowest depth of depravity, while the second is to make a prostitute into a saint, as he puts it. He promises that he will not rest until the first one finishes up in a brothel, and the second one in a cloister."

"A nice lot," remarked Anna and got up from the table.

"How the sound carries over here," said George and followed her into the grounds.

A dark-blue day, heavy with the sun, was resting on the tops of the trees. They stood for a while by the low balustrade which separated the garden from the street and looked over the lake to the mountains looming behind silver-grey veils that fluttered in the sunlight. They then walked deeper into the grounds, where the shade was cooler and darker, and as they walked arm-in-arm over the softly-crunching gravel along the high brown ivy-grown walls, and looked in at the old houses with their narrow windows, they chatted about the news that had arrived that day, and for the first time a slight anxiety rose up in their minds at the thought that they would so soon have to leave the friendly secrecy of foreign lands for home, where even the ordinary stereotyped day seemed full of hidden dangers. They sat down beneath the plane-tree at the white lacquered table. This place had always been kept free for them, as though it had been reserved. The newly-arrived

Austrian gentleman, however, had sat there yesterday afternoon, but driven away by a disapproving glance of Anna's had gone away after a polite salutation.

George hurried up to his room and fetched a few books for Anna and a volume of Goethe's poems and the manuscript of his quintette for himself. They both sat there, read, worked, looked up at times, smiled at each other, exchanged a few words, peered again into their books, looked over the balustrade into the open, and felt peace in their souls and summer in the air. They heard the fountain plashing quite near them behind the bushes, while a few drops fell upon the surface of the water. Frequently the wheels of a carriage would crunch along on the other side of the high wall, at times faint distant whistles would sound from the lake, and less frequently human voices would ring into the garden from the road along the bank. The day, drunken to the full with sunlight, lay heavy on the tree-tops. Later on the noise and the voices increased in volume and number with the gentle wind which was wafted from the lake every afternoon. The beat of the waves on the shore was more audible. The cries of the boatman resounded: on the other side of the wall there rang out the singing of young people. Tiny drops from the fountain were sprinkled around. The breath of approaching evening woke once more human beings, land and water.

Steps were heard on the gravel. Therese, still in white, came quickly through the avenue. George got up, went a few steps to meet her and shook hands. Anna wanted to get up, too, but Therese would not allow it, embraced her, gave her a kiss on the cheek and sat down by her side. "How beautiful it is here!" she exclaimed; "but haven't I come too early?"

"What an idea! I'm really awfully glad," replied Anna.

Therese considered her with a scrutinising smile and took hold of both her hands. "Well, your appearance is reassuring," she said.

"I am very well, as a matter of fact," replied Anna, "and you look as if you were too," she joked good-humouredly.

George's eyes rested on Therese, who was again dressed in white, as she had been in the morning, though now more smartly in English embroidered linen, with a string of light pink corals round her bare throat.

While the two women were discussing the strange coincidence of their meeting George got up to give the orders for dinner. When he returned to the garden the two others were no longer there. He saw Therese on the balcony with her back leaning against the railing, talking with Anna, who was invisible and was presumably in the depths of the room. He felt in good form and walked up and down the avenue, allowed melodies to sing themselves within him, was conscious of his youth and happiness, threw an occasional glance up to the balcony or towards the street, beyond the balustrade, and at last saw Demeter Stanzides arriving. He went to meet him. "Glad to see you," he cried out in welcome from the garden gate. "The ladies are upstairs in the room but will be turning up soon. Would you like to have a look at the grounds in the meanwhile?"

"Delighted."

They went on walking together.

"Do you intend to stay much longer in Lugano?" asked George.

"No, we go to-morrow to Bellaggio, from there to Lake Maggiore, Isola Bella. A really good time never lasts. We have got to be home again in a fortnight."

"Such short leave?"

"Oh, it is not on my account, but Therese has got to go back. I am quite a free man. I have already sent in my papers."

"So you seriously mean to retire to your estate?"

"My estate?"

"Yes, I heard something to that effect at Ehrenbergs'."

"But I haven't got the estate yet, you see. It is simply in the stage of negotiations."

"And where are you going to buy one? if it is not a rude question."

"Where the foxes say good-night to each other. The last place you would think of. On the Hungarian-Croatian frontier, very lonely and remote but very remarkable. I have a certain sympathy for the district. Youthful memories. I spent three years there as a lieutenant. Of course I think I shall grow young again there. Well, who knows?"

"A fine property?"

"Not bad. I saw it again two months ago. I knew it of course in the old days, it then belonged to Count Jaczewicz, finally to a manufacturer. Then his wife died. He now feels lonely down there and wants to get rid of it."

"I don't know," said George, "but I imagine the neighbourhood a little melancholy."

"Melancholy! Well, it seems to me that at a certain period of one's life every neighbourhood acquires a melancholy appearance." And he looked round the balcony, as though to evolve from his surroundings a new proof of the truth of his words.

"At what period?"

"Well, when one begins to get old."

George smiled. Demeter struck him as so handsome and as still young in spite of the grey hairs on his temple. "How old are you then, Herr Stanzides? if it isn't a rude question."

"Thirty-seven. I don't say I am old, but I am getting old. Men usually begin to talk about getting old when they have been old for a long time."

They sat down on the seat at the end of the garden, just where it runs into the wall. They had a view of the hotel and of the great terrace on the garden. The upper storeys with their verandahs were hidden from them by the foliage of the trees. George offered Demeter a cigarette and took one himself. And both were silent for a while.

"I heard that you, too, are leaving Vienna," said Demeter.

"Yes, that's very probable... if of course I get a job in some opera. Well, even if it isn't this year it is bound to be next."

Demeter sat with legs crossed over each other, gripped one of them tightly by the knee, and nodded. "Yes, yes," he said, and blew the smoke slowly through his lips in driblets. "It is really a fine thing to have a talent. In that case one is bound to feel a bit different sometimes, even about beginning to grow old. That is really the one thing I could envy a man for."

"You have no reason to at all. Anyway, people with talent are not really to be envied. At any rate, only people with genius. And I envy them probably even more than you do. But I think that talents like yours are something much more definite, something much sounder so to speak. Of course one doesn't always happen to be in form.... But at any rate, one always achieves something quite respectable if one can do anything at all, while people in my line, if they are not in form are no better than old age pensioners."

Demeter laughed. "Yes, but an artistic talent like yours lasts longer and develops more and more as the years go on. Take Beethoven, for instance. The Ninth Symphony is really the finest thing he did. Don't you think so. And what about the second part of Faust?... While we are bound to go back as the years go on — we can't help it — even the Beethovens amongst us. And how early it begins, apart from quite rare exceptions! I was at my prime for instance at twenty-five. I've never done again what I had in me at twenty-five. Yes, my dear Baron, those were times."

“Come, I remember seeing you win a race two years ago against Buzgo, who was the favourite then.... Why, I even betted on him....”

“My dear Baron,” interrupted Stanzides, “you take it from me, I know the reason why I left off improving. One can feel a thing like that oneself. And that’s why no one knows so well as the sportsman when he’s beginning to grow old. And then no further training is any good. The whole thing then becomes purely artificial. And if any one tells you that that’s not the case, then he’s simply... but here come the ladies.”

They both got up. Therese and Anna were approaching arm-in-arm, one all in white, the other in a black dress, which falling to the ground in wide folds completely hid her figure. The couples met by the fountain.

Demeter kissed Anna’s hand. “What a beautiful spot I have the good fortune to see you again in, my dear lady.”

“It is a pleasant surprise to me, too,” replied Anna, “quite apart from the scenery.”

“Do you know,” said George to Anna, “that these good people are travelling off again to-morrow?”

“Yes, Therese has told me.”

“We want to see as much as possible,” explained Demeter, “and so far as my recollection goes the other lakes in upper Italy are even more magnificent than the one here.”

“I don’t know anything about the others,” said Anna. “We haven’t done them yet.”

“Well, perhaps you will take the opportunity,” said Demeter, “and make up a party with us for a little tour: Bellaggio, Pallanza, Isola Bella.”

Anna shook her head. “It would be very nice but unfortunately I can’t get about enough. Yes, I am incredibly lazy. There are whole days when I never go out of the grounds. But if George fancies running away from me for a day or two, I don’t mind at all.”

“I have no intention at all of running away from you,” said George. He threw a quick glance at Therese, whose eyes were sparkling and laughing.

They all strolled slowly through the garden while it gradually became dusk, and chatted about the places they had recently seen. When they came back to the table under the plane-tree it was laid for dinner and the fairy-lights were burning in the glass holders. The waiter was just bringing the Asti in a bucket. Anna sat down on the seat, which had the trunk of the plane-tree for its back. Therese sat opposite her and George and Demeter on either side.

The meal was served and the wine poured out. George inquired after their Viennese acquaintances. Demeter told them that Willy Eissler had brought back from his trip some brilliant caricatures both of hunters and of beasts. Old Ehrenberg had bought the pictures.

“Do you know about the Oskar affair yet?” said George.

“What affair?”

“Oh, the affair with his father in front of St. Michael’s Church.” He remembered that he had thought of telling Demeter the story some time back before the ladies had appeared, but that he had thought it right to suppress it. It was the wine, no doubt, which now loosened his tongue against his will. He told them briefly what Heinrich had written him.

“But this is an extremely sad business,” said Demeter, very much moved, and all the others immediately felt more serious.

“Why is it a sad business?” asked Therese. “I think it is enough to make one laugh till one cried.”

“My dear Therese, you don’t consider the consequences it may have for the young man.”

“Good gracious, I know well enough. It will make him impossible in a certain set, but that won’t do more than make him realise what a silly ass he has been up to the present.”

“Well,” said George, “if Oskar really is one of those people who can be made to realise anything.... But I really don’t think so.”

“Apart from the fact, my dear Therese,” added Demeter, “that what you call realising doesn’t necessarily mean seeing things in their proper light. All sets of people have their prejudices. Even you are not free from them.”

“And what prejudices have we got, I should like to know?” cried Therese, and emptied her glass of wine angrily. “We only want to clear away certain prejudices, particularly the prejudice that there is this privileged caste who regard it as a special honour....”

“Excuse, me, Therese dear, but you are not at a meeting now, and I am afraid that the applause at the conclusion of your speech will turn out much fainter than you are accustomed to.”

“Look here,” Therese turned to Anna, “this is how a cavalry officer argues.”

“I beg your pardon,” said George, “the whole business has scarcely anything at all to do with prejudices. A box on the ears in the public street, even though it is from one’s own father.... I don’t think one has got to be an officer in the reserve or a student.”

“That box on the ears,” cried Therese, “gives me a real sense of relief. It represents the well-merited conclusion of a ridiculous and superfluous existence.”

“Conclusion! We hope it’s not that,” said Demeter.

“My letter says,” replied George, “that Oskar has travelled off, no one knows where.”

“If I am sorry for any one in the business,” said Therese, “it is certainly for the old man, who, good-hearted fellow that he is, is probably regretting this very day the unpleasant position in which he has placed his beastly snob of a son.”

“Good-hearted!” exclaimed Demeter. “A millionaire! A factory owner!... My dear Therese...!”

“Yes, it does happen sometimes. He happens to be one of those people who are at one with us at the bottom of their soul. You remember the evening, Demeter, when you had the pleasure of seeing me for the first time. Do you know why I was at Ehrenbergs’ then?... And do you know the object for which he gave me straight away a thousand gulden...? To....” She bit her lips. “I mustn’t say, that was the condition.”

Suddenly Demeter got up and bowed to somebody who had just passed. It was the Austrian gentleman who had arrived yesterday. He lifted his hat and vanished in the darkness of the garden.

“Do you know that man?” asked George, after a few seconds. “I also seem to know him, but who is it?”

“The Prince of Guastalla,” said Demeter.

“Really!” exclaimed Therese involuntarily, and her eyes pierced into the darkness.

“What are you looking at him for?” said Demeter. “He is just a man like any one else.”

“He is supposed to be banished from Court,” said George, “isn’t he?”

“I know nothing about that,” replied Demeter, “but he is certainly not a favourite there. He recently published a pamphlet about certain conditions in our army, particularly the life of the officers in the provinces. It went very much against him, although as a matter of fact there is nothing really bad in it.”

“He should have applied to me about that,” said Therese. “I could have given him a tip or two.”

“My dear child,” said Demeter deprecatingly, “what you are probably referring to again is simply an exceptional case. You shouldn’t jump at once into generalities.”

“I am not generalising, but a case like that is sufficient to damn the whole....”

“Don’t make a speech, Therese....”

“I am speaking about Leo.” Therese turned to George. “It is really awful what he has been going through this year.”

George suddenly remembered that Therese was Leo's sister, as though it were a most remarkable thing which he had completely forgotten. Did he know that she was here and whom she was with?

Demeter bit his lips somewhat nervously.

"There is an Anti-Semitic First-Lieutenant, you know," said Therese, "who rags him in a particularly mean way because he knows how Leo despises him."

George nodded. He knew all about it.

"My dear child," said Demeter, "I can't make it out, as I have already told you several times. I happen to know First-Lieutenant Sefranek, and I assure you it is possible to get on with him. He is not particularly clever, and it may be quite right to say that he has got no particular liking for the Israelites, but after all one must admit that there are a lot of so-called opprobrious Anti-Semitic expressions which really have no significance at all, and which, so far as my experience goes, are used by Jews quite as much as by Christians. And your worthy brother certainly suffers from a morbid sensitiveness."

"Sensitiveness is never morbid," retorted Therese. "It is only lack of sensitiveness which is a disease, and the most loathsome one I know as a matter of fact. It is notorious that I am as far apart as possible from my brother in my political views. You know that best of all, George. I hate Jewish bankers quite as much as feudal landed proprietors, and orthodox Rabbis quite as much as Catholic priests; but if a man feels himself superior to me because he belongs to another creed or another race than I do, and being conscious of his greater power makes me feel that superiority, I would.... Well, I don't know what I would do to a man like that. But anyway I should quite understand Leo if he were to take the next opportunity of going tooth-and-nail for Herr Sefranek."

"My dear child," said Demeter, "if you have the slightest influence with your brother you should try and stop this tooth-and-nail business at any price. In my view by far the best thing to do in a case like that is to go about things in the respectable, I mean the regulation way. It is really not at all true that that never does any good. The superior officers are mostly quiet people, at any rate they are correct and...."

"But Leo did that long ago... as far back as February. He went to the Major, the Major was very nice to him, and as appears from many indications gave the First-Lieutenant a good talking to; the only thing is it unfortunately wasn't the slightest use. On the contrary, the next chance he had the First-Lieutenant made a special point of starting his beastly tricks again, and he is continuing them with the most refined malice. I assure you, Baron, I am afraid every single day that some misfortune will happen."

Demeter shook his head. "We live in a mad age. I assure you" — he turned to George— "First-Lieutenant Sefranek is no more of an Anti-Semite than you or I. He visits at Jewish houses. I even know that he was extremely intimate for years with a Jewish regimental doctor. It really seems as though everybody were going mad."

"You may be right in that," said Therese.

"Oh, well, Leo is so reasonable," said George. "He is so sensible in spite of all his temperament that I am convinced that he won't let himself be swept away by any foolish impulse. After all he must know that it will all be over in a few months; one can manage to put up with it for that time."

"Do you know, by-the-by, Baron," said Therese, while following the example of the men she took a cigarette out of a box which the waiter had brought, "do you know that Leo was quite charmed with your compositions?"

"What, charmed?" said George, while he gave Therese a light. "I really hadn't noticed it at all."

"Well, he liked some things," qualified Therese, "and that's practically the same as somebody else being delighted with them."

“Have you composed anything on your trip?” asked Demeter courteously.

“Only a few songs.”

“I suppose we shall hear them in the autumn?” said Demeter.

“Good gracious, don’t let’s talk about the autumn,” said Therese. “We may be dead or in prison before then.”

“Well, if one really wants to one can manage to avoid the latter alternative,” exclaimed Demeter.

Therese shrugged her shoulders. George was sitting near her and believed he could feel the warmth of her body. Lights were shining from the hotel windows and a long reddish strip reached the table at which the two couples were sitting.

“I suggest,” said George, “that we make the best of the fine evening and go for another walk along the shore.”

“Or take a boat,” exclaimed Therese.

They all agreed. George ran up to the room to fetch wraps. When he came down again he found the others standing by the door of the grounds ready to start. He helped Anna into her light-grey cloak, hung his own long overcoat over Therese’s shoulders and kept a dark-green rug over his arm. They went slowly through the avenue to the place where the boats were moored. Two boatmen took the party with quick strokes of their oars out of the darkness of the shore into the black shining water. The mountains towered up to the sky, monstrous and gigantic. The stars were not very numerous. Tiny bluish-grey clouds hung in the air. The rowers sat on two cross benches; in the middle of the boat on narrow seats the two couples sat opposite each other: George and Anna, Demeter and Therese. All were quite silent at first, it was only after some minutes that George broke the silence. He told them the name of the mountain which separated the lake from the South, drew their attention to a village, which though it seemed infinitely far away as it nestled up to the slope of a cliff could nevertheless be reached in a quarter of an hour; he recognised the white shining house on the height above Lugano as the hotel in which Demeter and Therese were staying and told them about a walk far into the country between sunny vineyards which he had taken the other day.

While he spoke Anna kept hold of his hand underneath the rug. Demeter and Therese sat next to each other staidly and correctly, and not at all like lovers who had only found each other a short time ago. It was only now that George gradually recovered his fancy for Therese, which had almost vanished during her loud violent speechifying.

How long will this Demeter affair last? he thought. Will it be over when the autumn comes or will it after all last as long or longer than my affair with Anna? Will this row on the dark lake be some time in the future just a memory of something that has completely vanished, just like my row on the Veldeser Lake with that peasant girl, which now comes into my mind again for the first time for years?... Or like my voyage with Grace across the sea? How strange! Anna is holding my hand, I am pressing it, and who knows if she isn’t feeling at this very minute something similar with regard to Demeter to what I am feeling about Therese? No, I am sure not.... She carries a child under her heart which has already quickened.... That’s why.... Hang it all!... Why, it’s my child as well.... Our child is now going for a row on the lake of Lugano.... Shall I tell it one day that it went for a row round the lake of Lugano before it was born? How will it all turn out? We shall be back in Vienna again in a few days. Does Vienna really exist? It will only slowly begin to come into existence again as we train back.... Yes, that’s how it is.... As soon as I’m home work will start seriously. I shall remain quietly at my home in Vienna and just visit Anna from time to time; I won’t live with her in the country.... Or at all events only just before... and the autumn.... Shall I be in Detmold? And where will Anna be? And the child?... With strangers somewhere in the country. How improbable the whole thing seems!...

But it was also very improbable a year ago to-day that I and Stanzides should go for a row on the lake of Lugano with Fräulein Anna Rosner and Fräulein Therese Golowski respectively. And now the whole thing couldn't be more of a matter of course.... He suddenly heard with abnormal clearness, as though he had just woken up, Demeter's voice quite near him.

"When does our boat leave to-morrow?"

"Nine o'clock in the morning," replied Therese.

"She maps out the plan of campaign you know," said Demeter. "I don't need to bother about anything."

The moon suddenly shone out over the lake.

It seemed as though it had waited behind the mountains and were now coming out to say goodbye. That infinitely distant village by the mountain-slope suddenly lay quite close in all its whiteness. The boat beached. Therese got up. She was shrouded in the night and looked strikingly tall. George sprang out of the boat and helped her to disembark. He felt her cool fingers, which did not tremble, in his hand, but moved softly as though on purpose, and caught the breath from her lips quite close. Demeter got out after her, then came Anna, tired and awkward. The boatman thanked them for their generous tip and both couples started to walk homewards. The Prince was sitting on a seat in a long dark cloak in the avenue along the bank. He was smoking a cigar, seemed to be looking out on to the nocturnal lake and turned away his head with the obvious intention of avoiding being saluted.

"A man like that could tell a tale," said Therese to George, with whom she had fallen further and further behind, while Demeter and Anna went on in front of them.

"So you are going back to Vienna as soon as all that?" asked George.

"A fortnight. Do you think that so soon? At any rate you will be home before us, won't you?"

"Yes, we shall leave in a few days. We can't put it off any longer. Besides, we shall have to break the journey a few times. Anna doesn't stand travelling well."

"Do you know yet that I found the villa for Anna just before I left?" said Therese.

"Really, you? Did you go looking, too?"

"Yes, I went into the country a few times with my mother. It is a small fairly old house in Salmansdorf with a beautiful garden, which leads straight out to the fields and forest, and the bit of ground in front of the house is quite overgrown.... Anna will tell you more about it. I believe it is the last house in the place. Then there comes an inn, but a fair distance away from it."

"I must have overlooked that house on my house-hunting expeditions in the spring."

"Clearly, or you would have taken it. There is a little clay figure standing on a lawn near the garden hedge."

"Can't remember. But do you know, Therese, it is really nice of you to have taken all this trouble for us, as well as your mother. More than nice." He thought of adding "when one takes your strenuous life into consideration," but suppressed it.

"Why are you surprised?" asked Therese. "I am very fond of Anna."

"Do you know what I once heard some one say about you?" replied George after a short pause.

"Well, what?"

"That you would either finish up on the scaffold or as a princess."

"That's a phrase of Doctor Berthold Stauber. He once told it me himself, you know. He is very proud of it, but it is sheer nonsense."

"The betting at present is certainly more on the princess."

"Who says so? The princess dream will soon be over!"

“Dream?”

“Yes, I am just beginning to wake up. It is rather like the morning air streaming into a bedroom.”

“And then I suppose the other dream will begin?”

“What do you mean, the other dream?”

“This is what I take to be the case with you. When you are in the public eye again, making speeches, sacrificing yourself for some cause or other, then at some moment or other the whole thing strikes you like a dream, doesn’t it? And you think real life is somewhere else.”

“There is really something in what you say.”

At this moment Demeter and Anna, who were standing by the garden gate, turned round towards them both and immediately took the broad avenue towards the entrance of the hotel. George and Therese also went on further, unseen outside the railing, into the darkest depths of the shade.

George suddenly seized hold of his companion’s hand. As though astonished she turned towards him and both now stood opposite each other, enveloped by the darkness and closer than they could understand. They did not know how... they scarcely meant to, but their lips rested on each other for a short moment that was more charged with the doleful joy of deception than with any other emotion. They then went on, silent, unsatisfied, desirous, and stepped through the garden door.

The two others, who were in front of the hotel, now turned round and came to meet them.

Therese quickly said to George: “Of course you don’t come with us?”

George nodded slightly. They were now all standing in the broad quiet light of the arc-lamps.

“It was really a beautiful evening,” said Demeter, kissing Anna’s hand.

“Goodbye then till Vienna,” said Therese and embraced Anna.

Demeter turned to George. “I hope we shall see each other to-morrow morning on the boat.”

“Possibly, but I won’t promise.”

“Goodbye,” said Therese and shook hands with George.

She and Demeter then turned round to go away.

“Are you going with them?” asked Anna, as they went through the door into the lounge, where men and women were sitting, smoking, drinking, talking.

“What an idea?” replied George. “I never thought of it.”

“Herr Baron,” suddenly called some one behind him. It was the porter, who held a telegram in his hand.

“What is this?” asked George, somewhat alarmed, opening it quickly. “Oh, how awful!” he exclaimed.

“What is it?” asked Anna.

He read it out while she looked at the piece of paper. “Oskar Ehrenberg tried to commit suicide early this morning in the forest at Neuhaus. Shot himself in the temples, little hope of saving his life, Heinrich.”

Anna shook her head. They went up the stairs in silence and into Anna’s room. The balcony door was wide open. George stepped into the open air. A heavy perfume of magnolias and roses streamed in out of the darkness. Not a trace of the lake was visible. The mountains towered up as though they had grown out of the abyss. Anna came up to George. He laid his arm on her shoulder and loved her very much. It was as though the serious event of which he had just had tidings, had compelled him to realise the true significance of his own experiences. He knew once more that there was nothing more important for him in the whole world than the well-being of this beloved woman who was standing with him on the balcony and who was to bear him a child.

VI

WHEN GEORGE STEPPED on to the summer heat of the pavement out of the cool central restaurant where he had been accustomed to take his meals for some weeks, and started on his way to Heinrich's apartment, his mind was made up to start his trip into the mountains within the next few days. Anna was quite prepared for it, and appreciating that the monotonous life of the last few weeks was beginning to make him feel bored and mentally restless had even herself advised him to go away for a few days.

They had returned to Vienna six weeks ago on a rainy evening and George had taken Anna straight from the station to the villa, where Anna's mother and Frau Golowski had been waiting for the overdue travellers for the last two hours in a large but fairly empty room, with a dilapidated yellowish carpet under the dismal light of a hanging lamp. The door on to the garden verandah stood open. Outside the pattering rain fell on to the wooden floor and the warm odour of moist leaves and grass swept in. George inspected the resources of the house by the light of a candle which Frau Golowski carried in front of him, while Anna reclined exhausted in the corner of the large sofa covered with fancy calico and was only able to give tired answers to her mother's questions. George had soon taken leave of Anna with mingled emotion and relief, stepped with her mother into the carriage which was waiting outside, and while they rode over the dripping streets into the town he had given the embarrassed woman a faithful if forced account of the unimportant events of the last days of their trip. He was at home an hour after midnight, refrained from waking up Felician, who was already asleep, and with an undreamt-of joy stretched himself out in his long-lost bed for his first sleep at home after so many nights.

Since then he had gone out into the country to see Anna nearly every day. If he did not feel tempted to make little trips round the summer resorts in the neighbourhood he could easily get to her in an hour on his cycle. But he more frequently took the horse tram and would then walk through the little villages till he came to the low green painted railings behind which stood the modest country house with its three-cornered wooden gable in the small slightly sloping garden. Frequently he would choose a way which ran above the village between garden and fields and would enjoy climbing up the green slope till he came to a seat on the border of the forest, from which he could get a clear view of the straggling little place lying in the tiny valley. He saw from here straight on to the roof beneath which Anna lived, deliberately allowed his gentle longing for the love who was so near him to grow gradually more and more vivid till he hurried down, opened the tiny door and stepped over the gravel straight through the garden towards the house. Frequently, in the more sultry hours of the afternoon, when Anna was still asleep, he would sit in the covered wooden verandah which ran along the back of the house in a comfortable easy-chair covered with embroidered calico, take out of his pocket a book he had brought with him and read. Then Frau Golowski in her neat simple dark dress would step out of the dark inner room and in her gentle somewhat melancholy voice, with a touch of motherly kindness playing around her mouth, would report to him about Anna's health, particularly whether she had had a good appetite and if she had had a proper walk up and down the garden. When she had finished she always had something to see to in the kitchen or about the house and disappeared. Then while George was going on with his reading a fine St. Bernard dog which belonged to people in the neighbourhood would come out, greet George with serious tearful eyes, allow him to stroke her short-haired skin and lie down gratefully at his feet. Later, when a certain stern whistle which the animal knew well rang out, it would get up with all the clumsiness of its condition, seem to apologise by means of a melancholy look for not being able to stay longer and slink away. Children laughed and shouted in the garden next door. Now and again an indiarubber ball came over the wall. A pale nursemaid would then appear at the bottom gate and shyly request to have the ball thrown back again. Finally, when it had grown cooler, Anna's face would show itself at the window that opened on to the verandah, her quiet blue eyes would greet George, and soon she would come out herself in a light house-dress. They would then walk up and down the garden along the faded lilac-bushes and the blooming currant-bushes, usually on the left side, which was bounded by the open meadow, and they would take their rest on the white seat close to the top end of the garden, underneath the pear-tree. It was only when supper was served that Frau Golowski would appear again, shyly take her place at the table and tell them if asked all the news about her family; about Therese, who had now gone on to the staff of a Socialist journal; about Leo, who being less occupied by his military duties than before was enthusiastically pursuing his mathematical studies; and about her husband, who while he looked on with resignation from the corner of a smoky café at the chess battles of the indefatigable players, always saw new vistas of regular employment display themselves only to close again immediately. Frau Rosner only paid an occasional visit and usually went away soon after George's appearance. On one occasion, on a Sunday afternoon, the father had come as well and had a conversation with George about the weather and scenery, just as though they had met by chance at the house of a mutual acquaintance who happened to be ill. It was only to humour her parents that Anna kept herself in complete retirement in the villa. For she herself had grown to lose all consciousness of any false position, feeling just as though she had been George's wedded wife, and when the latter, tired of the monotonous evenings, asked her for permission to bring Heinrich along sometimes she had agreeably surprised him by immediately expressing her agreement.

Heinrich was the only one of George's more intimate friends who still remained in town in these oppressive July days. Felician, who had been as affectionate with his brother since his return home as though the comradeship of their boyhood had been kindled afresh, had just taken his diplomatic examination and was staying with Ralph Skelton on the North Sea. Else Ehrenberg, who had spoken to George once soon after his return by her brother's sick-bed in the sanatorium, had been for a long time at Auhof am See with her mother. Oskar too, whom his unfortunate attempt at suicide had cost his right eye, though it was said to have saved him his lieutenant's commission, had left Vienna with a black shade over his blinded eye. Demeter Stanzides, Willy Eissler, Guido Schönstein, Breitner, all were away, and even Nürnberger, who had declared so solemnly that he did not mean to leave the town this year, had suddenly vanished.

George had visited him before any one else after he came back, to bring him some flowers from his sister's grave in Cadenabbia. He had read Nürnberger's novel on his journey. The scene was laid in a period which was now almost past; the same period, so it seemed to George, as that of which old Doctor Stauber had once spoken to him. Nürnberger had thrown a grim light over that sickly world of lies in which adult men passed for mature, old men for experienced, and people who did not offend against any written law for righteous; in which love of freedom, patriotism and humanitarianism passed ipso facto for virtue, even though they had grown out of the rotten soil of thoughtlessness or cowardice. He had chosen for the hero of his book a sterling and energetic man who, carried away by the hollow phrases of the period, saw things as they were from the height which he had reached and seized with horror at the realization of his own dizzy ascent, precipitated himself into the void out of which he had come. George was considerably astonished that a man who had created this strong and resounding piece of work should subsequently confine himself to casual cynical comments on the progress of the age, and it was only a phrase of Heinrich's to the effect that wrath but not loathing was fated to be fertile that made him understand why Nürnberger's work had been stopped for ever. The lonely hour in the Cadenabbia cemetery on that dark blue late afternoon had made as strange and deep an impression upon George as though he had actually known and appreciated the being by whose grave he stood. It had hurt him that the gold lettering on the grey stone should have grown faint and that the beds of turf should have been overgrown with weeds, and after he had plucked a few yellow-blue pansies for his friend he had gone away with genuine emotion. He had cast a glance from the other side of the cemetery door through the open window of the death-chamber, and saw a female body on a bier between high burning candles, covered with a black pall as far as her lips, while the daylight and candlelight ran into one another over its small waxen face.

Nürnberger had not been unmoved by this sympathetic attention on the part of George and on that day they spoke to each other more intimately than they had ever done before.

The house in which Nürnberger lived was in a narrow gloomy street which led out of the centre of the town and mounted in terraces towards the Danube. It was ancient, narrow and high. Nürnberger's apartment was on the fifth and top storey, which was reached by a staircase with numerous turns. In the low though spacious room into which George stepped out of a dark hall stood old but well-preserved furniture, while an odour of camphor and lavender came insistently out of the alcove in the recess in front of which a pale green curtain had been let down. Portraits of Nürnberger's parents in their youth hung on the wall together with brown engravings of landscapes after the Dutch masters. Numerous old photographs in wooden frames stood on the sideboard. Nürnberger fetched a portrait of his dead sister out of a secretary-drawer where it lay beneath some letters that had been yellowed by time. It showed her as a girl of eighteen in a child's costume which seemed to have a kind of historical atmosphere, holding a ball in her hand, and standing in front of a hedge, behind which there towered a background of cliffs. Nürnberger introduced all these unknown faraway and dead persons to his friend to-day by means of their portraits, and spoke of them in a tone which seemed to make the gulf of time between the then and the now both wider and deeper.

George's glance often swept out over the narrow street towards the grey masonry of ancient houses. He saw small cobwebbed panes with all kinds of household utensils behind them. Flower-pots with miserable plants stood on a window-ledge, while fragments of bottles, broken-up barrels, scraps of paper, mouldy vegetables lay in a gutter between two houses, a battered pipe ran down between all this rubbish and disappeared behind a chimney. Other chimneys were visible to right and left, the back of a yellowish stone gable could be seen, towers reared up towards the pale blue heaven and a light grey spire with a broken stone cupola which George knew very well, appeared unexpectedly near. Automatically his eyes tried to find the quarter where he might be able to fix the position of the house in whose entrance the two stone giants bore on their powerful shoulders the armorial bearings of a vanished stock, and in which his child, which was to come into the world in a few weeks, had been begotten.

George gave an account of his trip. He felt the spirit of this hour so deeply that he would have thought himself petty if he had let the matter rest at half-truths. But Nürnberger had known the story, and in its entirety too, long ago, and when George showed a little astonishment at this he smiled mockingly.

"Don't you still remember," he asked, "that morning when we looked over a summer residence in Grinzing?"

"Of course."

"And don't you remember too that a woman with a little child in her arms took us round the house and garden?"

"Yes."

"Before we went away the child held out its arms towards you, and you looked at it with a certain amount of emotion in your expression."

“And that’s what made you conclude that I....”

“Oh well, you know, you’re not the man to go in for thrills over the sight of small children, a bit unwashed, too, into the bargain, if they are not linked on to associations of a personal character.”

“One must beware of you,” said George jestingly, but not without some sense of uneasiness.

The slight irritation, which he always felt again and again at Nürnberger’s superior manner, was far from preventing him from cultivating his society more and more. He frequently fetched him from home to go for walks in the streets and parks, and he felt a sense of satisfaction, a sense in fact of personal triumph, when he managed to draw him from the rarefied regions of bitter wisdom into the gentler fields of affectionate intercourse. George’s walks with him had become such a pleasant habit that he felt as though his daily life had been impoverished when he found one morning that Nürnberger’s apartment was closed. Some days afterwards came a card of apology from Salzburg, which was also signed by a married couple, a manufacturer and his wife, good-natured cheery people, whom George had once got to know slightly through Nürnberger in Graben. According to Heinrich’s malicious description the common friend of this married couple had been dragged down the stairs, of course after a desperate resistance, made to sit down in a carriage and been transported to the station more or less like a prisoner. According to Heinrich, too, Nürnberger had several friends of this innocent kind who felt the need of getting the celebrated cynic to let a few drops of his malice trickle into their palatable cup of life, while Nürnberger on his side liked to recuperate in their free-and-easy society from the strain of his acquaintances in literary and psychological circles.

The meeting with Heinrich had meant a disillusionment to George. After the first words of greeting the author had as usual only spoken about himself, and that, too, in tones of the deepest contempt. He had come at last to the conclusion that he did not really possess any talent but only intelligence, though that of course to an enormous degree. The thing about himself that he cursed the most violently was the lack of harmony in the various phases of his character, which as he well knew not only occasioned suffering to himself but to all who came near him. He was heartless and sentimental, flippant and melancholic, sensitive and callous, an impossible companion and yet drawn towards his fellow-beings... at any rate at times. A person with such characteristics could only justify his existence by producing something immense, and if the masterpiece which he felt obliged to create did not appear on the scene very soon he would feel that as a decent man he would be obliged to shoot himself. But he was not a decent man.... There lay the rub. “Of course you won’t shoot yourself,” thought George, “principally because you haven’t got the pluck to do so.” Of course he did not give expression to this thought but on the contrary was very sympathetic. He talked of the moods to which after all every artist is liable, and inquired kindly about the material conditions of Heinrich’s life. It soon transpired that he wasn’t in such a bad way by any means. He was even leading a life which as it appeared to George was freer from anxiety than it had ever been before. The maintenance of his mother and sisters for the ensuing years had been assured by a small legacy. In spite of all the hostile influences which were at work against him the fame of his name was increasing from day to day. The miserable affair with the actress seemed to be finished once and for all, and a quite new relationship with a young lady which was as free and easy as could possibly be desired, was actually bringing a certain amount of gaiety into his life. Even his work was making good progress. The first act of the opera libretto was as good as ready, and he had made numerous notes for his political comedy. He intended next year to visit the sittings of Parliament and attend meetings, and coquetted with the admittedly childish fantastic plan of posing as a member of the social democratic party, trying to tack himself on to the leaders and getting himself taken on, if he could get the chance, as an active member of some organisation or other, simply so as to get a complete insight into the party machinery. Still, you know, when he had been talking to any one for five minutes on end, why he had got him absolutely. He would find in some casual word, whose significance would completely escape any one else, a kind of whirlwind which tore the veil from off the souls of men. His dream was to prove himself a master of imagination in his opera poem and a master of realism in his comedy, and thus show the world that he was equally at home both in heaven and on earth. At a subsequent meeting George got him to read as much of the first act of the opera as he had finished. He found the verses very singable and asked Heinrich to allow him to take the manuscript to Anna. Anna could not bring herself to fancy much what George read out to her; but he asserted, though without any real conviction, that what she felt was just the very longing for these verses to be set to music, and that that must necessarily strike her as a weakness.

When George came into Heinrich's room to-day the latter was sitting at the big table in the middle of the room, which was covered over with papers and letters. Written papers of all kinds lay about on the piano and on the ottoman. Heinrich still had a sheet of faded yellow paper in his hand when he got up and hailed George with the words, "Well, how goes the country?"

This was the way in which he was accustomed to inquire after Anna's health, a way which George felt afresh every single time to be unduly familiar.

"Quite well, thanks," he replied. "I have just come to ask you if perhaps you would care to come out there with me to-day."

"Oh yes, I should like to very much. The thing is, though, that I am just in the middle of putting various papers in order. I can't come before the evening about seven or so. Will that suit you?"

"Quite," said George. "But I see I am disturbing you," he added as he pointed to the littered table.

"Not at all," replied Heinrich. "I am only tidying up, as I just told you. They're my father's posthumous papers. Those there are letters to him and here are rough notes more or less like a diary, written for the most part during his parliamentary period. Tragic, I tell you! How that man loved his country! And how did they thank him? You've no idea of the refinement with which they drove him out of his party. A complicated network of intrigue, bigotry, brutality.... Thoroughly German, to put the matter in a nutshell."

George felt a sense of antagonism. "And he dares," he thought, "to hold forth about Anti-Semitism. Is he any better? any juster? Does he forget that I am a German myself...?"

Heinrich went on speaking. "But I will give this man a memorial.... He and no other shall be the hero of my political drama. He is the truly tragi-comic central figure which I have always been wanting."

George's antagonism became intensified. He felt a great desire to protect old Bermann against his son. "A tragi-comic figure," he repeated, almost aggressively.

"Yes," retorted Heinrich unhesitatingly, "a Jew who loves his country.... I mean in the way my father did, with a real feeling of solidarity, with real enthusiasm for the dynasty, is without the slightest question a tragi-comic figure. I mean... he belonged to that Liberalising epoch of the seventies and eighties when even shrewd men were overcome by the catch-words of the age. A man like that to-day would certainly appear merely comic. Yes, even if he had finished up by hanging himself on the first nail he came across I could not regard his fate as anything else."

"It is a mania of yours," replied George. "You really very often give one the impression that you have quite lost the capacity of seeing anything else in the world except the Jewish question, you always see it everywhere. If I were as discourteous as you happen to be at times, I would... you'll forgive me of course, say that you were suffering from persecution-mania."

"Persecution-mania..." replied Heinrich dully, as he looked at the wall. "I see, so you call it persecution-mania, that.... Oh well." And then he continued suddenly with clenched teeth: "I say, George, I want to ask you something on your conscience."

"I'm listening."

He placed himself straight in front of George, and with his eyes pierced his forehead. "Do you think there's a single Christian in the world, even taking the noblest, straightest and truest one you like, one single Christian who has not in some moment or other of spite, temper or rage, made at any rate mentally some contemptuous allusion to the Jewishness of even his best friend, his mistress or his wife, if they were Jews or of Jewish descent?" And without waiting for George's answer: "There isn't one, I assure you. You can try another test also if you like. Read for instance the letters of any celebrated and otherwise perfectly shrewd and excellent man and observe the passages which contain hostile and ironic expressions about his contemporaries. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred it simply deals with an individual without taking any account of his descent or creed. In the hundredth case, where the miserable victim has the misfortune to be a Jew, the writer will certainly not forget to mention that fact. That's just how the thing is, I can't help it. What you choose to call persecution-mania, my dear George, is in reality simply an extremely intense consciousness that has been kept continuously awake of a condition in which we Jews happen to find ourselves. And as for talking about persecution-mania, why it would be much more logical to talk about a mania for being hidden, a mania for being left alone, a mania for being safe; which though perhaps a less sensational form of disease is certainly a much more dangerous one for its victims. My father suffered from it, like many others of his generation. He at any rate made such a radical cure that he went mad in the process."

Deep furrows appeared on Heinrich's forehead and he looked again towards the wall, straight past George, who had sat down on the hard black leather ottoman.

"If that's your way of looking at things," replied George, "why, you have no other logical alternative but to join Leo Golowski...."

"And migrate to Palestine with him. Is that what you think? As a matter of symbolical politics or actually — what?" He laughed. "Have I ever said that I want to get away from here? That I would prefer to live anywhere else except here? Above all, have I ever said that I liked living among Jews? So far as I at any rate am concerned that would be a purely objective solution of an essentially subjective problem."

"I really think so also. And that's why, to tell the truth, I understand less than ever what you want, Heinrich. I had the impression last autumn, when you had your tussle with Golowski on the Sophienalp, that you looked at the matter far more hopefully."

"More hopefully?" repeated Heinrich in an injured tone.

"Yes. One felt bound to think then that you believed in the possibility of a gradual assimilation."

Heinrich contemptuously contracted the corners of his mouth. "Assimilation.... A phrase.... Yes, that'll come all right some time or other... in a very very long time. It won't come at all in the way many want it to — it won't come either in the way many are afraid it will.... Further, it won't be exactly assimilation... but perhaps something that beats in the heart of that particular word so to speak. Do you know what it will probably look like in the end? That we, we Jews I mean, have been a kind of ferment in the brewing of humanity — yes, perhaps that'll come out in anything from one to two thousand years from now. It is a consolation too. Don't you think so?" He laughed again.

"Who knows," said George reflectively, "if you won't be regarded as right — in a thousand years? But till then?"

"Why, my dear George, there won't be anything in the way of a solution of the question before then. In our time there won't be any solution, that's absolutely positive. No universal solution at any rate. It will rather be a case of a million different solutions. For it's just a question which for the time being every one has got to settle for himself as best he can. Every one must manage to find an escape for himself out of his vexation or out of his despair or out of his loathing, to some place or other where he can breathe again in freedom. Perhaps there are really people who would like to go as far as Jerusalem to find it... I only fear that many of them, once they arrive at their official goal, would then begin to realise that they had made an utter mistake. I don't think for a minute that migrations like that into the open should be gone in for in parties.... For the roads there do not run through the country outside but through our own selves. Every one's life simply depends on whether or not he finds his mental way out. To do that of course it is necessary to see as clearly as possible into oneself, to throw the searchlight into one's most hidden crannies, to have the courage to be what one naturally is — not to be led into a mistake. Yes, that should be the daily prayer of every decent man: to make no mistake."

Where is he getting to again now? thought George. He is quite as morbid in his way as his father was. And at the same time one can't say that he has been personally through bad times. And he has asserted on one occasion that he felt there was no one with whom he had anything in common. It is not a bit true. He feels he has something in common with all Jews and he stands nearer to the meanest of them than he does to me. While these thoughts were running through his mind his glance fell on a big envelope lying on the table, and he read the following words written on it in large Roman capitals: "Don't forget. Never forget."

Heinrich noticed George's look and took the envelope up in his hand. Three strong grey seals could be seen on its back. He then threw it down again on the table, drooped his underlip contemptuously and said: "I've tidied up that business as well, you know, to-day. There are days like this when one goes in for a great cleaning-up. Other people would have burnt the stuff. What's the point? I shall perhaps read it again with pleasure. The anonymous letters I once told you about are in this envelope, you know."

George was silent. Up to the present Heinrich had vouchsafed no information as to the circumstances under which his relations with the actress had come to an end. Only one passage in his letter to Lugano had hinted at the fact that it had not been without a certain deep-felt horror that he had seen his former mistress again. Almost against his own will the following words came out of George's mouth: "You know, of course, the story of Nürnberger's sister who lies buried in Cadenabbia?"

Heinrich answered in the affirmative. "What makes you think of that?"

"I visited her grave a few days before I came back." He hesitated. Heinrich was looking fixedly at him with a violently interrogative expression which compelled George to go on speaking. "Just think now, isn't it strange? since that time those two persons are always associated together in my memory, though I have never seen one of them and have only caught a glimpse of the other one at the theatre — as you know. I mean Nürnberger's dead sister and... this actress."

Heinrich grew pale to his very lips. "Are you superstitious?" he asked scornfully, but it sounded as though he were asking himself.

"Not at all," cried George. "Besides, what has superstition to do with this matter?"

"I'll only tell you that everything that has any connection at all with mysticism goes radically against the grain with me. Lots of twaddle is passed off in the world for science, but talking about things which one can't know anything about, things whose very essence is that one can never know anything about them, is in my view the most intolerable twaddle of the whole lot."

"Can she have died, this actress?" thought George.

Suddenly Heinrich took up the envelope again in his hand, and said in that dry tone which he liked to assume at those very moments when he was most deeply harrowed: "Writing out these words here is childish tomfoolery or affectation if you like. I could also have added the words Daudet put before his Sappho: 'To you, my son, when you are twenty years of age....' Too silly, anyway. As though the experiences of one man could be the slightest use to another man. The experiences of one man can often be amusing for another, more often bewildering, but never instructive.... And do you know why it is that both those figures are associated in your brain? I'll tell you why. Simply because in one of my letters I employed the expression 'Ghost' with reference to my former mistress. So that clears up this mysterious embroglio."

"That's not impossible," replied George. From somewhere or other came the indistinct sound of bad piano-playing. George looked out. The sun lay on the yellow wall opposite. Many windows were open. A boy sat at one of them, his arms resting on the window-ledge, and read. From another two young girls looked down into the garden courtyard. The clattering of utensils was audible. George longed for the open air, for his seat on the border of the forest. Before he turned to go it occurred to him to say: "I wanted to tell you, Heinrich, that Anna too liked your verses very much. Have you written any more?"

"Not many."

"It would be nice if you brought along to-day all you have done of the libretto and read it to us." He stood by the piano and struck a couple of chords.

"What's that?" asked Heinrich.

"A theme," replied George "that's just occurred to me for the second act. It is meant to accompany the moment in which the remarkable stranger appears on the ship."

Heinrich shut the window, George sat down and started to go on playing. There was a knock at the door, and Heinrich automatically cried: "Come in."

A young lady came in in a light cloth skirt with a red silk blouse and a white velvet ribbon with a little gold cross round her neck. A Florentine hat trimmed with roses shaded with its broad brim the pale little face from which two big black eyes peered out.

"Good afternoon," said the strange lady in a low voice, which sounded at the same time both defiant and embarrassed. "Excuse me, Herr Bermann, I didn't know that you had visitors," and she looked inquisitively at George, who had at once recognised her.

Heinrich grew paler and puckered his forehead. "I certainly had no idea," he began. He then introduced them and said to the lady: "Won't you sit down?"

"Thanks," she answered curtly and remained standing. "Perhaps I'll come again later."

"Please don't," cut in George. "I am just on the point of running off."

He watched the look of the actress roving round the room and felt a strange pity for her, such as one frequently feels in dreams for dead people who do not know that they have died. He then saw Heinrich's glance rest on this pale little face with inconceivable hardness. He now remembered very clearly seeing her on the stage, with the reddish-blonde hair that fell over her forehead and her roving eyes. "That's not how persons look," he thought, "who are fated to belong only to one man. And to think of Heinrich, who plumes himself so much on his knowledge of character, never having felt that! What did he really want of her? It was vanity which burnt in his soul, nothing more than vanity."

George walked along the street, which was like a dry oven. The walls of the houses threw back into the air the summer heat which they had absorbed. George took the horse-tram to the hills and woods, and breathed more freely when he was in the country. He walked slowly on between the gardens and villas, then passing the churchyard he took a white road with a gradual incline called Sommerhaidenweg, which he regarded as a good omen, and which was used by practically nobody during this late hour of a sunny afternoon. No shade came from the wooded line of heights on his left, only a gentle purring of breezes which had gone to sleep in the leaves. On the right a green incline sloped downwards towards the long stretch of valley where roofs were gleaming between the boughs and tree-tops. Further down vineyards and tilled fields struggled up behind garden fences towards meadows and quarries, over which shrubbery and bushes hung in the glittering sun. The path along which George was accustomed to wander was just a thin straight line often lost among the fields, and his eye sought the place on the border of the forest where his favourite seat was situated: meadows and wooded heights at the end of the valley with fresh vales and hills. George felt himself strangely wedded to this landscape and the thought that his own career and his own will called him abroad often wove farewell moods around his lonely walks even now.

But at the same time a presentiment of a richer life stirred within him. It was as though many things were coming to birth in his soul which he had no right to disturb by anxious reflection; and there was a murmur of the melodies of days to come in the lower depths of his soul, though it was not yet vouchsafed to him to hear them clearly. He had not been idle, either, in drafting out clearly the rough plan of his future. He had written a letter of polite thanks to Detmold, in which he placed himself with reservation at the disposition of the manager for the coming autumn. He had also looked up old Professor Viebiger, explained his plans to him and requested him if the opportunity presented itself to remember his former pupil. But even though contrary to his expectations he failed to find a position in the autumn he was determined to leave Vienna, to retire for the time being to a small town or into the country, and to go on working by himself amid the quietness. He had not clearly worked out how his relations to Anna would shape under these circumstances. He only knew that they must never end. He thought vaguely that he and Anna would visit each other and go on journeys together at some convenient time; subsequently no doubt she would move to the place where he lived and worked. But it struck him as useless to go deeply into these matters before the actual hour arrived, since his own life had been definitely decided at any rate for the coming year.

The Sommerhaidenweg ran into the forest, and George took the broad Villenweg, which crossed the valley at this point and curved downwards. In a few minutes he found himself in the street, at the end of which stood the little villa in which Anna lived. It was close to the forest, near unpretentious yellow bungalows and only raised above their level by its attic and balcony with its triangular wooden gable. He crossed the plot of ground in front of the house where the little blue clay angel welcomed him on its square pedestal in the middle of the lawn between the flower-beds, and went through the narrow passage near which the kitchen lay, and the cool middle room on whose floor the rays of the sun were playing through the dilapidated green Venetian blinds and stepped on to the verandah. He turned towards the left and cast a glance through the open window into Anna's room, which he found empty. He then went into the garden and walking along the lilac and currant-bushes towards the bottom, soon saw Anna some way off, sitting on the white seat under the pear-tree in her loose blue dress. She did not see him coming, but seemed quite plunged in thought. He slowly approached. She still did not look up. He loved her very much at moments like this when she thought she was unobserved and the goodness and peacefulness of her character floated serenely around her clear forehead. The grasshoppers chirruped on the gravel at their feet. Opposite them on the grass the strange St. Bernard dog lay sleeping. It was the animal which first noticed George's arrival as it woke up. It got up and jogged clumsily towards George. Anna now looked up and a happy smile swept over her features. Why am I so seldom here? was the thought which ran through George's mind. Why don't I live out here and work on top on the balcony under the gable, which has a beautiful view on to the Sommerhaidenweg? His forehead had grown damp, for the late afternoon sun was still blazing.

He stood in front of Anna, kissed her on the eyes and mouth and sat down at her side. The animal had slunk after him and stretched itself out at his feet. "How are you, my darling?" he asked, while he put his arm around her neck.

She was very well, as usual, and to-day was a particularly fine day. She had been left quite to herself since the morning, for Frau Golowski had to go to town again to look after her family. It was really not so bad to be so completely alone with oneself. One could sink then into one's dreams undisturbed. They were of course always the same, but they were so sweet that one did not get tired of them. She had let herself dream about her child. How much she loved it to-day, even before it was born! She would never have considered it possible. Did George understand it too?... And as he nodded absent-mindedly she shook her head. No, no... a man could not understand that, even the very best and kindest man. Why, she could feel the little being already moving, could detect the beating of its tender heart, could feel this new incomprehensible soul breathe within her, just in the same way as she felt the flowering and awakening within her of its fresh young body. And George looked in front of him as though ashamed that she was facing the near future. It was true of course that a being would exist, begotten by himself, like himself and itself destined again to give life to new beings; it was true that within the blessed body of that woman, for which he had ceased for a long time now to feel any desire, there was swelling, according to the eternal laws, a life that only a year ago had been undreamt-of, unwished-for, lost in infinity, but which now was forcing its way up to the light like something predestined from time immemorial; it was true that he knew that he was irresistibly drawn into that forged chain that stretched from primal ancestor to future descendant and which he grasped as it were with both hands... but he did not feel that this miracle made so potent an appeal to him as it really ought.

And they spoke to-day more seriously than usual about what was to happen after the child's birth. Anna, of course, would keep it with her during the first week, but then they would have to give it to strangers; but at any rate it should live quite near, so that Anna could see it at any time without any difficulty.

"I say, dear," she said quite lightly and suddenly, "will you often come and visit us?"

He looked into her arch smiling face, took both her hands and kissed her. "Dearest, what am I to do? Tell me yourself. You can imagine how hard it will be for me. But what else is there for me to do? I've got to make a beginning. I've already told you we've given notice to leave the apartment," he added hastily, as though that cut off all retreat. "Felician is probably going to Athens. Yes, it would of course be fine if I could take you with me. But I am afraid that isn't possible. There ought above all to be something more or less certain, I mean one ought — ought at least to be certain that I shall remain in the same place for a longish time."

She had listened with quiet seriousness. She then started to speak about her latest idea. He must not believe, she said, that she was thinking of putting the whole burden of responsibility upon him. She was determined as soon as it was feasible to found a music-school. If he left her alone for a long time the school would be here in Vienna. If he soon came to fetch her it would be wherever she and he had their home. And when she was once in an independent position she meant to take and keep her child whether she was his wife or not. She was very far from being ashamed of it, he knew that quite well. She was rather proud... yes, proud of being a mother.

He took her hands in his and stroked them. It would all come right enough, he said, feeling somewhat depressed. He suddenly saw himself sitting at supper between wife and child, beneath the modest light of a hanging lamp in an extremely simple home. And this family scene of his imagination wafted towards him, as it were, an atmosphere of troubled boredom. Come, it was still too early for that, he was still too young. Was it possible, then, that she was to be the last woman whom he was to embrace? Of course it might come in years, even in months, but not to-day. As for bringing lies and deceit into a well-ordered home, he had a horror of the idea. Yet the thought of rushing away from her to others whom he desired, with the consciousness that he would find Anna again just as he had left her, was at once tempting and reassuring.

The well-known whistle was heard from outside. The dog got up, made George stroke her yellow-spotted back once again and sadly slunk away.

"By Jove," said George, "I had almost forgotten all about it. Heinrich will be here any minute." He told Anna about his visit and did not suppress the fact that he had made the acquaintance of the faithless actress.

"Did she succeed then?" exclaimed Anna, who did not fancy ladies with roving eyes.

"I don't think that she succeeded at all," replied George. "Heinrich was rather annoyed at her turning up, so far as I could see."

"Well, perhaps he'll bring her along too," said Anna jestingly, "then you will have some one to flirt with again, as you did with the regicide at Lugano."

"Upon my word," said George innocently, and then added casually: "But what's the matter with Therese? why doesn't she come to see you any more? Demeter is no longer in Vienna. She would have plenty of time."

"She was here only a few days ago. Why, I told you so. Don't pretend."

"I'd really forgotten it," he answered honestly. "What did she tell you then?"

"All there was to tell. The Demeter affair is over. Her heart is throbbing once more only for the poor and the miserable — until it is called back." And Anna confided Therese's winter plans to him under the seal of a most rigid silence. Disguised as a poor woman she meant to undertake expeditions through shelters, soup- and tea-kitchens, refuges for the homeless and workmen's dwellings, with a view to shedding a light into the most hidden corners for the benefit of the so-called golden heart of Vienna. She seemed quite ready for it and was perhaps a little sanguine of discovering some horrors.

George looked in front of him. He remembered the stylish lady in the white dress who had stood in the sunshine in Lugano in front of the post-office, far from all the cares of the world. "Strange creature," he thought.

"Of course she'll make a book out of it," said Anna. "But mind you don't tell any one, not even your friend Bermann."

"Shouldn't think of it! But I say, Anna, hadn't you better get something ready for this evening?"

She nodded. "Come, take me downstairs. I'll see what there is and consult Marie too... so far as is possible to do so."

They got up. The shadows had lengthened. The children were making a noise in the next garden. Anna took her lover's arm and walked slowly with him. She told him the newest instances of the fantastic stupidity of the maid.

The idea of my being a husband, thought George, and listened reflectively. When they got to the house he announced his intention of going to meet Heinrich, left Anna and went into the street.

At this precise moment a one-horse carriage jogged up. Heinrich got out and paid the driver. "Hallo!" he said to George, "have you really waited for me after all? It's not so late then?"

"Not at all. You're very punctual. We'll go for a short walk if it suits you."

"Delighted."

They walked on into the forest past the yellow inn with the red terraces.

"It is wonderful here," said Heinrich, "and your villa too looks awfully nice. Why don't you live out here?"

"Yes, it's absurd not to," agreed George without further explanation. Then they were silent for a while.

Heinrich was in a light grey summer suit and carried his cloak over his arm, letting it trail a little behind him. "Did you recognise her again?" he asked suddenly, without looking up.

"Yes," replied George.

"She only came up for one day from her summer engagement. She goes back by train to-night. A surprise attack, so to speak. But it didn't come off." He laughed.

"Why are you so hard?" asked George, and thought of the big envelope with the grey seals and the silly inscription. "There is really no occasion for you to be so. It is only a fluke that she did not get anonymous letters just like you did, Heinrich. And who knows, if you hadn't left her alone for God knows what reasons...."

Heinrich shook his head and looked at George almost as though he pitied him. "Do you mean by any chance that it is my intention to punish her or avenge myself? Or do you think I'm one of those mugs who don't know what to make of the world because something has happened to them which they know has already happened to thousands before them and will happen to thousands after them? Do you think I despise the 'faithless woman' or that I hate her? Not a bit of it. Of course I don't mean to say that I don't at times assume the pose of hatred and contempt, only of course to produce better results upon her. But as a matter of fact I understand all that has happened far too well for me to...." He shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, if you do understand it?..."

"But, my dear friend, understanding a thing is no earthly good at all. Understanding is a game like anything else. A very 'classy' game and a very expensive one. One can spend one's whole soul over it and finish up a poor devil. But understanding hasn't got the least thing in the world to do with our feelings, almost as little as it has to do with our actions. It doesn't protect us from suffering, from revulsion, from ruin. It leads absolutely nowhere. It's a kind of cul-de-sac. Understanding always signifies the end."

As they walked slowly and silently up a side path with a moderate incline, each one engrossed in his own thoughts, they emerged out of the woods into open meadowland, which gave a clear view of the valley. They looked out over the town and then further on towards the haze-breathing plain through which the river ran shining; they looked towards the far line of the mountains, over which a thin haze was spreading. Then in the peace of the evening sun they walked on further towards George's favourite seat on the border of the forest. The sun was not visible. George watched the track of the Sommerhaidenweg on the other side of the valley run along the wooded hills; it looked pale and cooled. He then looked down and knew that in the garden at his feet there was a pear-tree, beneath which he had sat a few hours before with some one who was very dear to him, and who carried his child under her bosom, and he felt moved. He felt a slight contempt for the women who were perhaps waiting for him somewhere, but that did not extinguish his desire for them. Summer visitors were walking about down below on the path between the garden and the meadows. A young girl looked up and whispered something to another.

"You are certainly a popular personality in the place here," remarked Heinrich, contracting the corners of his mouth ironically.

"Not that I know of."

"Those pretty girls looked at you with great interest. People always find an inexhaustible source of excitement in other people not being married. Those holiday-makers down there are bound to look upon you as a kind of Don Juan and... your friend as a seduced maiden who has gone wrong, don't you think so?"

"I don't know," said George, anxious to cut short the conversation.

"And I wonder what I represented," continued Heinrich unperturbed, "to the theatrical people in the little town. Clearly the deceived lover. Consequently an absolutely ridiculous character. And she? Well, one can imagine. Things are awfully simple for lookers-on. But when one gets to close quarters everything looks utterly different. But the question is whether the complexion it has in the distance isn't the right one? Whether one does not persuade oneself into believing a lot of rot, if one's got a part to play in the comedy oneself?"

He might quite as well have stayed at home, thought George. But as he could not send him home, and with the object at any rate of changing the conversation, he asked him quickly: “Do you hear anything from the Ehrenbergs?”

“I had a rather sad letter from Fräulein Else a few days ago,” replied Heinrich.

“You correspond with her?”

“No, I don’t correspond with her. At any rate I have not yet answered her.”

“She is taking the Oskar business much more to heart than she will own,” said George. “I spoke to her once in the nursing-home. We remained standing quite a time outside in the passage in front of the white varnished door behind which poor Oskar was lying. At that time they were afraid of the other eye as well. It’s really a tragic affair.”

“Tragi-comic,” corrected Heinrich with hardness.

“You see the tragi-comic in everything. I’ll tell you why, too. Because you’re more or less callous. But in this case the comic element takes a back seat.”

“You make a mistake,” replied Heinrich. “Old Ehrenberg’s box on the ear was a piece of crudeness, Oskar’s suicide a piece of stupidity, his making such a bad shot at himself a piece of bungling. These elements certainly can’t produce anything really tragic. It is a rather disgusting business, that’s all.”

George shook his head angrily. He had felt genuine sympathy for Oskar since his misfortune. He was also sorry for old Ehrenberg, who had been staying in Neuhaus since then, was only living for his work and refused to see any one. They had both paid their penalty, which was heavier than they had deserved. Couldn’t Heinrich see that and feel it just as he did? They really got on one’s nerves at times, these people, with their exaggerated Jewish smartness and their relentless psychology — these Bermanns and Nürnbergers. Their principal object in life was to be surprised by nothing whatsoever. What they lacked was kindness. It was only when they grew older that a certain gentleness came over them. George thought of old Doctor Stauber, of Frau Golowski, of old Eissler, but so long as they were young... they always kept on the qui vive. Their one ideal was not to be scored off! A disagreeable lot. He felt more and more that he missed Felician and Skelton, who as a matter of fact were really quite clever enough. He even missed Guido Schönstein.

“But in spite of all her melancholy,” said Heinrich after a time, “Fräulein Else seems to be having a pretty good time of it. They are having people down again at Auhof. The Wyners were there the other day, Sissy and James. James got his doctor’s degree the other day at Cambridge. Classy, eh?”

The word Sissy darted through George’s heart like a flashing dagger. He realised it all of a sudden. He would be with her in a few days. His desire surged up so strongly that he himself scarcely understood it.

The dusk came down. George and Heinrich got up, went down the fields and entered the garden. They saw Anna come down the centre path accompanied by a gentleman.

“Old Doctor Stauber,” said George. “You know him, I suppose?”

They exchanged greetings.

“I am very glad,” said Anna to Heinrich, “that you should come and see us at last.”

“Us!” repeated George to himself, with a sense of surprise which he immediately repudiated. He went in front with Doctor Stauber. Heinrich and Anna slowly followed.

“Are you satisfied with Anna?” George asked the doctor.

“Things couldn’t be going on better,” replied Stauber, “only she must continue to take exercise regularly and properly.”

It struck George, who had not seen the doctor before since his return, that he had not yet given him back the books which he had borrowed and he made his apologies.

“There’s time enough for that,” replied Stauber. “I am only too glad if they came in handy.” And he asked what impressions he had brought home from Rome.

George told him of his wanderings through the old imperial palaces, of his drives through the Campagna in the evening light, of a sultry hour in Hadrian's garden just before a storm. Doctor Stauber begged him to stop, otherwise he might be induced to leave all his patients here in the lurch so as to run away at once to the city he loved so much. Then George made polite inquiries after Doctor Berthold. Was there any foundation for the rumour that he would be engaged again in active political life in the approaching winter?

Doctor Stauber shrugged his shoulders. "He comes back in September, that's the only thing certain so far. He has been very industrious at Pasteur's and he wants to elaborate at the pathological institute here a great piece of serum research work which he began in Paris. If he takes my advice he'll stick to it, for in my humble opinion what he is now doing is much more important for humanity than the most glorious revolution. Of course talents vary, and I've certainly nothing to say against revolutions now and again. But speaking between ourselves, my son's talent is far more on the scientific side. It's rather his temperament which drives him in the other direction... perhaps only his temper. Well, we shall see. But how about your plans for the autumn?" he added suddenly, as he looked at George with his good-natured fatherly expression. "Where are you going to swing your bâton?"

"I only wish I knew myself," replied George.

Doctor Stauber was walking by his side, his lids half closed and his cigar in his mouth, and while George told him about his efforts and his prospects with self-important emphasis he thought he felt that Doctor Stauber simply regarded everything he said as nothing more than an attempted justification of his putting off his marriage with Anna. A slight irritation against her arose within him; she seemed to be standing behind them and perhaps was enjoying quietly that he was, as it were, being cross-examined by Doctor Stauber.

He deliberately assumed a lighter and lighter tone, as though his own personal plans for the future had nothing at all to do with Anna, and finished up by saying merrily: "Why, who knows where I shall be this time next year? I may finish up in America."

"You might do worse," replied Doctor Stauber quietly. "I have a cousin who is a violinist in Boston, a man named Schwarz, who earns there at least six times as much as he gets here at the opera."

George did not like being compared with violinists of the name of Schwarz and asserted with an emphasis which he himself thought rather exaggerated that it was not at all a question of money-making, at any rate at the beginning. Suddenly, he did not know where the thought came from, the idea ran through his mind: "Supposing Anna dies.... Supposing the child were her death...." He felt deeply shocked, as though he had committed a crime by the very thought, and he saw in his imagination Anna lying there with the shroud drawn over her chin and he saw the candlelight and daylight streaming over her wax-pale face. He turned round almost anxiously, as though to assure himself that she was there and alive. The features of her face were blurred in the darkness and this frightened him. He remained standing with the doctor till Anna arrived with Heinrich. He was happy to have her so near him. "You must be quite tired now, dear," he said to her in his tenderest tone.

"I've certainly honestly performed my day's work," she replied. "Besides," and she pointed to the verandah, where the lamp with the green paper shade was standing on the laid table, "supper will soon be ready. It would be so nice, Doctor, if you could stay; won't you?"

"I'm afraid it's impossible, my dear child. I ought to have been back in town ages ago. Remember me kindly to Frau Golowski. See you again soon. Good-bye, Herr Bermann. Come," he added, "is one going to get another chance soon of seeing or reading one of your fine pieces of work?"

Heinrich shrugged his shoulders, vouchsafed a social smile and was silent. Why, he thought, are even the best-bred men usually tactless when they meet people like myself? Do I ask him about his affairs?

The doctor went on to express in a few words his sympathy with Heinrich over old Bermann's death. He remembered the dead man's celebrated speech in opposition to the introduction of Tschech as the judicial language in certain Bohemian districts. At that time the Jewish provincial advocate had come within an ace of being Minister of Justice. Yes, times had changed.

Heinrich started to listen. After all this could be made use of in the political comedy.

Doctor Stauber took his leave. George accompanied him to the carriage which was waiting outside, and availed himself of the opportunity to ask the doctor some medical questions. The latter was able to reassure him in every respect.

"It's only a pity," he continued, "that circumstances do not allow Anna to nurse the child herself."

George stood still meditatively. It could not hurt her, could it?... At any rate, only the child? Or her as well?... He asked the doctor.

"Why talk about it, my dear Baron, if it's not practicable? That's all right, don't you worry," he added, with one foot already in the carriage. "One needn't be nervous about the child of people like you two."

George looked him straight in the eye and said: "I will at any rate take care that he lives the first years of his life in healthy air."

"That's very nice," said Doctor Stauber gently. "But speaking generally there is no healthier air in the world for children than their parents' home."

He shook hands with George and the carriage rolled away.

George remained standing for a moment and felt a lively irritation against the doctor. He vowed mentally that he would never allow the conversation with him to take a turn that would as it were entitle him to give unsolicited advice or make veiled reproaches. What did the old man know? What did he really understand about the whole thing? George's antagonism became more and more violent. When I choose to, he said to himself, I will marry her. Can't she have the child with her anyway? Hasn't she said herself that she will be proud of having a child? I am not going to repudiate it either, and I will do everything in my power. And later on sometime.... But I should be doing an injustice to myself, to her, to the child if I were to make up my mind to-day to do something which at any rate is still premature.

He had slowly walked past the short side of the house into the garden. He saw Anna and Heinrich sitting on the verandah. Marie was just coming out of the house, very red in the face, and putting a warm dish on the table, from which the steam mounted up. How quiet Anna sits there, thought George, and remained standing in the darkness. How serene, how free from care, as though she could trust me implicitly, as though there were no such things as death, poverty, treacherous desertion, as though I loved her as much as she deserves. And again he felt alarmed. Do I love her less? Is she not right in trusting me? When I sit over there on my seat on the edge of the forest so much tenderness often wells up in me that I can scarcely stand it. Why do I feel so little of that now? He was standing only a few paces away and watched her first carve and then stare into the darkness out of which he was to come, while her eyes began to shine as he stepped suddenly into the light. My one true love, he thought.

When he sat down by the others Anna said to him: "You've had a very long consultation with the doctor."

"It wasn't a consultation. We were chatting. He also told me about his son who is coming back soon."

Heinrich inquired after Berthold. The young man interested him and he hoped very much to make his acquaintance next winter. His speech last year on the Therese Golowski case, together with his open letter to his constituents, in which he had explained the reasons for his resignation, yes, they had been really first-class performances.... Yes, and more than that — documents of the period.

A light almost proud smile flew over Anna's face. She looked down to her place and then quickly up to George. George also was smiling. Not a trace of jealousy stirred within him. Did Berthold have any idea...? Of course. Did he suffer?... Probably. Could he forgive Anna? To think of having to forgive at all! What nonsense.

A dish of mushrooms was served. On its appearance Heinrich could not refrain from asking if it were at all poisonous.

George laughed.

"You needn't make fun of me," said Heinrich. "If I wanted to kill myself I wouldn't choose either poisoned mushrooms or decayed sausage, but a nobler and swifter poison. At times one is sick of life, but one is never sick of health, even in one's last quarter of an hour. And besides, nervousness is a perfectly legitimate, though usually shamefully repudiated, daughter of reason. What does nervousness really mean? considering all the possibilities that may result from an action, the bad and good ones equally. And what is courage? I mean, of course, real courage, which is manifested far more rarely than one thinks. For the courage which is affected or the result of obedience or simply a matter of suggestion doesn't count. True courage is often really nothing else than the expression of an as it were metaphysical conviction of one's own superfluity."

"Oh, you Jew!" thought George, though without malice, and then said to himself, "Perhaps he isn't so far out after all."

They found the beer so good, although Anna did not drink any, that they sent Marie to the inn for a second jugful. Their mood became genial. George described his trip again. The days at Lugano in the broiling sun, the journey over the snowy Brenner, the wandering through the roofless city, which after a night of two thousand years had surged up again to the light; he conjured up again the minute in which they had been present, he and Anna, when workmen were carefully and laboriously excavating a pillar out of the ashes. Heinrich had not yet seen Italy. He meant to go there next spring. He explained that he was frequently torn by a desire for, if not exactly Italy, at any rate foreign lands, distance, the world. When he heard people talking about travels he often got heart palpitation like a child the evening before its birthday. He doubted whether he was destined to end his life in his home. It might be, perhaps, that after wandering about for years on end he would come back and find in a little house in the country the peace of his later manhood. Who knew — life was so full of coincidences — if he were not destined to finish his life in this very house in which he was now a guest and felt better than he had for a long time?

Anna thanked him with an air which indicated that she was not merely the hostess of the country house but of the whole world itself with its evening calm.

A soft light began to shine out of the darkness of the garden. A warm moist odour came from the grass and flowers. The long fields which ran down to the railing swept into view in the moonlight and the white seat under the pear-tree shimmered as though very far away. Anna complimented Heinrich on the verses in the opera libretto which George had read to her the other day.

"Quite right," remarked George, smoking a cigar with his legs comfortably crossed, "have you brought us anything fresh?"

Heinrich shook his head. "No, nothing."

"What a pity!" said Anna, and suggested that Heinrich should tell them the plot consecutively and in detail. She had been wanting to know about it for a long time. She was unable to get any clear idea of it from George's account.

They looked at each other. There came up in their minds that sweet dark hour when they had lain in peace with breast close to breast in a dark room in front of whose windows, behind its floating curtain of snow, a grey church had loomed, and into which the notes of an organ had boomed heavily. Yes, they now knew where the house stood in which the child was to come into the world. Perhaps another house, too, thought George, stands somewhere or other in which the child that has not yet been born will end its life. Death! As a man — or as an old man, or.... Oh, what an idea, away with it... away with it!

Heinrich declared his readiness to fulfil Anna's wish, and stood up. "I shall perhaps find it useful myself," he said apologetically.

"But mind you don't suddenly switch off into your political tragi-comedy," remarked George. And then, turning to Anna: "He's writing a piece, you know, with a National German corps student for its hero who poisons himself with mushrooms through despair of emancipation of the Jews."

Heinrich nodded dissent. "One glass of beer less and you'd never have made that epigram."

"Jealousy!" replied George. He felt extraordinarily pleased with life, particularly now that he had firmly made up his mind to leave the day after to-morrow. He sat quite close to Anna, held her hand in his and seemed to hear the melody of future days singing in the deepest recesses of his soul.

Heinrich had suddenly gone into the garden outside the verandah, reached over the railing, took his cloak from the chair and threw it romantically around him. "I'm going to begin," he said. "Act I."

"First, an overture in D. minor," interrupted George. He whistled an impressive melody, then a few notes and finished with an "and so on."

"The curtain rises," said Heinrich. "Feast in the King's garden. Night. The princess is to be married to the Duke Heliodorus next day. I call him Heliodorus for the time being, he will probably have another name though. The king adores his daughter and can't stand Heliodorus, who is a kind of popinjay with the tastes of a mad Cæsar. The king has really given the feast to annoy Heliodorus, and not only are all the nobles in the land invited but the youth of all classes, in so far as they have won a right to be invited by their beauty. And on this evening the princess is to dance with any one who pleases her. And there is some one in particular, his name is Ägidius, with whom she seems quite infatuated. And no one is more pleased about it than the king. Jealousy on the part of Heliodorus. Increased pleasure on the part of the king. Scene between Heliodorus and the king. Scorn. Enmity. Then something highly unexpected takes place. Ägidius draws his dagger against the king. He wants to murder him. The motives for this attempted murder of course would have to be very carefully worked in if you had not been kind enough, my dear George, to set the thing to music! So it will be enough to hint that the youth hates tyrants, is a member of a secret society, is perhaps a fool or a hero off his own bat. I don't know yet, you see. The attempted murder fails. Ägidius is arrested. The king wishes to be left alone with him. Duet. The youth is proud, self-possessed, great. The king superior, cruel, inscrutable. That's about my idea of him. He had already sent many men to their death and already seen many die, but his own inner consciousness is so awfully vivid and intense that all other men seem to him to be living in a state of mere semi-consciousness, so that their death has practically no other significance except the step from twilight into gloom. A death like that strikes him as too gentle or too banal for a case like this. He wishes to plunge this youth from a daylight such as no mortal has yet enjoyed into the most dreadful darkness. Yes, that's how his mind works. How much he says or sings about this I don't yet know of course. Ägidius is taken away just like a prisoner condemned, so everybody thinks, to immediate death, and on the very same ship, too, as that on which Heliodorus was to have started on his journey with the princess in the evening. The curtain falls. The second act takes place on the deck. The ship under weigh. Chorus. Isolated figures come up. Their significance is only revealed later. Dawn. Ägidius is led up from the hold below. To his death, as he is bound, of course, to think. But it turns out otherwise. His fetters are loosed. All bow down to him. He is hailed as a prince. The sun rises. Ägidius has an opportunity of noticing that he is in the very best society — beautiful women, nobles. A sage, a singer, a fool, are intended for important parts. But who should come out of the chorus of women but the princess herself; she belongs absolutely to Ägidius, like everything else on the ship."

"What a splendid father and king!" said George.

"No price is too dear for him to pay!" explained Heinrich, "for a really ingenious idea. That's his line. There follows a splendid duet between Ägidius and the princess. Then they sit down to the meal. After the meal dancing. High spirits. Ägidius naturally thinks he has been saved. He is not inordinately surprised, because his hatred for the king was always to a great extent inspired by admiration. The twilight begins to loom. Suddenly a stranger is at Ägidius' side. Perhaps he has been there for a long time, one among the many, unnoticed, mute. He has a word to say to Ägidius. The feasting and dancing proceed meanwhile. Ägidius and the stranger. 'All this is yours,' says the stranger. 'You can rule according to your humour. You can take possession and kill just as you wish. But to-morrow... or in two or seven years or in one year or in ten, or still later, this ship will approach an island on whose shore a marble hall towers aloft upon a cliff. And there death waits for you — death. Your murderer is with you on the ship. But only the one whose mission it is to be your murderer knows it. Nobody else knows who he is. Nay, nobody else on this ship has any inkling that you are consecrated to death. Remember that. For when you let any one notice that you yourself know your fate you are doomed to death that very hour.'"

Heinrich spoke these words with exaggerated pathos, as though to conceal his embarrassment. He went on more simply. "The stranger vanishes. Perhaps I shall have him disembarked on the mainland by two silent attendants who have accompanied him. Ägidius remains among the hundreds of men and women of which one or the other is his murderer. Which one? The sage or the fool? The star-gazer yonder? One of those yonder, ruminating in the darkness? Those men stealing up the steps yonder? One of the dancers? The princess herself? She comes up to him again, is very tender, nay, passionate. Hypocrite? Murderess? His love? Does she know? At any rate she is his. All this is to be his to-day. Night on the sea. Terror. Delight. The ship goes slowly on towards that shore that lies hours or years away in the distance of the far-off mist. The princess is nestling at his feet. Ägidius stares into the night and watches." Heinrich stopped as though personally affected.

Melodies rang in George's ear. He heard the music for the scene when the stranger disappears escorted by the mutes, and then gradually the noise of the feast comes to the front of the stage. He did not feel it within him as a mere melody, but he already felt it with all its fulness of instruments. Were there not flutes sounding and oboes and clarionets? Was not the 'cello singing and the violin? Was not a faint beat of a drum droning out of a corner of the orchestra? Involuntarily he held up his right arm, as though he had his conductor's bâton in his hand.

"And the third act?" asked Anna, as Heinrich remained silent.

"The third act," repeated Heinrich, and there was a touch of depression in his voice. "The scene of the third act, of course, will be laid in that hall on the cliff — don't you think so? It must, I think, begin with a dialogue between the king and the stranger. Or with a chorus? There are no choruses on uninhabited islands. Anyway, the king is there and the ship is in sight. But look here, why should the island be uninhabited?" He stopped.

"Well?" asked George impatiently.

Heinrich laid both his arms on the railing of the verandah. "I'll tell you something. This isn't an opera at all...."

"What do you mean?"

"There are very good reasons for my not getting as far as this part of it. It is a tragedy clearly. I just haven't got the courage to write it. Do you know what would have to be described? The inner change in Ägidius would have to be described. That is clearly both the difficulty and the beauty of the subject-matter. In other words it is a thing which I daren't do. The opera idea is simply a way of getting out of it, and I don't know if I ought to take on anything like that." He was silent.

"But at any rate," said Anna, "you must tell us the end of the opera as you have got it in your mind. I must really admit that I'm quite excited."

Heinrich shrugged his shoulders and answered in a tired voice: "Well, the ship hoves to. Ägidius lands. He is to be hurled into the sea."

"By whom?" asked Anna.

"I've no idea at all," replied Heinrich unhappily. "From this point my mind is an absolute blank."

"I thought it would be the princess," said Anna, and waving her hand through the air executed a death signal.

Heinrich smiled gently. "I thought of that, of course, also, but...." He broke off and suddenly looked up to the night sky in a state of nervous tension.

"It was to finish with a kind of pardon, so far as your original draft went," remarked George irritably. "But that, of course, is only good enough for an opera. But now, as your Ägidius is the hero of a tragedy, of course he will have to be really hurled into the sea."

Heinrich raised his forefinger mysteriously and his features became animated again. "I think something is just dawning upon me. But don't let's talk about it for the time being, if you don't mind. It's perhaps really been a sound thing that I told you the beginning."

"But if you think that I am going to do entr'acte music for you," said George, without particular emphasis, "you are under a delusion."

Heinrich smiled, guiltily, indifferently and yet quite good-humouredly. Anna felt with concern that the whole business had fizzled out. George was uncertain whether he ought to be irritated at his hopes being disappointed or be glad at being relieved of a kind of obligation. But Heinrich felt as though the creations of his own mind were deserting him in shadowy confusion, mockingly, without farewell and without promising to come again.

He found himself alone and deserted in a melancholy garden, in the society of quite a nice man whom he knew very well, and a young lady who meant nothing at all to him. He could not help thinking all of a sudden of a person who was travelling at this very hour in a badly-lighted compartment in despair and with eyes red with crying, towards dark mountains, worrying whether she would get there in time to-morrow for her rehearsal. He now felt again that since that had come to an end he was going downhill, for he had nothing left, he had no one left. The suffering of that wretched person, the victim of his own agonizing hatred, was the only thing in the world. And who knew? She might be smiling at another the very next day, with those tearful eyes of hers, with her grief and longing still in her soul and a new joie de vivre already in her blood.

Frau Golowski appeared on the verandah. She was flurried and somewhat late, and still carried her umbrella and had her hat on. Therese sent her remembrances from town and wanted to arrange to come and see Anna again the next day or so.

George, who was leaning up against a wooden pillar of the verandah, turned to Frau Golowski with that studious politeness which he always ostentatiously assumed when talking to her. "Won't you ask Fräulein Therese in both our names if she wouldn't care to stay out here for a day or two? The top room is quite at her service. I'm on the point of going into the mountains for a short time, you know," he added, as though he regularly slept in the little room at all other times.

Frau Golowski expressed her thanks. She would tell Therese. George looked at his watch and saw that it was time to start for home. He and Heinrich then said good-bye. Anna accompanied both of them as far as the garden door, remained standing a little while and watched them till they got on to the height where the Sommerhaidenweg began.

The little village at the bottom of the valley flowed past them in the moonlight. The hills loomed pale like thin walls. The forest breathed darkness. In the distance thousands of lights glittered out of the night mist of the summer town. Heinrich and George walked by each other in silence and a sense of estrangement arose between them. George remembered that walk in the Prater in the previous autumn, when their first almost confidential talk had brought them near to each other. How many talks had they not had since? But had they not all, as it were, gone into thin air? And to-day, too, George was unable to walk through the night with Heinrich without exchanging a word, as he used to do many a time with Guido or with Labinski without feeling any loss of real sympathy. The silence became a strain. He began to talk of old Stauber, as that was the first subject to occur to him, and praised his reliability and versatility. Heinrich was not very taken with him and thought him somewhat intoxicated with the sense of his own kindness, wisdom and excellence. That was another kind of Jew which he could not stand — the self-complacent kind. The conversation then turned on young Stauber, whose vacillation between politics and science had something extremely attractive about it for Heinrich. From that they turned into a conversation about the composition of parliament, about the squabbles between the Germans and the Tschechs and the attacks of the Clericals on the Minister of Education. They talked with that strained assiduousness with which one is accustomed to talk about things which are absolutely indifferent to one in one's heart of hearts. Finally they discussed the question whether the Minister ought to remain in office or not after the dubious figure he had cut over the civil marriage question, and had the vaguest ideas after they had finished as to which of them had been in favour of his resignation and which of them against it. They walked along the churchyard. Crosses and gravestones towered over the walls and floated in the moonlight. The path inclined downwards to the main road. They both hurried so as to catch the last tram, and standing on the platform in the sultry scented night air drove towards the town. George explained that he thought of doing the first part of his tour on his cycle. Obeying a sudden impulse, he asked Heinrich if he wouldn't like to join him. Heinrich agreed and after a few minutes manifested great keenness. They got out at the Schottentor, found out a neighbouring café and after an exhaustive consultation managed, with the help of special maps which they found in encyclopædias, to decide on every possible route. When they left each other their plan was not indeed quite definite, but they already knew that they would leave Vienna early, the day after the next, and would mount their cycles at Lambach.

George stood quite a long time by the open window of his bedroom. He felt intensely awake. He thought of Anna, from whom he was to part to-morrow for a few days, and visualised her as sleeping at this hour out there in the country in the pale twilight between the moonlight and the morning. But he felt dully as though this image had nothing at all to do with his own fate, but with the fate of some unknown man, who himself knew nothing about it. And he was absolutely unable to realise that within that slumbering being there slept another being in still deeper mystery, and that this other being was to be his own child. Now that the sober mood of the early dawn stole almost painfully through his senses the whole episode seemed more remote and improbable than it had ever been before. A clearer and clearer light showed above the roofs of the town, but it would be a long time before the town woke up. The air was perfectly motionless. No breeze came from the trees in the park opposite, no perfume from the withered flower-beds. And George stood by the window; unhappy and without comprehension.

GEORGE SLOWLY CLIMBED up from the hold on narrow carpeted steps between long oblique mirrors and wrapped in a long dark green rug which trailed behind him, wandered up and down on the empty deck beneath the starry sky. Motionless as ever, Labinski stood in the stern and turned the wheel, while his gaze was directed towards the open sea. "What a career!" thought George. "First a dead man, then a minister, then a little boy with a muff and now a steersman. If he knew that I were on this ship he would certainly hail me." "Look out!" cried behind George the two blue girls, whom he had met on the sea-shore, but he rushed on, wrapped himself in his rug and listened to the flapping of white gulls over his head. Immediately afterwards he was in the saloon, down below, sitting at the table, which was so long that the people at the end were quite small. A gentleman near him, who looked like the elder Grillparzer, remarked irritably: "This boat's always late. We ought to have been in Boston a long time ago." George then felt very nervous; for if he could not show the three music scores in the green cover when he disembarked, he would certainly be arrested for high treason. That was why the prince who had been rushing all over the deck with the wheel all day long often cast such strange side-glances at him. And to intensify his suspicions still more he was compelled to sit at table in his shirtsleeves while all the other gentlemen wore generals' uniforms, as they always did on boats, and all the ladies wore red velvet dresses. "We shall soon be in America," said a raucous steward who was serving asparagus. "Only one more station."

"The others can sit there quietly," thought George. "They have nothing to do, but I must swim to the theatre straight away." The coast appeared opposite him in the great mirror; nothing but houses without roofs, whose tiers of terraces towered higher and higher, and the orchestra was waiting impatiently up above in a quiet kiosk with a broken stone cupola. The bell on the deck pealed and George tumbled down the steps into the park with his green rug and two pocket handkerchiefs. But they had shipped the wrong one across; it was the Stadtpark, as a matter of fact; Felician was sitting on a seat, an old lady in a cloak close to him put her fingers on her lips, whistled very loudly and Felician said, with an unusually deep voice: "Kemmelbach — Ybs." "No," thought George, "Felician never uses a word like that..." rubbed his eyes and woke up.

The train was just starting again. Two red lamps were shining in front of the closed window of the compartment. The night ran past, silent and black. George drew his travelling rug closer round him and stared at the green shaded lamp in the ceiling. "What a good thing that I'm alone in the compartment," he thought. "I have been sound asleep for at least four or five hours. What a strange confused dream that was!" The white gulls first came back into his memory. Did they have any significance? Then he thought of the old woman in the cloak, who of course was no other than Frau Oberberger. The lady would not feel particularly flattered. But really, hadn't she looked quite like an old lady, when he had seen her a few days ago by the side of her beaming husband in the box of the little red-and-white theatre of the watering-place? And Labinski, too, had appeared to him in his dream as a steersman, strangely enough. And the girls in blue dresses, also, who had looked out of the hotel garden into the piano room through the window as soon as they heard him playing. But what was the really ghostly element in that dream?

Not the girls in blue, not even Labinski, and not the Prince of Guastalla, who had rushed like mad to the wheel over the deck. No, it was his own figure which had appeared to him so ghostly as it had slunk along by his side multiplied a hundred times over in the long oblique mirrors on both sides. He began to feel cold. The cool night air penetrated into the compartment through the ventilator in the ceiling. The deep black darkness outside gradually changed into a heavy grey and there suddenly rang in George's ears in a sad whisper the words he had heard only a few hours ago in a woman's low voice: How soon will it take you to forget me?... He did not wish to hear those words. He wished they had already become true, and in desperation he plunged back into the memory of his dream. It was quite clear that the steamer on which he had gone to America on his concert tour really meant the ship on which Ägidius had sailed towards his sinister fate. And the kiosk with the orchestra was the hall where Ägidius had waited for death. The starry sky which spread over the sea had been really wonderful. The air had been bluer and the stars more silvery than he had ever seen them in waking life, even on the night when he had sailed with Grace from Palermo to Naples. Suddenly the voice of the woman he loved rang through the darkness again, whispering and mournful: "How long will it take you to forget me?"... And he now visualised her as he had seen her a few hours ago, pale and naked, with her dark hair streaming over the pillows. He did not want to think of it, conjured up other images from the depths of his memory and deliberately chased them past him. He saw himself going round a cemetery in the thawing February snow with Grace; he saw himself riding with Marianne over a white country road towards the wintry forest. He saw himself walking with his father over the Ringstrasse in the late evening; and finally a merry-go-round whirled past him. Sissy with her laughing lips and eyes was rocking about on a brown wooden horse. Else, graceful and ladylike, was sitting in a little red carriage, and Anna rode an Arab with the reins nonchalantly in her hand. Anna! How young and graceful she looked! Was that really the same being whom he was to see again in a few hours? and had he really only been away from her for ten days? And was he ever to see again all that he had left ten days ago? The little angel in blue clay between the flower-beds, the verandah with the wooden gable, the silent garden with the currant- and the lilac-bushes? It all seemed absolutely inconceivable. She will wait for me on the white seat under the pear-tree, he thought, and I will kiss her hands as though nothing had happened.

"How are you, George dear?" she will ask me. "Have you been true to me?" No.... That's not her way of asking, but she will feel without asking at all or my answering that I have not come back the same as I went away. If she only does feel it! If I am only saved from having to lie! But haven't I done so already? And he thought of the letters which he had written from the lake, letters full of tenderness and yearning, which had really been nothing but lies. And he thought of how he had waited at night with a beating heart, his ear glued to the door, till all was quiet in the inn; of how he had then stolen over the passage to that other woman who lay there pale and naked, with her dark eyes wide open, enveloped in the perfume and bluish shimmer of her hair. And he thought of how he and she one night, half drunken with desire and audacity, had stepped out on to the verandah, beneath which the water plashed so seductively. If any one had been out on the lake in the deep darkness of this hour he would have seen their white bodies shining through the night. George thrilled at the memory. We were out of our senses, he thought; how easily it might have happened that I should be lying to-day with a bullet through my heart six feet under the ground. Of course there's still a chance of it. They all know. Else knew first, though she scarcely ever came down from Auhof into the village. James Wyner, who saw me with the other woman one evening standing on the landing-stage is bound to have told her. Will Else marry him? I can understand her liking him so much. He is handsome, that chiselled face, those cold grey eyes which look shrewd and straight into the world, a young Englishman. Who knows if he wouldn't have turned into a kind of Oskar Ehrenberg in Vienna? And George remembered what Else had told him about her brother. He had struck George as so self-possessed, almost mature in fact, on his sick-bed in the nursing-home. And now he was said to be leading a wild life in Ostend, to be gambling and gadding about with the most evil associates, as though he wanted to go thoroughly to the dogs. Did Heinrich still find the matter so tragi-comic? Frau Ehrenberg had grown quite white with grief. And Else had cried her eyes out in front of George one morning in the grounds; but had she only been crying about Oskar?

The grey in front of the compartment window slowly cleared. George watched the telegraph wires outside sweeping and shifting across each other with swift movements and he thought of how, yesterday afternoon, his own lying words to Anna had travelled across one of these wires: “Shall be with you early to-morrow morning. Fondest love, your own George.”... He had hurried back straight from the post-office to an ardent and desperate final hour with the other woman, and he could not realise that even at this very minute, when he had already been away from her for a whole eternity, she should still be lying asleep and dreaming in that same room with the fast-closed windows. And she will be home this evening with her husband and children. Home — just as he would be. He knew that it was so and he could not understand it. For the first time in his life he had been near doing something which people would probably have had to call madness. Only one word from her... and he would have gone out with her into the world, have left everything behind, friends, mistress and his unborn child. And was he not still ready to do so? If she called him would he not go? And if he did do so would he not be right? Was he not far more cut out for adventures of that kind than for the quiet life full of responsibilities which he had chosen for himself? Was it not rather his real line to career boldly and unhesitatingly about the world than to be stuck somewhere or other with his wife and child, with all the bothers about bread-and-butter, his career and at the best a little fame? In the days from which he had just come he had felt that he was living, perhaps for the first time. Each moment had been so rich and so full, and not only those spent in her arms. He had suddenly grown young again. The country had flowered with a greater splendour, the arc of the sky had grown wider, the air which he drank had exhaled a finer spice and strength, and melodies had rippled within him as never before. Had he ever composed anything better than that wordless song to be sung on the water with its sprightly rocking melody? And that fantasy had risen strangely by the shore of the lake one hour out of depths of his which he had never dreamt of, after he had seen the wondrous woman for the first time. Well, Herr Hofrat Wilt would no longer have occasion to regard him as a dilettante. But why did he think of him of all people? Did the others know what kind of a man he was any better? Didn’t it often seem to him as though even Heinrich, who had once wanted to write an opera libretto for him, had failed to judge him any more accurately? And he heard again the words which the author had spoken to him that morning when they had cycled from Lambach to Gmunden through the dew-wet forest. “You need not do creative work in order to realise yourself... you do not need work... only the atmosphere of your art....” He suddenly remembered an evening in the keeper’s lodge on the Alamsee when a huntsman of seventy-three had sung some jolly songs and Heinrich had wondered at any one of that age being still so jolly, since one would be bound to feel oneself so near one’s death. Then they had gone to bed in an enormous room which echoed all their words, philosophised about life and death for a long time, and suddenly fallen asleep.

George was still motionless as he lay stretched out in his rug and considered whether he should tell Heinrich anything about his meeting with his actress. How pale she had grown when she had suddenly seen him. She had listened, with roving eyes, to his account of the cycle tour with Heinrich and then begun to tell him straight away about her mother and her little brother who could draw so wonderfully finely. And the other members of the company had kept staring all the time from the stage door, particularly a man with a green tyrol hat, in which a chamois’ beard was stuck. And George had seen her play the same evening in a French farce, and asked himself if the pretty young person who acted and pranced about so wildly down on the stage of the little holiday theatre could really be so desperate as Heinrich imagined. Not only he but James and Sissy as well had liked her very much. What a jolly evening it had been! And the supper after the theatre with James, Sissy, old mother Wyner and Willy Eissler! And next day the ride in the four-in-hand of old Baron Löwenstein, who drove himself. In less than an hour they had reached the lake. A boat was rowing near the bank in the early sunshine. And the woman he loved sat on the rowing-seat with a green silk shawl over her shoulders. But how was it that Sissy also had divined the relationship between him and her? And then the merry dinner at the Ehrenbergs' up at Auhof! George sat between Else and Sissy, and Willy told one funny story after the other. And then on the afternoon, George and Sissy had found each other without any rendezvous in the dark green sultriness of the park amid the warm scent of the moss and the pines, while all the others were resting. It had been a wonderful hour, which had floated through this day as lightly as a dream, without vows of troth and without fear of fulfilment. How I like thinking every single minute of it all over again, savouring it to the full, that golden day! I see both of us, Sissy and myself, going down over the fields to the tennis-court, hand in hand. I think I played better than I ever did in my life.... And I see Sissy again lounging in a cane chair, with a cigarette between her lips and old Baron Löwenstein at her side, while her looks flamed towards Willy. What had become of me at that moment, so far as she was concerned? And the evening! How we swam out in the twilight into the lake, while the warm water caressed me so deliciously. What a delight that was! And then the night... the night....

The train stopped again. It was already quite light outside. George lay still, as before. He heard the name of the station called out; the voices of waiters, conductors and travellers; heard steps on the platform, station-signals of all kinds, and he knew that in an hour he would be in Vienna.... Supposing Anna had received information about him, just as Heinrich had about his mistress the previous winter? He could not imagine that a thing like that could make Anna lose control of herself, even if she believed in it. Perhaps she would cry, but certainly only to herself, quite quietly. He resolved firmly not to let her notice anything. Was not that his plain duty? What was the important thing now? Only this, that Anna should spend the last weeks quietly and without excitement, and that a healthy child should come into the world. That was all that mattered. How long had it been since he had heard Doctor Stauber say those words? The child...! How near the hour was, the child.... He thought again; but he could think of nothing except the mere word. He then endeavoured to imagine a tiny living being. But as though to mock him figures of small children kept appearing, who looked as though they had stepped out of a picture-book, drawn grotesquely and in crude colours. Where will it spend its first years? he thought. With peasants in the country, in a house with a little garden. But one day we will fetch it and take it home with us. It might, too, turn out differently. One gets a letter like this: Your Excellency, I have the honour to inform you that the child is seriously ill.... Or.... What is the point of thinking about things like that? Even though we kept it with us it might fall ill and die.

Anyway, it must be given to people who are highly responsible. I'll see about it myself.... He felt as though he were confronted with new duties which he had never properly considered and which he had not yet grown able to cope with. The whole business was beginning, as it were, over again. He came out of a world in which he had not bothered about all these things, where other laws had prevailed than those to which he must now submit.

And had it not been as though the other people, too, had felt that he was not really one of them, as though they had been steeped in a kind of respect, as though they had been seized by a feeling of veneration for the power and holiness of a great passion, whose sway they witnessed in their own neighbourhood? He remembered an evening on which the hotel visitors had disappeared from the piano-room one after another, as though they had been conscious of their duty to leave him alone with her. He had sat down at the piano and begun to improvise. She had remained in her dark corner in a big arm-chair. First of all he had seen her smile, then the dark shining of her eyes, then only the lines of her figure, then nothing more at all. But he had been conscious the whole time "She is there!" Lights flashed out on the other bank opposite. The two girls in the blue dresses had peered in through the window and had quickly disappeared again. Then he stopped playing and remained sitting by the pianoforte in silence. Then she had come slowly out of the corner like a shadow and had put her hand upon his head. How ineffably beautiful that had been! And it all came into his mind again. How they had rested in the boat in the middle of the lake, with shipped oars, while his head was in her lap! And they had walked through the forest paths on the opposite bank until they came to the seat under the oak. It had been there that he had told her everything — everything as though to a friend. And she had understood him, as never another woman had understood him before. Was it not she whom he had always been seeking? she who was at once mistress and comrade, with a serious outlook upon everything in the world, and yet made for every madness and for every bliss? And the farewell yesterday.... The dark brilliance of her eyes, the blue-black stream of her loosened hair, the perfume of her white naked body.... Was it really possible that this was over for ever? that all this was never, never to come again?

George crumpled the rug between his fingers in his helpless longing and shut his eyes. He no longer saw the softly moving lines of the wooded hills, which swept by in the morning light, and as though for one last happiness he dreamed himself back again into the dark ecstasies of that farewell hour. Yet against his will he was overcome by fatigue after the jar and racket of the night in the train, and he was swept away out of the images which he had himself called up, in a route of wild dreams which it was not vouchsafed him to control. He walked over the Sommerhaidenweg in a strange twilight that filled him with a deep sadness. Was it morning? Was it evening? Or just a dull day? Or was it the mysterious light of some star over the world that had not yet shone for any one except him? He suddenly stood upon a great open meadow where Heinrich Bermann ran up and down and asked him: Are you also looking for the lady's castle? I have been expecting you for a long time. They went up a spiral staircase, Heinrich in front, so that George could only see a tail of the overcoat which trailed behind. Above, on an enormous terrace which gave a view of the town and the lake, the whole party was assembled. Leo had started his dissertation on minor harmonies, stopped when George appeared, came down from his desk and himself escorted him to a vacant chair which was in the first row and next to Anna. Anna smiled ecstatically when George appeared. She looked young and brilliant in a splendid décolletée evening dress. Just behind her sat a little boy with fair hair, in a sailor suit with a broad white collar, and Anna said "That's he." George made her a sign to be silent, for it was supposed to be a secret. In the meanwhile Leo played the C sharp minor Nocturne by Chopin in order to prove his theory, and behind him old Bösendorfer leaned against the wall in his yellow overcoat, tall, gaunt and good-natured. They all left the concert-room in a great crush. Then George put Anna's opera cloak round her shoulders and looked sternly at the people round him. He then sat in the carriage with her, kissed her, experienced a great delight in doing so and thought: "If it could only be like this always." Suddenly they stopped in front of the house in Mariahilf. There were already many pupils waiting upstairs by the window and beckoning. Anna got out, said good-bye to George with an arch expression and vanished behind the door, which slammed behind her.

"Excuse me, sir. Ten minutes more," some one said. George turned round. The conductor stood in the doorway and repeated: "We shall be in Vienna in ten minutes."

"Thank you," said George and got up, with a more or less confused head. He opened the window and was glad it was fine weather outside in the world. The fresh morning air quite cheered him up. Yellow walls, signal-boxes, little gardens, telegraph poles, streets, flew past him, and finally the train stood in the station. A few minutes later George was driving in an open fiacre to his apartment, saw workmen, shop girls and clerks going to their daily callings; heard the rattle of rolling shutters and in spite of all the anxiety which awaited him, in spite of all the desire which drew him elsewhere, he experienced the deep joy of once more being at home.

When he went into his room he felt quite hidden. The old secretary, covered with green baize, the malachite letter-weight, the glass ash-tray with its burnt-in cavalier, the slim lamp with the broad green thick glass shade, the portrait of his father and mother in the narrow mahogany frames, the round little marble table in the corner with its silver case for cigars, the Prince of the Electorate, after Vandyck on the wall, the high bookcase with its olive-coloured curtains; they all gave him a hearty greeting. And how it did one good to have that good home look over the tree tops in the park, towards the spires and roofs. An almost undreamt-of happiness streamed towards him from everything which he found again here, and he felt sore at heart that he would have to leave it all in a few weeks. And how long would it last until one had a home, a real home? He would have liked to have stopped for a few hours in his beloved room but he had no time. He had to be in the country before noon.

He had thrown off his clothes and let the warm water swirl round him deliciously in his white bath. To avoid going to sleep in his bath he chose a means he had often employed before. He rehearsed in his mind note by note a fugue of Bach's. He thought of a pianoforte that would have to be diligently practised and music scores which would have to be read. Wouldn't it really be more sensible to devote another year to study? Not to enter into negotiations straight away or to take a post, which he would turn out to be unable to fill? Rather to stay here and work. Stay here? But where? Notice had been given. It occurred to him for a moment to take the apartment in the old house opposite the grey church, where he had spent such beautiful hours with Anna, and it was as though he were remembering a long-past episode, an adventure of his youth, gay and yet a little mysterious, that had been over long ago....

He went back into his room, refreshed and wearing a brand-new suit, the first light one which he had put on since his father's death. A letter lay on the secretary which had just arrived by the first post, from Anna. He read it. It was only a few words: "You are here again, my love — I welcome you. I do long to see you. Don't keep me waiting too long. Your Anna...."

George got up. He did not himself know what it was in the short letter that touched him so strangely. Anna's letters had always retained, in spite of all their tenderness, a certain precise, almost conventional element, and he had frequently jokingly called them "proclamations." This was couched in a tone that reminded him of the passionate girl of by-gone days, of that love of his whom he had almost forgotten, and a strangely unexpected anxiety seized on his heart. He rushed downstairs, took the nearest fiacre and drove to the country. He soon felt agreeably distracted by the sight of the people in the streets who meant nothing to him at all; and later, when he was near the wood, he felt soothed by the charm of the blue summer day. Suddenly, sooner than George had anticipated, the vehicle stopped in front of the country house. Involuntarily George first looked up to the balcony under the gable. A little table was standing there with a white cover and a little basket on it. Oh yes, Therese had been staying here for a few days. He now remembered for the first time. Therese...! Where was it now? He got out, paid the carriage and went into the front garden where the blue angel stood on its unpretentious pedestal amid the faded flower-beds. He stepped into the house. Marie was just laying the table in the large centre room. "Madam's over there in the garden," she said.

The verandah door was open. The planks of its floor creaked underneath George's feet. The garden with its perfume and its sultriness received him. It was the old garden. During all the days in which George had been far away it had lain there silently, just as it was lying at this minute; in the dawn, in the sunshine, in the twilight, in the darkness of night; always the same.... The gravel path cut straight through the field to the heights. There were children's voices on the other side of the bushes from which red berries were hanging. And over there on the white seat, with her elbow on its arm, very pale, in her flowing blue morning dress, yes, that was Anna. Yes, really she. She had seen him now. She tried to get up. He saw it, and saw at the same time that she found it difficult. But why? Was she spell-bound by excitement? Or was the hour of trial so near? He signed to her with his hand that she was to remain seated, and she really did sit down again, and only just stretched out her arms lightly towards him. Her eyes were shining with bliss. George walked very quickly, with his grey felt hat in his hand, and now he was at her side.

"At last," she said, and it was a voice which came from as far back as those words in her letter of this morning. He took her hands, shook them in a strange clumsy way, felt a lump in his throat, but was still unable to articulate anything and just nodded and smiled. And suddenly he knelt before her on the grass, with her hands in his and his head in her lap. He felt her lightly taking her hands away, and putting them on his head; and then he heard himself crying quite softly. And he felt as though he were in a sweet vague dream, a little boy again and lying at his mother's feet, and this moment were already a mere memory, painful and far away, even while he was living it.

VIII

FRAU GOLOWSKI CAME out of the house. George could see her from the top end of the garden as she stepped on to the verandah. He hurried excitedly towards her, but as soon as she saw him in the distance she shook her head.

"Not yet?" asked George.

"The Professor thinks," replied Frau Golowski, "some time before dark."

"Some time before dark," said George and looked at his watch. And now it was only three.

She held out her hand sympathetically and George looked into her kind eyes, which were somewhat tired by her nocturnal vigils. The white transparent curtain in front of Anna's window had just been slightly drawn back. Old Doctor Stauber appeared by the window, threw George a friendly reassuring glance, disappeared again and the curtains were drawn. Frau Rosner was sitting in the large centre room by the round table. George could only see from the verandah the outlines of her figure; her face was quite in the shade. Then a whimpering and then a loud groan forced their way from the room in which Anna lay. George stared up at the window, stood still for a while, then turned round and walked for the hundredth time to-day up the path to the top of the garden. It is clear that she is already too weak to shriek, he thought; and his heart pained him. She had lain in labour for two whole days and two whole nights. The third day was now approaching its end, — and now it was still to last until evening came. On the evening of the first day Doctor Stauber had called in the Professor, who had been there twice yesterday and had remained in the house since noon to-day. While Anna had gone to sleep for a few minutes, and the nurse was watching by her bed, he had walked up and down in the garden with George and had endeavoured to explain to him all the peculiar features of the case. For the time being there was no ground for anxiety. They could hear the child's heart beating quite clearly. The Professor was a still fairly young man with a long blonde beard, and his words trickled gently and kindly like drops of some anodyne drug. He spoke to the sick woman like a child, stroked her over the hair and forehead, caressed her hands and gave her pet names. George had learned from the nurse that this young doctor exhibited the same devotion and same patience at every sick-bed. What a profession! thought George, who had once, during these three bad days, fled to Vienna for a few hours, which enabled a man to have a sound dreamless sleep for six good hours up there in the attic this very night while Anna was writhing in pain.

He walked along by the faded lilac-bushes, tore off leaves, crunched them in his hand and threw them on the ground. A lady in a black-and-white striped morning dress was walking in the next garden on the other side of the low bushes. She looked at George seriously and almost sympathetically. Quite so! thought George. Of course she heard Anna's screams the day before yesterday, yesterday and to-day. The whole place in fact knew of what was happening there; even the young girls in the outré Gothic villa, who had once taken him for the interesting seducer; and there was real humour in the fact that a strange gentleman with a reddish pointed beard, who lived two houses away, should have suddenly greeted him yesterday in the village with respectful understanding.

Remarkable, thought George, how one can make oneself popular with people. But Frau Rosner let it be seen that even though she did not regard George as mainly responsible for the seriousness of the position she certainly regarded him as somewhat callous. He did not bear any grudge for this against the poor good woman. She could not of course have any idea how much he loved Anna. It was not long since he had known it himself. She had not addressed any question to him on that morning of his arrival when George had lifted his head off her lap after a long silent fit of weeping, but he had read in the painful surprise of her eyes that she guessed the truth, and he thought he understood why she did not question him. She must realise how completely she possessed him again, how henceforth he belonged to her more than he had ever done before, and when he told her in the subsequent hours and days of the time which he had spent far away from her, and that now fateful name resounded casually but yet insistently out of the catalogue of the women whom he had met, she smiled, no doubt, in her slightly mocking way, but scarcely differently than when he spoke of Else or Sissy, or the little girls in their blue dresses who had peeped into the music-room when he was playing.

He had been living in the villa for two weeks, had been feeling well and in good form for serious work. He spread out every morning on the little table, where Therese's needlework had lain a short time ago, scores, works on musical theory, musical writing-paper, and occupied himself with solving problems in harmony and counterpoint. He often lay down in the meadow by the edge of the forest and read some favourite book or other, let melodies ring within him, indulged in day-dreams and was quite happy, with the rustling of the trees and the brilliance of the sun. In the afternoon, when Anna was resting, he would read aloud or talk to her. They often talked with affectionate anticipation about the little creature that was soon to come into the world, but never about their own future, whether distant or immediate. But when he sat by her bed, or walked up and down the garden with her arm-in-arm, or sat by her side on the white seat under the pear-tree, where the shining stillness of the late summer day rested above them, he knew they were tied fast to each other for all time, and that even the temporary separation with which they were faced could have no power to affect them in view of the certain feeling that they were all in all to each other.

It was only since the pains had come upon her that she seemed removed from him to a sphere where he could not follow her. Yesterday he had sat by her bed for hours and had held her hand in his. She had been patient, as always, had anxiously inquired if he were quite comfortable in the house, had begged him to work and go for walks as he had done before, since after all he could not help her, and had assured him that since she was suffering she loved him even more. And yet she was not the same, George felt, as she had been during these days. Particularly when she screamed out — as she had this morning in her worst pains — her soul was so far away from him that he felt frightened.

He was near the house again. No noise came from Anna's room, in front of the window of which the curtains moved slightly. Old Doctor Stauber was standing on the verandah. George hastened towards him with a dry throat. "What is it?" he asked hastily.

Doctor Stauber put his hand on his shoulder. "Going on nicely."

A groan came from within, grew louder, grew into a wild frenzied scream. George passed his hand over his damp forehead and said to the doctor with a bitter smile: "Is that what you mean by going on nicely?"

Stauber shrugged his shoulders. "It is written, 'With pain shalt thou....'"

George felt a certain sense of resentment. He had never believed in the God of the childishly pious, who was supposed to reveal himself as the fulfiller of the wishes of wretched men and women, as the avenger and forgiver of miserable human sins. The Nameless One which he felt in the infinite beyond his senses, and transcending all understanding, could only regard prayer and blasphemy as poor words out of a human mouth. Not even when his mother had died, after the senseless martyrdom of her suffering, not even when his father had died, passing away painlessly so far as he could understand, had he presumed to indulge in the belief that his own personal misfortunes in the world's progress signified more than the falling of a leaf. He had not bowed down in cowardly humility to any inscrutable solution of the riddle, nor had he foolishly murmured against an ungracious power of whose decrees he was the personal victim.

To-day he felt for the first time as though somewhere or other in the clouds an incomprehensible game was being played in which his own fortunes were the stakes. The scream within had died away and only groans were audible.

"And the beating of the heart?" asked George.

Doctor Stauber looked at him. "It could still be heard clearly ten minutes ago."

George fought against a dreadful thought which had been hounded up out of the depths of his soul. He was healthy, she was healthy, two strong young people.... Could anything like that be really possible?

Doctor Stauber put his hand on his shoulder again. "Go for a walk," he said. "We'll call you as soon as it's time." And he turned away.

George remained standing on the verandah for another minute. He saw Frau Rosner sitting huddled up in solitary brooding on the sofa near the wall in the large room that was beginning to grow dim in the shade of the late afternoon. He went away, walked round the house and went up the wooden stairs into his attic. He threw himself on the bed and shut his eyes. After a few minutes he got up, walked up and down in the room, but gave up doing so as the floor creaked. He went on to the balcony. The score of Tristan lay open on the table. George looked at the music. It was the prelude to the third act. The music rang in his ears. The sea waves were beating heavily on a cliff shore, and out of the mournful distance rang the sad melody of an English horn. He looked over the pages far away into the silver-white brilliance of the daylight. There was sunshine everywhere — on the roofs, paths, gardens, hills and forests. The sky was spread out in its azure vastness and the smell of the harvest floated up from the depths. How were things with me a year ago? thought George. I was in Vienna, quite alone. I had not an idea. I had sent her a song... 'Deinem Blick mich zu bequemen'... but I scarcely gave her a thought... and now she lies down there dying.... He gave a violent start. He had meant to say mentally... "She is lying in labour," and the words "lies dying" had as it were stolen their way on to his lips. But why was he so frightened? How childish! As though there existed presentiments like that! And if there really were danger, and the doctors had to decide, then of course they would have to save the mother. Why, Doctor Stauber had only explained that to him a few days ago. What, after all, is a child that hasn't yet lived? Nothing. He had begotten it at some moment or other without having wished it, without having even thought of the possibility that he might have become a father. How did he know either that in that dark hour of ecstasy, behind closed blinds a few weeks ago he had not... also become a father without having wished it, without having even thought of the possibility; and perhaps it might have happened without his ever knowing!

He heard voices and looked down; the Professor's coachman had caught hold of the arm of the housemaid, who was only slightly resisting. Perhaps the foundations are being laid here too of a new human life, thought George, and turned away in disgust. Then he went back into his room, carefully filled his cigarette-case out of the box that stood on the table, and it suddenly seemed to him that his excitement was baseless and even childish, and it occurred to him: "My mother, too, once lay like that before I came into the world, just as Anna is doing now. I wonder if my father walked about as nervously as I am doing? I wonder if he would be here now if he were still alive? I wonder if I would have told him at all? I wonder if all this would have happened if he had lived?" He thought of the beautiful serene summer days by the Veldeser Lake. His comfortable room in his father's villa swept up in his memory and in some vague way, almost dreamwise, the bare attic with the creaking floor in which he now found himself seemed to typify his whole present existence in contrast to that former life which had been so free from care and responsibility. He remembered a serious talk about the future which he had had a few days ago with Felician. Immediately after this thought there came into his mind the conversation which he had had with a woman in the country, who had introduced herself with the offer to take charge of the child. She and her husband possessed a small property near the railway, only an hour away from Vienna, and her only daughter had died in the previous year. She had promised that the little one should be well looked after, as well, in fact, as though it were not a stranger's at all, and as George thought of this he suddenly felt as though his heart were standing still. It will be there before dark.... The child.... His child, but a strange woman was waiting somewhere to take it away with her. He was so tired after the excitement of the last few days that his knees hurt him. He remembered having previously felt similar physical sensations, the evening after his "leaving-examination" and the time when he had learnt of Labinski's suicide. How different, how joyful, how full of hope had been his mood three days ago, just before the pains began! He now felt nothing except an unparalleled dejection, while he found the musty smell of the attic more and more unpleasant. He lit a cigarette and stepped on to the balcony again. The warm silent air did him good. The sunshine still lay on the Sommerhaidenweg and a gilded cross shone over the walls from the direction of the churchyard.

He heard a noise beneath him. Steps? Yes, steps and voices too. He left the balcony and the room and rushed down over the creaking wooden staircase. A door opened, steps were hurrying over the floor. The next moment he was on the bottom step opposite Frau Golowski. His heart stood still. He opened his mouth without asking.

"Yes," she nodded, "a boy."

He gripped both her hands and felt, while he was beaming all over, a stream of happiness was running through his soul with a potency and intense warmth that he had never anticipated. He suddenly noticed that Frau Golowski's eyes were not shining as brightly as they certainly ought to have. The stream of happiness within him ebbed back. Something choked his throat. "Well?" he said. Then he added, almost menacingly: "Does it live?"

"It just breathed once.... The Professor hopes...."

George pushed the woman on one side, reached the great centre room in three strides and stood still as though spell-bound. The Professor, in a long white linen apron, held a small creature in his arms and rocked it hurriedly to and fro. George stood still. The Professor nodded to him and went on undisturbed with what he was doing. He was examining the little creature in his arms with scrutinising eyes, he put it on the table, over which a white linen cloth had been spread, made the child's limbs execute violent exercises, rubbed its breast and face, then lifted it high up several times in succession, and George always saw how the child's head drooped heavily on to its breast. Then the doctor put it on to the linen cloth, listened with his ear on its bosom, got up, put one hand on its little body and motioned gently with the other to George to approach.

Involuntarily holding his breath George came quite near him. He looked first at the doctor and then at the little creature which lay on the white linen. It had its eyes quite open, strangely big blue eyes, like those of Anna. The face looked quite different from what George had expected, not wrinkled and ugly like that of an old dwarf, no; it was really a human face, a silent beautiful child-face, and George knew that these features were the image of his own.

The Professor said gently: "I've not heard its heart beat for the last hour."

George nodded. Then he asked hoarsely: "How is she?"

"Quite well, but you mustn't go in yet, Herr Baron."

"No," replied George and shook his head. He stared at the immobile little body with its bluish shimmer and knew that he was standing in front of the corpse of his own child. Nevertheless he looked at the doctor again and asked: "Can nothing more be done?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

George breathed deeply and pointed to the closed bedroom door. "Does she know yet — —" He asked the doctor.

"Not yet. Let's be thankful for the time being that it is over. She has gone through a lot, poor girl. I only regret that it should turn out to have been for nothing."

"You expected it, Herr Professor?"

"I feared it since this morning."

"And why... why?"

The doctor answered softly and gently: "A very exceptional case, as I told you before."

"You told me...?"

"Yes, I tried to explain to you that this possibility... it was strangled, you see, by the umbilical cord. Scarcely one or two per cent. of births end like that." He was silent.

George gazed at the child. Quite right, the Professor had prepared him in advance only he had not taken it seriously. Frau Rosner was standing by him with helpless eyes. George held out his hand to her and they looked at each other like persons whom the sore stress of circumstances has made companions in misfortune. Then Frau Rosner sank down on a chair by the wall.

The Professor said to George: "I will now go and just have a look at the mother."

"Mother!" repeated George, and gazed at him.

The doctor looked away.

"You will tell her?" asked George.

"No, not at once. Anyway, she will be ready for it. She asked several times in the course of the day if it was still alive. It will not have so dreadful an effect upon her as you fear, Herr Baron... at any rate during the first hours, the first days. You mustn't forget what she has gone through."

He pressed George's limply-hanging hand and went.

George stood there motionless. He was gazing continually at the little creature, and it seemed to him a picture of undreamt-of beauty. He touched its cheeks, shoulders, arms, hands, fingers. How mysteriously complete it all was! And there it lay, having died without having lived, destined to go from one darkness into another, through a senseless nothingness. There it lay, the sweet tiny body which was ready for life and yet was unable to move. There they shone, those big blue eyes, as though with desire to drink in the light of heaven, and completely blind before they had seen a ray. And there was the small round mouth which was open as though with thirst, but yet could never drink at a mother's breast. There it gazed, that white child-face with its perfect human features, which was never to receive or feel the kiss of a mother, the kiss of a father. How he loved this child! How he loved it, now that it was too late! A choking despair rose within his throat. He could not cry. He looked around him. No one was in the room and it was quite still next door. He had no desire to go into that other room, nor had he any fear. He only felt that it would have been rather senseless. His eye returned to the dead child, and suddenly the poignant question thrilled through him whether it was really bound to be true. Could not every one make a mistake, a physician as much as a layman? He held his open palm before the child's open lips and it was as though something cool was breathed towards him. And then he held both hands over the child's breast and again it seemed as though a light puff were playing over the tiny body. But it felt just the same as in the other place: no breath of life had blown towards him. He now bent down again and his lips touched the child's cool forehead. Something strange, something he scarcely felt tingled through his body to the very tips of his toes. He knew it now; he had lost the game up there in the clouds, his child was dead. Then he slowly lifted his head and turned away. The sight of the garden tempted him into the open. He stepped on to the verandah and saw Doctor Stauber and Frau Rosner sitting on the seat that was propped against the wall — both silent. They looked at him. He turned away as though he did not know them and went into the garden. The shadow of the house fell obliquely over the lawn, there was still sunlight higher up but it was dull and as though without the strength to illumine the air. Why did he want to think of that light which was sun and yet did not shine, that blue in the heights which was heaven and yet did not bless him? What was the point of the silence of this garden, which should console and comfort him, and yet received him to-day as though it were some strange inhospitable place? It gradually occurred to him that just such a twilight had enveloped him in a dream a short time ago with a dreariness of which he had previously had no idea, and had filled his soul with incomprehensible melancholy. What now? he said to himself aloud. He did not seek for any answer, and only knew that something unforeseen and unalterable had happened that must change the face of the world for him for all time. He thought of the day when his father had died. A wild grief had overwhelmed him then; yet he had been able to cry and the world had not suddenly become dark and void. His father had really lived, had once been young, had worked, loved, had children, experienced joys and sorrows. And the mother who had borne him had not suffered in vain. And even if he himself should have to die to-day, however early it might be, he had nevertheless a life behind him, a life full of light and music, happiness and suffering, hope and anxiety, steeped in all the fulness of the world. And even if Anna had passed away to-day, in the hour when she gave life to a new being, she would as it were have fulfilled her lot and her end would have had its terrible but none the less deep significance. But what had happened to his child was senseless, was revolting — a piece of irony from somewhere or other, whither one could send no question and no answer. What was the point of it all? What had been the significance of these past months with all their dreams, their troubles and their hopes? For he knew, all in a flash, that the expectation of the wonderful hour in which his child was to be born had always lain in the depths of his soul every single day, even those which were most matter-of-fact, those which were most vacant, or those which were most wanton. And he felt ashamed, impoverished, miserable.

He stood by the garden fence at the top end and looked towards the edge of the forest, towards his seat on which he had rested so often, and he felt as though forest and field and seat had previously been his possessions, and that he must now surrender them too, like so much else. In a corner of the garden stood a dark grey neglected summer-house with three little window-apertures and a narrow opening for a door. He had always disliked it, and had only gone in once for a few moments. To-day he felt drawn inside. He sat down on the cracked seat and suddenly felt hidden and soothed, as though all that had happened were less true or could in some inconceivable way be undone. Yet this hallucination soon vanished, he left the inhospitable room and stepped into the open.

I must now go back into the house again, he thought with a sense of exhaustion, and could not quite realise that the dead body of his child must be resting in the dark room, which he could see from here stretching behind the verandah like an unfathomable darkness. He walked slowly down the garden. Anna's mother was standing with a gentleman on the verandah. George recognised old Rosner. He stood there in his overcoat, he had laid his hat in front of him on the table. He passed a pocket handkerchief over his forehead and his red-lidded eyes twitched. He went towards George and pressed his hand. "What a pity that it turned out differently," he said, "than we had all hoped and expected!"

George nodded. He then remembered that the old gentleman's heart had not been quite right during the past week and inquired after his health.

"It is kind of you to ask, Herr Baron. I am a little better, only I find going uphill rather troublesome."

George noticed that the glass door that led to the centre room was closed. "Excuse me," he said to old Rosner, strode straight to the door, opened it and quickly closed it behind him. Frau Golowski and Doctor Stauber were standing near the table and speaking to each other. He walked up to them and they suddenly stopped talking.

"Well?" he inquired.

Doctor Stauber said: "We have been speaking about the... formalities. Frau Golowski will be kind enough to see to all that."

"Thank you," replied George and held out his hand to Frau Golowski.

"All that," he thought. A coffin, a funeral, a notification to the local registry; a son born of Anna Rosner, spinster, died on the same day. Nothing about the father of course. Yes, his part was finished. Only to-day? Had it not been finished the very second when quite by chance he became a father?

He looked at the table. The cloth was spread over the tiny corpse. Oh, how quick! he thought bitterly. Am I never to see it again? I suppose I may be allowed to, once. He drew the cloth a little away from the body and held it high up. He saw a pale child-face which was quite familiar to him, only since then some one had closed the eyes. The old grandfather's clock in the corner ticked. Six o'clock. Scarcely an hour had passed since his child had been born and died: the fact was already as indisputably certain as though it could never have been otherwise.

He felt a light touch on the shoulder.

"She took it quietly," said Doctor Stauber, standing behind him.

George dropped the cloth over the child's face and turned his head towards the side. "She already knows, then...?"

Doctor Stauber nodded. Frau Golowski had turned away.

"Who told her?" asked George.

"It wasn't necessary to tell her," replied Doctor Stauber, "was it?" He turned to Frau Golowski.

The latter explained: "When I went in to her she just looked at me, and then I saw at once that she already knew."

"And what did she say?"

"Nothing — nothing at all. She turned her eyes towards the window and was quite still. She asked where you had gone, Herr Baron, and what you were doing."

George breathed deeply. The door of Anna's room opened. The Professor came out in a black coat. "She is quite quiet," he said to George. "You can go in to her."

"Did she speak to you about it?" asked George.

The Professor shook his head. Then he said: "I am afraid I must go into town now; you'll excuse me, won't you? I hope things will go on all right. I shall be here early to-morrow any way. Good-bye, dear Herr Baron." He pressed his hand sympathetically. "You'll drive in with me, Doctor Stauber, won't you?"

"Yes," said Doctor Stauber, "I only want to say good-bye to Anna." He went.

George turned to the Professor. "May I ask you something?"

"Please do."

"I should very much like to know, Herr Professor, whether this is simply imagination. It seems to me, you know" — and he again lifted up the cloth from the tiny corpse— "as though this child did not look like a new-born one, more beautiful, so to speak. I feel as though the faces of new-born children were bound to be more wrinkled, more like old men. I can't tell you whether I have ever seen one or whether I've only read about it."

"You are quite right," replied the Professor. "It is just in cases of this kind, and also of course when things turn out more fortunately, that the features of the children are not distorted, are frequently, in fact, quite beautiful." He contemplated the little face with professional sympathy, nodded a few times: "Pity, pity"... let the cloth fall down again, and George knew that he had seen his child's face for the last time. What name would it have had? Felician.... Good-bye, little Felician!

Doctor Stauber came out of the next room and gently closed the door. "Anna is expecting you," he said to George. The latter gave him his hand, shook hands with the Professor again, nodded to Frau Golowski and went into the next room.

The nurse got up from Anna's side and disappeared out of the room. Opposite the door hung a mirror in which George saw an elegant young gentleman who was pale and was smiling. Anna lay in her bed, which stood clear in the middle of the room, with big clear eyes, which looked straight at George.

"What kind of a figure do I cut?" he thought. He pushed the chair close to her bed with some ceremoniousness, sat down, grasped her hand, put it to his forehead and then kissed her fingers long and almost ardently.

Anna was the first to speak. "You were in the garden?" she asked.

"Yes, I was in the garden."

"I saw you come down from the top some time ago."

"You had better not talk, Anna. Don't you feel it a strain?"

"These few words! Oh no. But you can tell me something...."

He was holding her hand in his all the time and looking at her fingers. Then he said: "Do you know that there is a little summer-house at the top end of the garden? Yes, of course you know.... I only mean, we'd never properly realised it."

"I was in there a few times during the first week," said Anna. "I don't like it."

"No, indeed!"

"Have you done any work this morning?" she then asked.

"What an idea, Anna!"

She shook her head quite gently. "And recently you have been getting on so well with it."

He smiled.

She remained serious. "You were in town yesterday?" she asked.

"You know I was."

"Did you find any letters? I mean important ones."

"You should really not talk so much, Anna. I'll tell you everything right enough. Well then, I found no letters of any importance. There was nothing from Detmold either. Anyway, I'll go and see Professor Viebiger one of these days. But we can talk about these things another time, don't you think? And so far as work goes... I've been having another look at Tristan this morning. I even know it down to the smallest detail. I could trust myself to conduct it to-day, if it came to the point."

She was silent and looked at him.

He remembered the evening when he had sat by her side at the Munich opera, as though enveloped in a transparent veil of the notes he loved so well. But he said nothing about it.

It grew dark. Anna's features began to grow dim. "Are you going to town to-day?" she asked.

He had not thought of doing so. But he now felt as though a kind of relief were beckoning to him. Yes, he would go in. What, after all, could he do out here? But he did not answer at once.

Anna began again: "I think you would perhaps like to speak to your brother."

"Yes, I should like to very much. I suppose you are going to sleep soon?"

"I hope so."

"How tired you must be," he said as he stroked her arm.

"No, it is rather different. I feel so awake... I can't tell you how awake I feel.... It seems as though I had never been so awake in my whole life. And I know at the same time that I'm going to sleep more deeply than I ever have... as soon as I've once closed my eyes."

"Yes, of course you will. But may I stay a bit longer with you? I'd really like to go on sitting here till you've fallen asleep."

"No, George, if you are here I can't go to sleep. But just stay a bit longer. It's so nice."

He held her hand all the time and looked out on to the garden, which was now lying in the twilight.

"You weren't very much up at Auhof this year?" said Anna indifferently, as though simply making conversation.

"Oh yes, nearly every day. Didn't I tell you? — I think Else will marry James Wyner and go with him to England."

He knew that she was not thinking of Else but of some one quite different. And he asked himself: Does she perhaps mean... that that is the reason?

A warm puff blew in from outside. Children's voices rang in. George looked out. He saw the white seat gleaming under the pear-tree and thought of how Anna had waited for him there in her flowing dress, beneath the fruit-laden branches, girdled by the gentle miracle of her motherhood. And he asked himself: "Was it fated then that it must end like this? Or was it after all so fated at the moment when we embraced each other for the first time?" The Professor's remark that one to two per cent. of all births ended like that came into his mind. So it was a fact that since people had started being born one or two in every hundred must perish in this senseless fashion at the very moment when they were brought into the light! And so many must die in their first years, and so many in the flower of their youth, and so many as men. And again a fated number put an end to their own lives, like Labinski. And so many were doomed to fail in their attempt, as in Oskar Ehrenberg's case. Why search for reasons? Some law is at work, incomprehensible and inexorable, which we men cannot struggle against. Who is entitled to complain? why should I be the victim? If it doesn't happen to one, it will happen to another... whether innocent or guilty like he was. One to two per cent. get hit, that is heavenly justice. The children who were laughing in the garden opposite, they were allowed to live. Allowed? No, they must live, even as his own child had had to die, after the first breath it drew, doomed to travel from one darkness into another, through a senseless nothingness.

It was twilight outside and it was almost night in the room. Anna lay still and motionless. Her hand did not move in George's, but when George got up he saw that her eyes were open. He bent down, hesitated a moment, then put his arm round her neck and kissed her on her lips, which were hot and dry and did not answer his touch. Then he went. In the next room the hanging lamp was alight over the table on which the dead child had lain some while back. The green tablecloth was now spread out as though nothing had happened. The door of Frau Golowski's room was open. The light of a candle shone in, and George knew that his child was sleeping in there, its first and last sleep.

Frau Golowski and Frau Rosner sat next to each other on the sofa by the wall, dumb, and as though huddled together. George went up to them. "Has Herr Rosner gone already?" He turned to Frau Rosner.

"Yes, he rode into the town with the doctors," she answered, and looked at him questioningly.

"She is quiet." George answered her look. "I think she will sleep soundly."

"Won't you take something?" asked Frau Golowski. "You haven't since one o'clock had...."

"No thanks, I'm going into town now. I want to speak to my brother. I am also expecting important letters. I'll be here again early to-morrow." He took his leave, went up to his attic, fetched the Tristan score from the balcony into the room, took his stick and overcoat, lit a cigarette and left the house. As soon as he was in the street he felt freer. An awful upheaval lay behind him. It had ended unhappily, but at any rate it had ended. And Anna was bound to be all right. Of course with mothers as well there was the fated percentage. But it was clear that the possibility of an unfortunate issue was according to the law of probabilities necessarily much less than if the child had remained alive.

He walked through the straggling village with swift strides, tried not to think of anything and looked with forced attention at every single house by which he passed. They were all mean, most of them positively dreary and squalid. Behind them little gardens sloped up to vineyards, cultivated fields and meadows in the evening mist. In an almost empty inn garden a few musicians were sitting by a long table, playing a melancholy waltz on violins, guitars and a concertina. Later on he passed more presentable houses, and he looked in through open windows into decently lighted rooms in which there were tables laid for dinner. He eventually took his seat in a cheerful inn garden, as far away as possible from the other not very numerous customers. He took his meal and soon felt a salutary fatigue come over him. On the tram he almost dozed off in his corner. It was only when the conveyance was driving through more lively streets that he thoroughly woke up and remembered what had happened, with an agonising but arid precision. He got out and walked home through the moist sultriness of the Stadtpark. Felician was not at home. He found a telegram lying on his secretary. It was from Detmold and ran as follows: “We request you kindly to inform us if you can possibly come to us within the next three days. This offer is to be considered for the time being as binding on neither party; travelling expenses paid in any event. — Faithfully, Manager of the Hoftheater.” Next to it lay the red form for the answer.

George was in a state of nervous tension. What should he answer now? The telegram clearly indicated that there was a vacancy for the post of conductor. Should he ask for a postponement? After eight days it would be quite easy to go there for an interview and then come back at once. He found thinking about it a strain. At any rate the matter could wait till to-morrow, and if that was too late then there would be no essential change in the position after all. He would always be welcomed as a special visitor, he knew that already. It was perhaps better not to bind himself... to go on working at his training somewhere, without yet taking obligations or responsibilities upon himself, and then to be ready and equipped for the following year. But what paltry considerations these were, when compared with the terrible event of his life which had occurred to-day! He took up the malachite paper-weight and put it on the telegram. What now...? he asked himself. Go to the club and rout out Felician? Yet that was not quite the place to tell him about the matter. It would really be best to stay at home and wait for him. It was in fact a little tempting to undress at once and lie down. But he certainly would not be able to sleep. So he came to think of tidying up his papers a little once again. He opened the drawer in his secretary, sorted bills and letters and made notes in his note-book. The noise of the street came in through the open windows as though from a distance. He thought of how he had read the letters of his dead parents in the same place in the previous summer after his father’s death, and how the same noise of the town and the same perfume from the park had streamed in to him just like to-day. The year that had elapsed since then seemed in his tired mind to extend into eternities, then contracted again into a short span of time, and something kept whispering in his soul: What for... what for? His child was dead. It would be buried in the churchyard by the Sommerhaidenweg. It would rest there in consecrated ground, from the toilsome journey which it was fated to take from one darkness into another through a senseless nothingness. It would lie under a little cross, as though it had lived and suffered a whole human life.... As though it had lived! It had really lived from the moment when its heart had already begun to beat in its mother’s body. No, even earlier.... It had belonged to the realm of the living from the very moment when its mother’s body had received it. And George thought of how many children of men and women were fated to perish even earlier than his own child, how many, wished and unwished, were fated to die in the first days of their life without their own mothers even having an idea. And while he dozed with shut eyes, half asleep and half awake, in front of his secretary, he saw nothing but shining crosses standing up on tiny mounds, as though it were a toy cemetery and a reddish yellow toy sun were shining over it. But suddenly the image represented the Cadenabbia cemetery. George was sitting like a little boy on the stone wall which surrounded it, and suddenly turned his gaze down towards the lake. And then there rode in a very long narrow boat, beneath dull yellow sails, with a green shawl on her shoulders, a woman, sitting motionless on the rowing bench, a woman whose face he tried to recognise with vague and almost painful efforts.

The bell rang. George got up. What was it? Oh, of course, there was no one there to open. The servant had been discharged since the first day of the month, and the porter's wife, who now looked after the brothers, was not in the apartment at this hour. George went into the hall and opened the door. Heinrich Bermann was standing in the hall.

"I saw a light in your room from down below," he said. "It was a good idea my first going past your house. I was going, as a matter of fact, to drive out to your place in the country."

Is his manner really so excited? thought George, or do I only think it is? He asked him to come in and sit down.

"Thanks, thanks, I prefer to walk up and down. No, don't light the high lamp. The table lamp's quite enough.... Anyway — how are you getting on out there?"

"A child was born this morning," replied George quietly. "But unfortunately it was dead."

"Still-born?"

"I don't know if one can say that," replied George with a bitter smile; "for it is supposed to have drawn one breath according to the doctor. The pains lasted for three days on end. It was ghastly. Now it's all over."

"Dead! I'm very sorry — I really am." He held out his hand to George.

"It was a boy," said George, "and strangely enough, very beautiful. Quite different from what new-born children usually look like." He then told him, too, how he had stayed quite a time in an inhospitable summer-house which he had never gone into before, and the strange way in which the lighting of the country had suddenly altered. "It was a light," said George, "that places in one's dreams sometimes have. Quite indefinite... like twilight... but rather mournful." While he said this, he knew that he would have described the whole matter quite differently to Felician.

Heinrich sat in the corner of the ottoman and let the other speak. He then began: "It is strange. All this affects me very much, of course, and yet... it calms me at the same time."

"Calms you?"

"Yes. As though certain things which I unhappily had to fear had suddenly grown less probable."

"What kind of things?"

Without listening to him Heinrich went on speaking with set teeth. "Or is it only because I am in the presence of another man's grief? Or is it because I am somewhere else, in a strange flat? That would be quite possible. Haven't you noticed that even one's own death strikes one as something highly improbable, when one is travelling for instance; frequently in fact when one is out for a walk. Man is subject to incomprehensible illusions like that."

Heinrich turned round after a few seconds, as though he had regained his self-control, but remained standing by the window with both hands resting on the sill behind him, and said laconically in a hard voice: "There's the possibility, you see, of the girl whose acquaintance you casually made the other day at my place having committed suicide. Please don't look so startled. As you know, many of her letters hinted that she would do it."

"Well?" said George.

Heinrich lifted his hand deprecatingly. "I never took it seriously at all. But I got a letter this morning which, I don't quite know how to express it, had an uncanny ring of truth about it. As a matter of fact there is nothing in it which she hasn't already written to me ten or twenty times over; but the tone... the tone.... To come to the point, I am as good as convinced that it has happened this time. Perhaps at this very minute!" He stopped and stared in front of him.

"No, Heinrich." George stepped up to him and put his hand on his shoulder. "No!" he added, more firmly, "I don't believe it at all. I spoke to her a few weeks ago. You know about that. And then she certainly did not give me the impression... I also saw her playing comedy.... If you had seen her acting in that impudent farce, you wouldn't believe it either, Heinrich. She only wants to revenge herself on you for your cruelty. Unconsciously, perhaps. Probably she has convinced herself on many occasions that she cannot go on living, but the fact that she has stuck it out till to-day.... Of course, if she had done it at once...."

Heinrich shook his head impatiently. "Just listen, George. I telegraphed to the Summer Theatre. I inquired if she were still there, suggesting that it was a question of a new part for her, rehearsal of a new piece of mine, or something like that. I have been waiting at home... till now... but there is no answer. If I don't get one, or not a satisfactory one, I'll certainly go there."

"Yes, but why didn't you simply ask if she...."

"If she has killed herself? One doesn't want to make oneself ridiculous, George. I might have asked for news on that point every other day or so, of course.... It would certainly have had a kind of grotesque humour right enough."

"Look here now — you don't believe it yourself?"

"I'll go home now to see if there's a telegram there. Good-bye, George. Forgive me. I couldn't stand it any more at home, you see.... I am really sorry to have bothered you with my own affairs at a time like this. Once more, I ask you to forgive me."

"You had no idea.... And even if you had known.... In my case, it's quite — a finished chapter, so to speak. In my case, there is unfortunately nothing more to do."

He looked excitedly out of the window, over the tops of the trees, towards the red spires and roofs which towered up out of the faint red light of the evening town. Then he said: "I'll come with you, Heinrich. I can't start anything at home. I mean.... If you don't mind my society."

"Mind!... My dear George!..." He pressed his hand.

They went. At first they walked along the park in silence. George remembered his walk with Heinrich through the Prater Allee last autumn, and immediately after that he remembered the May evening when Anna Rosner had appeared in the Waldsteingarten later than the others, and Frau Ehrenberg had whispered to him, "I have asked her specially for you." Yes, for him. If it had not been for that evening Anna would never have become his mistress, and none of all the events which lay heavy on him to-day would ever have happened. Was there some law at work in this? Of course! So many children had to come into the world every year, and a certain number of those out of wedlock, and good Frau Ehrenberg had imagined that inviting Fräulein Anna Rosner for Baron von Wergenthin had been a matter of her own personal fancy.

"Is Anna quite out of danger?" asked Heinrich.

"I hope so," replied George. Then he spoke about the pain which she had suffered, her patience, and her goodness. He felt the need of describing her as a perfect angel, as though he could thereby atone a little for the wrong he had done her.

Heinrich nodded. “She really seems to be one of the few women who are made to be mothers. It isn’t true, you know, that there are many of that kind. Having children — that’s what they’re all there for; but being mothers! And to think of her, of all people, having to suffer like that! I really never had an idea that anything like that could happen.”

George shrugged his shoulders. Then he said: “I had been expecting to see you out there again. I think you even made some promise to that effect when you dined with us and Therese a week ago.”

“Oh yes. Didn’t we squabble dreadfully, Therese and I? It got even more violent on the way home. Really quite funny. We walked, you know, right into the town. The people who met us are absolutely bound to have taken us for a couple of lovers, we quarrelled so dreadfully.”

“And who won in the end?”

“Won? Does it ever happen that any one wins? One only argues to convince oneself, never to convince the other person. Just imagine Therese eventually realising that a rational person can never become a member of any party! Or if I had been driven to confess that my independence of party betokened a lack of philosophy of life, as she contended! Why, we could both have shut up shop straight away. But what do you think of all this talk about a philosophy of life? As though a philosophy of life were anything else than the will and the capacity to see life as it really is. I mean, to envisage it without being led astray by any preconceived idea, without having the impulse to deduce a new law straight away from our particular experience, or to fit our experience into some existing law. But people mean nothing more by the expression ‘philosophy of life’ than a higher kind of devotion to a pet theory, devotion to a pet theory within the sphere of the infinite, so to speak. Or they go on talking about a gloomy or cheerful philosophy according to the colours in which their individual temperament and the accidents of their personal life happen to paint the world for them. People in the full possession of their senses have a philosophy of life and narrow-minded people haven’t. That’s how the matter stands. As a matter of fact, one doesn’t need to be a metaphysician to have a philosophy of life.... Perhaps in fact one shouldn’t be one at all. At any rate, metaphysics have nothing at all to do with the philosophy of life. Each of the philosophers really knew in his heart of hearts that he simply represented a kind of poet. Kant believed in the Thing In Itself, and Schopenhauer in the World as Will and Representation, just like Shakespeare believed in Hamlet, and Beethoven in the Ninth Symphony. They knew that another work of art had come into the world, but they never imagined for a single minute that they had discovered a final ‘truth.’ Every philosophical system, if it has any rhythm or depth, represents another possession for the world. But why should it alter a man’s relationship to the world if he himself has all his wits and senses about him?” He went on speaking with increasing excitement and fell, as it seemed to George, into a feverish maze. George then remembered that Heinrich had once invented a merry-go-round that turned in spirals higher and higher above the earth, to end finally in the top of a tower.

They chose a way through suburban streets, with few people and only moderate lighting. George felt as though he were walking about in a strange town. Suddenly a house appeared that was strangely familiar to him, and he now noticed for the first time that they were passing the house of the Rosner family. There were lights in the dining-room. Probably the old man was sitting there alone, or in the company of his son. Is it possible, thought George, that in a few weeks Anna will be sitting there again at the same table as her mother and father and brother as though nothing had happened? That she will sleep again night after night behind that window with its closed blinds and leave that house day after day to give her wretched lessons.... That she will take up that miserable life again as though nothing at all had changed? No. She should not go back to her family. It would be quite senseless. She must come to him, live with him, the man she belonged to. The Detmold telegram! He had almost forgotten it, but he must talk it over with her. It showed hope and prospects. Living was cheap in a little town like that. Besides, George's own fortune was a long way from being eaten up. One would be justified in chancing it. Besides, this post simply represented the beginning. Perhaps he would get another one soon in a larger town. In a single night one might be a success without expecting it — that was always the way — and one would have a name, not only as a conductor, but also as a composer, and it need only be two or three years before they could have the child with them.... The child... how the thought raged through his brain!... To think of one being able to forget a thing like that even for a minute.

Heinrich went on speaking all the time. It was quite obvious that he wanted to stupefy himself. He continued to annihilate philosophers. He had just degraded them from poets to jugglers. Every system, yes, every philosophic system and every moral system was nothing but a juggle of words, a flight from the animated fulness of phenomena into the marionette fixity of categories. But that was the very thing which mankind desired. Hence all the philosophies, all the religions, all the moral laws. They were all taking part in that identical flight.

A few, a very few, were given the awful inner faculty of being ready to feel every experience as new and individual — were given the strength to endure standing in a new world as it were, every single minute. And the truth was this: only the man who conquered the cowardly impulse of imprisoning all experiences in words was shown life — that manifold unity, that wondrous thing, in its own true shape.

George had the feeling that Heinrich, with all his talk, was simply trying to succeed in shaking off any sense of responsibility towards a higher law by refusing to recognise any. And with a kind of growing antagonism to Heinrich's silly and extraordinary behaviour he felt that the scheme of the world that had threatened some hours ago to fall to pieces was gradually beginning to put itself together again within his own soul. He had only recently rebelled against the senselessness of the fate which had struck him, and yet he already began to feel vaguely that even what had appeared to him as a grievous misfortune had not been precipitated upon his head out of the void, but that it had come to him along a way which, though darker, was quite as preordained as that which approached him along a far more visible road and which he was accustomed to call necessity.

They were in front of the house in which Heinrich lived. The concierge stood at the door and informed them that he had put a telegram in Heinrich's room a short time ago.

"Oh," said Heinrich indifferently, and slowly went up the stairs. George followed. Heinrich lit a candle in the hall. The telegram lay on the little table. Heinrich opened it, held it near to the flickering light, read it himself and then turned to George. "She's expected for the rehearsal to-morrow, and has not yet turned up." He took the light in his hand and followed by George went into the next room, put the light on the secretary, and walked up and down. George heard through the open window the strumming of a piano resounding over the dark courtyard.

"Is there nothing else in the telegram?" he asked.

"No. But it's obvious that not only has she been absent from the rehearsal, but that she wasn't to be found in her lodgings either. Otherwise, they would certainly have telegraphed that she was ill, or given some explanation or other. Yes, my dear George," he breathed deeply, "it has happened this time."

"Why? There is no proof of it. Scarcely anything to go on."

Heinrich cut short the other's remarks with a curt gesture. He then looked at his watch and said: "There are no more trains to-day.... Yes.... What should one do first?" He stopped, remained standing, and suddenly said: "I'll go to her mother's. Yes. That's the best.... Perhaps — perhaps...."

They left the apartment. They took a conveyance at the next corner.

“Did the mother know anything?” asked George.

“Damn it all,” said Heinrich, “about as much as mothers usually know. It is incredible the small amount of thought people give to what is taking place under their very noses, if they are not compelled to do so by some actual occasion. And most people have no idea how much they really know at the bottom of their hearts without owning up to it. The good woman is bound of course to be somewhat surprised at my springing up so suddenly.... I haven’t seen her for a long time.”

“What will you say to her?”

“Yes, what will I say to her?” repeated Heinrich, and bit at his cigar. “I say, I’ve got a splendid idea. You’ll come with me, George. I’ll introduce you as a manager, eh? You are travelling through, have got to catch a special train for St. Petersburg at eleven o’clock this very day. You’ve heard somewhere or other that the young lady is staying in Vienna, and I as an old friend of the family have been kind enough to introduce you.”

“Do you feel in the mood for comedies like that?” asked George.

“Please forgive me, George, it’s really not at all necessary. I’ll just ask the old woman if she has any news.... What do you say?... How sultry it is to-night!”

They drove over the Ring, through the echoing Burghof, through the streets of the town. George felt in a strange state of tension. Supposing the actress were now really sitting quietly at home with her mother? He felt that it would mean a kind of disillusionment for him. And then he felt ashamed of that emotion. Do I look upon the whole thing as simply a distraction? he thought. What happens to other people... is rarely more than that, Nürnberger would say.... A strange way of distracting oneself in order to forget the death of one’s child.... But what is one to do?... I can’t alter things. I shall be going away in a few days, thank heaven.

The vehicle stopped in front of a house in the neighbourhood of the Praterstern. A train was growling over the viaduct opposite; underneath the avenues of the Prater ran into the darkness. Heinrich dismissed the conveyance. “Thank you very much,” he said to George. “Good-bye.”

“I’ll wait for you here.”

“Will you really? Well, I should be awfully grateful if you would.”

He disappeared through the door. George walked up and down.

In spite of the lateness of the hour it was still fairly lively in the street. The strains of a military band in the Prater carried to the place where he was. A man and a woman went past him; the man carried in his arms a sleeping child, which had slung its hands round its father’s neck. George thought of the garden in Grinzinger, of the unwashed little thing which had stretched out its tiny hands to him from its mother’s arms. Had he been really touched then, as Nürnberger had asserted? No, it was certainly not emotion. Something else perhaps. The vague consciousness of standing with both hands linked in that riveted chain which stretches from ancestors to descendants, of participating in the universal human destiny. Now, he stood suddenly released again, alone... as though spurned by a miracle whose call he had heard without sufficient veneration. It struck ten o’clock from a neighbouring church tower. Only five hours, thought George, and how far away it all seemed! Now he was at liberty to knock about the world as he had done before.... Was he really at liberty?

Heinrich came out of the doorway. The door closed behind him. “Nothing,” he said. “The mother has no idea. I asked her for the address, as though I had something important to communicate to her. I had just come from the Prater, and it had occurred to me... and so on. A nice old woman. The brother sits at a table and copies on a drawing-board out of an illustrated paper a mediæval castle with innumerable turrets.”

“Be candid, for once in a way,” said George. “If you could save her by doing so, wouldn’t you forgive her now?”

“My dear George, don’t you see yet that it is not a question of whether I want to forgive her or not? Just remember this, I could just have stopped loving her, which can frequently happen without one’s being deceived at all. Imagine this — a woman who loves you pursuing you, a woman whose contact for some reason or other makes you shudder swearing to you that she’ll kill herself if you reject her. Would it be your duty to give in? Could you reproach yourself the slightest bit if she really went to her death, through the so-called pangs of despised love? Would you regard yourself as her murderer? It is sheer nonsense, isn’t it? But if you think that it’s what other people call conscience which is now torturing me, you are making a mistake. It is simply anxiety about what has happened to a person who was once very dear to me, and is I suppose still very dear to me. The uncertainty....” He suddenly stared fixedly in one direction.

“What is the matter with you?” asked George.

“Don’t you see? A telegraph messenger is coming towards the door of the house.” Before the man had time to ring Heinrich was at his side, and said a few words which George could not understand.

The messenger seemed to be making objections. Heinrich was answering and George, who had come nearer, could hear him.

“I have been waiting for you here in front of the door because the doctor gave me stringent orders to do so. This telegram contains... perhaps... bad news... and it might be the death of my mother. If you don’t believe me, you just ring and I’ll go into the house with you.” But he already had the telegram in his hands, opened it hurriedly and started to read it by the light of the street lamp. His face remained absolutely immobile. Then he folded the telegram together again, handed it to the messenger, pressed a few silver coins into his hand. “You must now take it in yourself.”

The messenger was surprised, but the tip put him in a better temper.

Heinrich rang and turned away. “Come!” he said to George. They went silently down the street. After a few minutes Heinrich said: “It has happened.”

George felt more violently shocked than he had anticipated. “Is it possible...?” he exclaimed.

“Yes,” said Heinrich. “She drowned herself in the lake — where you spent a few days this summer,” he added in a tone which seemed to imply that George too was somehow partly responsible for what had happened.

“What’s in the telegram?” inquired George.

“It’s from the manager. It contains the news that she has had a fatal accident while out boating. Requests her mother to give further directions.”

He spoke in a cool hard voice, as though he were reading an announcement out of a paper.

“That poor woman! I say, Heinrich, oughtn’t you to....”

“What!... Go to her? What should I be doing there?”

“Who is there, except you, who can at a time like this stand by her... ought to, in fact?”

“Who except me?” He remained standing. “You think that because it happened more or less on my account? I tell you positively that I feel absolutely innocent. The boat out of which she let herself drop, and the waves which received her could not feel more innocent than I do. I just want to settle that point.... But that I should go in and see the mother.... Yes, you are quite right about it.” And he turned again in the direction of the house.

“I will remain with you if you like,” said George.

“What an idea, George! Just go quietly home. What more am I to ask you to do? And remember me to Anna, and tell her how sorry I am.... Well, you know that.... Ah, here we are. You don’t mind my keeping you a few seconds more before I....” He stood silently there. He then began again, and his features became distorted. “I’ll tell you something, George. It’s like this. It’s a great happiness that at certain times one doesn’t know what has really happened to one. If one immediately realised the awfulness of moments like this, you know, to the extent one realises them afterwards in one’s memory, or realises them before in anticipation — one would go mad. Even you, George — yes, even you. And many do really go mad. Those are probably the people who are granted the gift of realising straight away.... My mistress has drowned herself, do you see? That’s all one can say. Has the same kind of thing really happened to any one else before? Oh no. Of course you think that you have read or heard of something similar. It is not true. To-day is the first time — the first time since the world’s been in existence — that anything like this has ever happened.”

The door opened and closed again. George was alone in the street. His head was dazed, his heart oppressed. He went a few steps, then took a fly and drove home. He saw the dead woman in front of him, just as she had stood in front of the stage door on that bright summer day in her red blouse and short white skirt, with the roving eyes beneath the reddish hair. He would have sworn at the time that she had a liaison with the comedy actor who looked like Guido. Perhaps that really was the case. That might be one kind of love and what she felt for Heinrich another. Really there were far too few words. You go to your death for one man, you go to bed with another — perhaps the very night before you drown yourself for the first. And what, after all, does a suicide really mean? Only perhaps that at some moment or other one has failed to appreciate death. How many tried again if they had failed once? The conversation with Grace came into his mind, that hot-and-cold conversation by Labinski’s grave on the sunny February day in the thawing snow.

She had confessed to him then that she had not felt any fear or horror when she had found Labinski shot in front of the door of her flat. And when her little sister had died many years ago she had watched the whole night by the death-bed without feeling even a trace of what other people called horror. But, so she told George, she had learned to feel in men’s embraces something that might be rather like that feeling. At first the thing had puzzled her acutely, subsequently she thought she could understand it, but according to what the doctors said she was doomed to barrenness, and that must be the reason why it came about that the moment of supreme delight, which was rendered as it were pointless by this fate, plunged her in terror and apprehension. This had struck George at the time as a piece of affectation. To-day he felt a breath of truth in it for the first time. She had been a strange creature. Would he ever meet again a person of a similar type? Why not? Quite soon, as a matter of fact. A new epoch in his life was now beginning and the next adventure was perhaps waiting for him somewhere or other. Adventure...? Had he a right still to think about such things?... Were not, from to-day onwards, his responsibilities more serious than they had ever been? Did he not love Anna more than he had ever done before? The child was dead, but the next one would live.... Heinrich had spoken the truth: Anna was simply cut out to be a mother. A mother.... But he thought with a shiver: Was she cut out at the same time to be the mother of my children? The fly stopped. George got out and went up the two storeys to his apartment. Felician was not yet home. Who knows when he will come? thought George. I can’t wait for him, I’m too tired. He undressed quickly, sank into bed, and a deep sleep enveloped him.

When he woke up his eyes tried to find through the window a white line between field and forest, the Sommerhaidenweg which he had been accustomed to look at for some days. But he only saw the bluish empty sky which a tower was piercing, and suddenly realised that he was at home, and all that he had lived through yesterday came into his mind. Yet he felt fresh and alert in mind and body, and it seemed to him as though apart from the calamity which had befallen him there was a piece of good fortune which he had to remember. Oh yes, the Detmold telegram.... Was it really so lucky? He had not thought so yesterday evening.

There was a knock at his door. Felician came into the room with his hat and stick in his hand. “I didn’t know that you slept at home last night,” he said. “Glad to see you. Well, what’s the news out there?”

George rested his arm on the pillow and looked up towards his brother. “It’s over,” he said; “a boy, but dead,” and he looked straight in front of him.

“Not really,” said Felician with emotion, came up to him and instinctively put his hand upon his brother’s head. He then put hat and stick on one side and sat down on the bed by him, and George could not help thinking of the morning hours of the years of his childhood, when he had often seen his father sitting like that on the edge of the bed when he woke up. He explained to Felician how it had all happened, laying especial stress on Anna’s patience and gentleness; but he felt with a certain sense of misgiving that he had to force himself a bit to keep the tone of seriousness and depression which was appropriate to his news. Felician listened sympathetically, then got up and walked up and down the room. Then George got up, began to dress and told his brother of the remarkable developments of the rest of the evening. He spoke about his walks and drives with Heinrich Bermann and of the strange way in which they had learned at last of the actress’s suicide.

“Oh, that’s the one,” said Felician. “It’s already in the papers, you know.”

“Well, what happened?” asked George curiously.

“She rowed out into the lake and slipped into the water out of the boat.... Well, you can read it.... I suppose you’re now going straight out into the country again?” he added.

“Of course,” replied George, “but I have still got something to tell you, Felician, something which may interest you.” And he told his brother about the Detmold telegram.

Felician seemed surprised. “This is getting serious,” he exclaimed.

“Yes, it’s getting serious,” replied George.

“You have not yet answered?”

“No, how could I?”

“And what do you mean to do?”

“Frankly, I don’t know. You understand I can’t go straight away, particularly under circumstances like this.”

Felician looked reflective. “A little delay probably wouldn’t hurt,” he said then.

“I agree. I must first find out how they’re getting on out there. Of course I should also like to talk it over with Anna.”

“Where have you put the telegram? Can I read it?”

“It’s lying on the secretary,” said George, who was at the moment engaged in tying up his shoes.

Felician went into the next room, took the telegram in his hand and read it. “It is much more urgent,” he observed, “than I thought.”

“It seems to me, Felician, that it still strikes you as strange that I am shortly going to have a real profession.”

Felician stood at his brother’s side again and stroked his hair. “It is perhaps rather providential that the telegram should have come yesterday.”

“Providential! How so?”

“I mean that after such a sad business the prospect of practical occupation ought to do you twice as much good.... But I am afraid I must leave you now. I’ve still got quite a lot to do. Farewell visits among other things.”

“When are you going then, Felician?”

“A week to-day. I say, George, I suppose you are probably coming back from the country to-day?”

“Certainly, if everything is all right out there.”

“Perhaps we might see each other again in the evening.”

“I should like to very much, Felician.”

“Well then, if it suits you I’ll be at home at seven. We might go and have supper together — but alone, not at the club.”

“Yes, with pleasure.”

“And you might do me a favour,” began Felician again after a short silence. “Remember me out there very very kindly... tell her that I sympathise most sincerely.”

“Thank you, Felician. I will tell her.”

“Really, George, I can’t tell you how much it touched me,” continued Felician with warmth. “I only hope that she’ll soon get over it.... And you, too.”

George nodded. “Do you know,” he said gently, “what it was going to be called?”

Felician looked at his brother’s eyes very seriously, then he pressed his hand. “Next time,” he said with a kindly smile. He shook hands with his brother again and went.

George looked after him, torn by varying emotions. Yet he’s not altogether sorry, he thought, that it should have turned out like that.

He got ready quickly and decided to cycle into the country again to-day. It was only when he had got past most of the traffic that he really became conscious of himself. The sky had grown a little dull and a cool wind blew from the hills towards George, like an autumn greeting. He did not want to meet any one in the little village where yesterday’s events were bound to be already known, and took the upper road between the meadows and the garden to the approach from the back. The nearer the moment came when he was to see Anna again, the heavier his heart grew. At the railing he dismounted from his cycle and hesitated a little. The garden was empty. At the bottom lay the house sunk in silence. George breathed deeply and painfully. How different it might have been! he thought, walked down and heard the gravel crunch beneath his feet. He went on to the verandah, leaned his cycle against the railing and looked into the room through the open window. Anna lay there with open eyes. “Good morning,” he cried, as cheerfully as he could.

Frau Golowski, who was sitting by Anna’s bed, got up and said at once: “We’ve had a good sleep, a good sound sleep.”

“That’s right,” said George, and vaulted over the railing into the room.

“You’re very enterprising to-day,” said Anna with her arch smile, which reminded George of long-past times. Frau Golowski informed him that the Professor had been early in the morning, had expressed himself completely satisfied and taken Frau Rosner with him in his carriage into the town. She then went away with a kindly glance.

George bent down over Anna, kissed her with real feeling on the eyes and mouth, pushed the chair nearer, sat down and said: “My brother — sends you his sincere wishes.”

Her lips quivered imperceptibly. “Thank you,” she replied gently, and then remarked: “So you came out on your cycle?”

“Yes,” he replied. “One has to keep a look-out you know on the way, and there are times when it’s rather a sound thing one has to do so.” He then told her how last evening had finished up. He related the whole thing as an exciting story, and it was only in the orthodox way at the end that Anna was allowed to find out how Heinrich’s mistress had ended her life. He expected to see her moved, but she kept a strangely hard expression about her mouth. “It’s really dreadful,” said George. “Don’t you think so?”

“Yes,” replied Anna shortly, and George felt that her kindness completely failed her here. He saw the loathing flowing out of her soul, not tepidly, as though from one person to another, but strong and deep like a stream of hate from world to world.

He dropped the subject and began again. “Now for something important, my child.” He was smiling but his heart beat a little.

“Well?” she asked tensely.

He took the Detmold telegram out of his breast pocket and read it to her. “What do you think of that?” he asked with affected pride.

“And what did you answer?”

“Nothing so far,” he replied casually, as though he had never thought of taking the matter seriously. “Of course I wanted first to talk it over with you.”

“Well, what do you think?” she asked imperturbably.

“I... shall refuse of course. I’ll wire that I... at any rate, can’t come yet awhile.” And he seriously explained to her that nothing would be lost by a postponement, that he would at any rate be welcomed as a special visitor, and that this pressing request was only due to an accident that one had no right to expect.

She let him go on speaking for a while, then she said: “There you go being casual again. I think you should have made a special point of answering at once and....”

“Well, and....”

“Perhaps have even taken the train there straight away this morning.”

“Instead of coming out to see you — eh?” he jested.

She remained serious. “Why not?” she said, and noticing him jerk his head up in surprise, “I’m getting on very well, thank heaven, George. And even if I were a bit worse you couldn’t do any good, so....”

“Yes, my child,” he interrupted, “it seems to me you don’t appreciate what it really means! Going there, of course, is a fairly simple matter — but — staying there! Staying there at least till Easter! The season lasts till then.”

“Well, George, I think it quite right that you haven’t gone away without first saying goodbye to me. But look here, you’ve got to go anyway, haven’t you? Even though we didn’t actually speak about it during the last weeks we were both quite well aware of it. For whether you go away in a month’s time or the day after to-morrow — or to-day....”

George now began to argue seriously. It was not at all the same thing whether he went away in a month’s time or to-day. One could manage to get used to certain thoughts in the course of a month, and besides, talk over everything properly — with regard to the future.

“What is there so much to talk over?” she replied in a tired voice. “Why, in a month’s time you’ll be.... You’ll have as little chance of taking me with you as you have to-day. I even think that there won’t be any point in our talking seriously about anything until after your return. A great deal will be bound to be cleared up by then.... At any rate, with regard to your prospects....” She looked out of the window into the garden.

George showed mild indignation at her matter-of-fact coolness, which never deserted her, even at a moment like that. “Yes, indeed,” he said, “when one considers — what it means for you to stay here, and me....”

She looked at him. “I know what it means,” she said.

Instinctively he avoided her look, took her hands and kissed them. He felt inwardly harrowed. When he looked up again he saw her eyes resting on him quite maternally, and she spoke to him like a mother. She explained to him that it was just because of the future — and there swept around that word a gentle suggestion of actual hope — that he should not miss an opportunity like that. In two or three weeks he could come back from Detmold to Vienna for a few days, for the people there would certainly appreciate that he must put his affairs over here in order. But above all it was necessary to give them a proof of his seriousness. And if he set any store by her advice there was only one thing to do: take the train that very evening. He need have no anxiety about her. She felt that she was quite out of danger. She felt that quite unmistakably. Of course he would hear from her every day, twice a day if he liked, morning and evening.

He did not yield at once, coming back again to the point that the unexpectedness of this separation would occasion a relapse. She answered that she would much prefer a quick separation like this to the prospect of another four weeks spent in anxiety, emotion and the fear of losing him. And the essential point remained that it was not a question of more than half the year, so they had half the year for themselves, and if everything went all right there would not be many periods of separation for the — the future.

He now began again: "And what will you do in this half-year, while I'm away? It is really...."

She interrupted him. "For the time being it will go on just as it has been going on for years; but I have been thinking this morning about a lot of things."

"The school for singing?"

"That, too. Although of course that is neither so easy nor so simple. And besides," she added, with her arch expression, "it would be a pity if one had to shut it up again too soon. But we'll talk about all that later on. You go now and telegraph."

"Yes, but what!" he exclaimed in such desperation that she could not help laughing.

Then she said: "Quite simple, 'Shall have the honour to present myself at your office to-morrow noon. Yours very obediently or faithfully... or very proudly....'"

He looked at her. Then he kissed her hand and said: "You're certainly the cleverer of us two."

His tone seemed to hint "the cooler too." But a gentle, tender and somewhat mocking look from her turned away the innuendo.

"Well, I'll be back again in ten minutes." He left her with a cheerful face, went into the next room and shut the door. Opposite, in that other room, it now occurred to him again forcibly — his dead child lay in its coffin.... For the necessary steps, to use Doctor Stauber's expression of yesterday, were bound to have been already taken. He felt a paroxysm of grievous yearning.

Frau Golowski came out of the hall. She came up to him and spoke with admiration of Anna's resignation and calmness.

George listened somewhat absent-mindedly. His looks kept always glancing through the doorway and at last he said gently: "I should like to see it once more."

She looked at him, at first slightly shocked and then sympathetically.

"Nailed down already?" he asked anxiously.

"Sent away already," replied Frau Golowski slowly.

"Sent away!" His face became convulsed with such agony that the old woman laid her hands on his arm as though to calm him.

"I went to notify it quite early," she said, "and then the other matter took place very quickly. They took it away an hour ago to the mortuary."

"To the mortuary..." George shuddered. He was silent for a long time as though unnerved from having just learned a terrible and completely unexpected piece of news. When he recovered himself again he still felt Frau Golowski's friendly hand upon his arm and saw her kind eyes with their tired lines resting on his face. "So it's all finished," he said, with an indignant look upwards, as though his last hope had been maliciously stolen from him. He then shook hands with Frau Golowski. "And you've undertaken all this, dear lady.... I really don't know... how I can ever...."

A gesture from the old woman deprecated any further thanks.

George left the house, threw a contemptuous glance at the little blue angel, which seemed to look anxiously down at the faded flower-beds, and went into the street. On his way to the post-office he worried over the wording of the telegram that was to announce his arrival at the place of his new profession and his new prospects.

IX

OLD DOCTOR STAUBER and his son sat over their coffee. The old man held a paper in his hand and seemed to be trying to find something. "The hearing of the case," he said, "is not yet fixed."

"Really!" replied Berthold, "Leo Golowski thinks that it will take place in the middle of November, that is to say in about three weeks. Therese, you know, visited her brother a few days ago in prison. They say he is perfectly calm and in quite good spirits."

"Well, who knows? perhaps he will be acquitted," said the old man.

"That's highly improbable, father. He ought to be glad, on the other hand, that he isn't being prosecuted for ordinary murder. An attempt was certainly made to get him prosecuted for it."

"You certainly can't call it a serious attempt, Berthold. You see the Treasury didn't bother about the silly libel to which you are referring."

"But if they had regarded it as a libel," retorted Berthold sharply, "they would have been under an obligation to prosecute the libellers. Beside, it is common knowledge that we are living in a state where no Jew is safe from being convicted to death for ritual murder; so why should the authorities shrink from taking official cognisance of the theory that Jews when they fight duels with pistols with Christians manage — perhaps for religious reasons — to ensure for themselves a criminal advantage? That the Court didn't lack the good-will to take another opportunity of doing a service to the party in power is best seen by the fact that he still remains under arrest pending the trial, in spite of the fact that the high bail was tendered."

"I don't believe the story about the bail," said the old doctor. "Where's Leo Golowski to get fifty thousand gulden from?"

"It wasn't fifty thousand, father, but a hundred thousand, and so far Leo Golowski knows nothing about it. I can tell you in confidence, father, that Salomon Ehrenberg put up the money."

"Indeed! Well, I'll tell you something in confidence too, Berthold."

"Well?"

"It's possible that it won't go to trial at all. Golowski's advocate has presented a petition to quash the proceedings."

Berthold burst out laughing. "On those grounds! And do you think, father, that that can have the slightest prospect of success? Yes, if Leo had fallen and the First-Lieutenant had survived... then perhaps."

The old man shook his head impatiently. "You must always make opposition speeches, my boy, at any price."

"Forgive me, father," said Berthold, twitching his brows. "Every one hasn't got the enviable gift of being able to ignore certain tendencies in public life when they don't concern him personally."

"Is that what I am in the habit of doing, then?" retorted the old man vehemently, and the half-shut eyes beneath the high forehead opened almost bitterly. "But it is you, Berthold, much more than I, who refuse to look where you don't want to see. I think you're beginning to brood over your ideas. You're getting morbid. I had hoped that a stay in another city, in another country, would cure you of certain petty narrow ideas, but they have grown worse instead. I notice it. I can neither understand nor approve any one starting fighting like Leo Golowski did. But to go on standing with your clenched fist in your pocket, so to speak — what's the point of it? Pull yourself together, man. Character and industry always pull through in the end. What's the worst that can happen to you? That you get your professorship a few years later than any one else. I don't think it is so great a misfortune. They won't be able to ignore your work if it is worth anything...."

"It is not only a question of myself," objected Berthold.

"But it is mostly a matter of second-class interests of that kind. And to come back to our previous topic, it is really very questionable whether if it had been the First-Lieutenant who had shot down Leo Golowski and Ehrenberg, or Ehrenmann[A pun on the word Ehre which means honour] for that matter, would have turned up with a hundred thousand gulden for him. Yes, to be sure, and now you are quite at liberty to take me for an Anti-Semite too, if it amuses you, although I am driving straight into the Rembrandtstrasse to see old Golowski. Well, good-bye, try and come to reason at last." He held out his hand to his son. The latter took it without changing countenance. The old man turned to go. At the door he said: "I suppose we shall see each other this evening at the Medical Society?"

Berthold shook his head. "No, father, I am spending this evening in a less edifying place — the 'Silberne Weintraube,' where there is a meeting of the Social Political Union."

"Which you can't miss?"

"Impossible."

"Well, I wish you would tell me straight out. Are you going to stand for the Landtag?"

"I... am going to stand."

"Indeed! You think you're capable now of being able to face the... unpleasantness which you ran away from last year?"

Berthold looked through the window at the autumn rain. "You know, father," he replied, twitching his brows, "that I wasn't in the right frame of mind then. I now feel strong and armed, in spite of your previous remarks, which have really touched the actual point. And above all I know precisely what I want."

The old man shrugged his shoulders. "I can't understand how any one can give up a definite work... and you will certainly have to give it up, for a man can't serve two masters... to think of dropping something definite to... to make speeches to people whose profession, so to speak, it is to have preconceived opinions — to fight for opinions which are usually not even believed in by the man who puts you forward to represent them."

Berthold shook his head. "I assure you, father, I'm not tempted this time by any oratorical or dialectical ambition. This time I have discovered the sphere in which I hope it will be possible for me to do quite as definite work as in the laboratory. I intend, you know, if I do any good at all, to bother about nothing else except questions of public health. Perhaps I can count on your blessing, father, for this kind of political activity."

"On mine... yes. But how about your own?"

"What do you mean?"

"The blessing to which one might give the name of the inner call."

"You doubt even that," replied Berthold, really hurt.

The servant came in and gave the old doctor a visiting card. He read it. "Tell him I'll be glad to see him in a minute."

The servant went away.

Berthold went on speaking in a state of some excitement. "I feel justified in saying that my training, my knowledge...."

His father interrupted him as he played with the card. "I don't doubt your knowledge or your energy or your industry, but it seems to me that to be able to do any particular good in the sphere of public health you need as well as those excellent qualities another one too, which in my view you only have to a very small extent: kindness, my dear Berthold, love of mankind."

Berthold shook his head vehemently. "I regard the love of humanity which you mean, father, as absolutely superfluous and rather injurious. Pity — and what else can loving people whom one doesn't personally know really be? — necessarily leads to sentimentalism, to weakness. And when one wants to help whole groups of men then, above all, you must be able to be hard at times, hard to individuals — yes, be ready in fact to sacrifice them if the common good demands it. You only need to consider, father, that the most honest and consistent social hygiene would have the direct result of annihilating diseased people, or at any rate excluding them from all enjoyment of life, and I don't deny that I have all kinds of ideas tending in that way which may seem cruel at the first glance. But the future, I think, belongs to ideas. You needn't be afraid, father, that I shall begin straight away to preach the murder of the unhealthy and the superfluous. But theoretically that's certainly what my programme leads to. Do you know, by the way, whom I had a very interesting conversation with the other day on this very subject?"

"What subject do you mean?"

"To put it precisely, a conversation on the right to kill. With Heinrich Bermann the author, the son of the late Deputy."

"But where did you get the opportunity of seeing him then?"

"The other day at a meeting. Therese Golowski brought him along. You know him, too, don't you, father?"

"Yes," replied the old man, "I've known him for quite a long time." And he added: "I met him again this year in the summer at Anna Rosner's."

Berthold's eyebrows again twitched violently. Then he said sarcastically: "I thought it was something like that. Bermann mentioned, you know, that he had seen you some time ago, but he wouldn't remember exactly where. I concluded that it must have been a case of — discretion. I see. So the Herr Baron thought he would introduce his friends into her house."

"My dear Berthold, your tone seems to suggest that you have not got over a certain matter as completely as you previously hinted."

Berthold shrugged his shoulders. "I have never denied that I have an antipathy for Baron Wergenthin. That is why the whole business was so painful to me from the very beginning."

"Is that why?"

"Yes."

"And yet I think, Berthold, that you would regard the matter differently if you were to meet Anna Rosner again some time or other as a widow — even assuming that her late husband was even more antipathetic to you than Baron von Wergenthin."

"That's possible. One can certainly presume that she has been loved — or at any rate respected, not just taken and — chucked away as soon as the spree was over. I'd have found that rather.... Well, I won't put it any more definitely."

The old man shook his head as he looked at his son. "It really seems as though all the advanced views of you young people break down as soon as your passions and vanities come into question."

"So far as certain questions of cleanness or cleanliness are concerned I do not know that I am guilty of any so-called advanced views, father, and I don't think that you would be particularly delighted either if I felt any desire to be the successor of a more or less dead Baron Wergenthin."

"Certainly not, Berthold. For her sake, especially, for you would torture her to death."

"Don't be uneasy," replied Berthold, "Anna's in no peril from my quarter. It's all over."

"That's a good reason. But, happily, there's an even better one. Baron Wergenthin's neither dead nor has he cleared out....”

“It doesn’t matter, you know, about the actual word.”

“He has, as you know, a position as a conductor in Germany....”

“What a piece of luck! He has really been very fortunate over the whole thing. Not even having to provide for a child.”

“You have two faults, Berthold. In the first place you are really an unkind man, and in the second place you never let one finish. I was just on the point of saying that it doesn’t seem to be anything like all over between Anna and Baron Wergenthin. Only the day before yesterday she gave me his kind regards.”

Berthold shrugged his shoulders as though the matter were finished so far as he was concerned. “How’s old Rosner?” he asked.

“He’ll pull through all right this time,” replied the old man. “Anyway, I hope that you’ve retained a sufficient sense of detachment to realise that his attacks are not due to his grief about the prodigal daughter, but to a sclerosis of the arteries that is unfortunately fairly far advanced.”

“Is Anna giving lessons again?” asked Berthold after some hesitation.

“Yes,” replied the old man, “but perhaps not much longer.” And he showed his son the visiting card which he was still holding in his hand.

Berthold contracted the corners of his mouth. “Do you think,” he asked ironically, “he has come here to celebrate his wedding, father?”

“I shall soon find that out,” replied the old man. “At any rate I’m very glad to see him again — for I assure you he’s one of the most charming young men I’ve ever met.”

“Extraordinary!” said Berthold. “A quite unique winner of hearts. Even Therese raves about him. And Heinrich Bermann the other day, it was almost funny.... Oh well, a slim handsome blonde young man, a baron, a German, a Christian — what Jew could withstand the magic?... Goodbye, father.”

“Berthold!”

“Well, what?” He bit his lips.

“Pull yourself together! Remember what you are.”

“I... remember.”

“No, you don’t. Otherwise you couldn’t forget so often who the others are.”

Berthold lifted his head interrogatively.

“You should really go to Rosner’s some time. It is not worthy of you to let Anna see your disapproval in so — childish a fashion. Goodbye... hope you’ll have a good time in the ‘Silberne Weintraube.” He shook hands with his son and then went into his consulting-room. He opened the door of the waiting-room and with a friendly nod of the head invited George von Wergenthin, who was turning over the leaves of an album, to come in.

“I must first apologise to you, Herr Doctor,” said George, after he had sat down. “My departure was so sudden.... Unfortunately I had no opportunity of saying goodbye to you, of thanking you personally for your great....”

Doctor Stauber deprecated his thanks. “I am very glad to see you again,” he said, “I suppose you are here in Vienna on leave?”

“Of course,” replied George. “I’ve only got three days’ leave; they need me there so urgently, you see,” he added with a modest smile.

Doctor Stauber sat opposite him in the chair behind his secretary and contemplated him kindly. “You feel very satisfied with your new position, so Anna says.”

"Oh yes; of course there are all kinds of difficulties when one plunges into a new kind of life like I did. But taking it all round everything has turned out much easier than I expected."

"So I hear. And that you have already had a very good introduction at Court."

George smiled. "Anna of course imagines that episode to be more magnificent than it really was. I played once at the Hereditary Prince's and a lady member of the theatre sang two songs of mine there; that's all. But what is much more important is that I have a chance of being appointed conductor this very season."

"I thought you were already."

"No, Herr Doctor, not yet officially. I have already conducted a few times as deputy, Freischütz and Undine, but for the time being I am only accompanist."

In response to further questions from the doctor he told him some more about his activities at the Detmold Opera. He then got up and said goodbye.

"Perhaps I can give you a lift part of the way in my carriage," said the doctor. "I am driving to the Rembrandtstrasse to the Golowskis'."

"Thanks very much, Herr Doctor, but that's not on my way. Anyway, I intend to visit Frau Golowski in the course of to-morrow. She's not ill, is she?"

"No. Of course the excitement of the last weeks is bound to have had some effect upon her."

George mentioned that he had written a few words to her and also to Leo immediately after the duel. "When one thinks that it might have turned out differently..." he added.

Doctor Stauber looked in front of him. "Having children," he said, "is a happiness which one pays for by instalments."

At the door George began somewhat hesitatingly: "I also wanted... to inquire of you, Herr Doctor, about the real state of Herr Rosner's health.... I must say I found him looking better than I had expected from Anna's letters."

"I hope that he will get all right again," replied Stauber. "But of course one must remember that he's an old man. He's even old for his years."

"But it's not a case of anything serious?"

"Old age is a serious business in itself," replied Doctor Stauber, "especially as his whole antecedent life, his youth and manhood, were not particularly cheerful."

George, whose eyes had been roving round the room, suddenly exclaimed: "I've just thought of it, Herr Doctor. I've never sent you back the books you were good enough to lend me in the spring. And now I'm afraid all our things are at the depository, silver, furniture, pictures and the books as well. So I must ask you, Herr Doctor, to have patience till the spring."

"If you have no worse troubles than that, my dear Baron...."

They went slowly down the stairs and Doctor Stauber inquired after Felician.

"He's in Athens," replied George, "I've heard from him twice, not yet in any great detail.... How strange it is, Herr Doctor, coming back as a stranger to a town where one was at home a short time ago, and staying at an hotel as a gentleman from Detmold!..."

Doctor Stauber got into his carriage. George asked him to give his very best regards to Frau Golowski.

"I'll tell her. And I wish you all further success, my dear Baron. Goodbye."

It was five by the Stephanskirche clock. George was faced with an empty hour. He decided to stroll slowly into the suburb in the thin tepid autumn rain. He had scarcely slept at all in the train and he had been at the Rosners' two hours after his arrival. Anna herself had opened the door to him, greeted him with an affectionate kiss, and quickly taken him into the room, where her parents welcomed him with more politeness than sincerity. The mother, who preserved her usual embarrassed and slightly injured tone, did not say much. The father, sitting in the corner of the ottoman, with a blue-coloured rug over his knees, felt it incumbent on him to inquire about the social and musical conditions of the little capital from which George had come. Then he had remained alone awhile with Anna. They first exchanged question and answer with undue quickness, and subsequently endearments, which were both flat and awkward, and they both seemed disappointed that they did not feel the happiness of seeing each other again with anything like the intensity which their love had given them to expect. Very soon a pupil of Anna's put in an appearance. George took his leave and hurriedly arranged an appointment for the evening with his mistress. He would fetch her from Bittner's and then take her to the opera to see the performance of Tristan.

He had then taken his midday meal by the big window of a restaurant in the Ringstrasse, made purchases and given orders at his tradesmen's, looked up Heinrich, whom he did not find at home, and finally, obeying a sudden idea, decided to pay his "return-thanks" visit to Doctor Stauber. He now walked on slowly through the streets which he knew so well and which already seemed to have an atmosphere of strangeness; and he thought of the town from which he came and in which he was feeling at home far more quickly than he had expected. Count Malnitz had received him with great kindness from the very first moment. He had the plan of reforming the opera in accordance with modern ideas and wanted to win George to him, so the latter thought, as a collaborator and friend in his far-reaching projects. For the first conductor, excellent musician no doubt though he might be, was nowadays more of a court official than an artist. He had been appointed when he was five-and-twenty and had now been stationed in the little town for thirty years, a paterfamilias with six children, respected, contented and without ambition. Soon after his arrival George heard songs sung at a concert which a long time ago had spread the fame of the young conductor throughout almost the whole world. George was unable to understand the impression produced by these quite out-of-date pieces, but none the less warmly complimented the composer with a kindly sympathy for the ageing man in whose eyes there seemed to shine the distant glamour of a richer and more promising past. George frequently asked himself if the old conductor still thought of the fact that he had once been taken for a man who was destined to go far, and whether he, like so many other of the inhabitants, regarded the little town as a hub from which the rays of influence and of fame fell far around. George had only found in a few any desire for a larger and more complex sphere of activity; it often seemed to him as though they rather treated him with a kind of good-natured pity because he came from a great town, and in particular from Vienna. Whenever the name of that town was mentioned in front of people George noticed in their smug and somewhat sarcastic manner that almost as regularly as harmonies accompany the bass, certain other words would be immediately switched into the conversation, even though they were not specifically mentioned: waltzes... café... süsses Mädel[Literally "sweet girl." The phrase was invented by Schnitzler himself]... grilled chicken... fiacre... parliamentary scandal. George was often irritated by this and made up his mind to do all he could to improve his countrymen's reputation in Detmold. He had been asked to come because the third conductor, a quite young man, had suddenly died, and so George, on the very first day, had to sit at the piano in the little rehearsal-room and perform singing accompaniments. It went off excellently. He rejoiced in his gifts, which were stronger and surer than he had himself hoped, and it seemed to him, so far as he could recollect, that Anna had slightly underestimated his talent. Apart from this he threw himself more seriously into his compositions than he had ever done before. He worked at an overture which had originated out of the motifs of Bermann's opera. He had begun a violin sonata, and the mythical quintette, as Else had called it once, was nearly finished. It was going to be performed this very winter in one of the Court soirées, which were under the direction of the deputy-conductor of the Detmold orchestra, a talented young man, the only person in fact in his new home with whom George had so far become at all intimate, and with whom he was accustomed to take his meals at the "Elephant."

George still inhabited a fine room in this inn, with a view on to the big square planted with lindens, and from day to day put off taking an apartment. He was quite uncertain whether he would be still in Detmold next year and he also had the feeling that it would be bound to wound Anna, if he were to do anything which looked like settling down as a bachelor for any length of time. Yet he had said no word in his letters to her about any of the prospects of the future, just as she, on her side, left off addressing to him doubting or impatient questions. They practically only communicated to each other actual facts. She wrote of her gradual return into her old groove of life, and he of all the new surroundings among which he must first settle down. Although there was practically nothing which he had to keep from her, he made a special point of slurring over many things that might easily lead to a misunderstanding. How was one to express in words the strange atmosphere which permeated in the morning the rehearsals in the half-dark body of the theatre, when the odour of cosmetics, perfumes, dresses, gas, old wood and fresh paint came down from the stage to the stalls, when figures which one did not at first recognise hopped to and fro between the rows of seats in ordinary or stage dress, when some breath which was heavy and scented blew gently against one's neck? And how was one to describe a glance which flashed down from the eyes of a young singer while one looked up to her from the keys...? Or when one saw this young singer home through the Theaterplatz and the Königsstrasse in the broad light of noon and used the opportunity not merely to talk about the part of Micaela, which one had just been studying with her, but also about all kinds of other, though no doubt fairly innocent, things? Could one recount this to one's mistress in Vienna without her reading something suspicious between the lines? And even if one had laid stress on the fact that Micaela was engaged to a young doctor in Berlin who adored her as much as she did him it would scarcely have improved matters, for that would really have looked as though one felt obliged to answer and reassure.

How strange, thought George, that it is just this very evening that she is singing the Micaela which I practised with her, and that I am going here along this same road out to Mariahilf which I used to take a year ago so frequently and so gladly. He thought of a specific evening when he had fetched Anna from out there, walked about with her in the quiet streets, looked at funny photographs in a doorway and finally walked with her on the cool stone flags of an ancient church, in a soft but how ominous conversation about an unknown future.... And now all had turned out quite differently to what he had hoped — quite differently.... Why did it strike him like that?... What had he anticipated then at that time?... Had not the year that had just passed been wonderfully rich and beautiful with its happiness and its grief? And did he not love Anna to-day better and more deeply than ever? And had he not frequently yearned for her in that fresh town as hotly as though for a woman who had never yet belonged to him? To-day's early meeting with its flat and awkward endearments in the sinister atmosphere of a grey hour really ought not to lead him astray....

He was at the appointed place. When he looked up to the lighted windows, behind which Anna was giving her lesson, a slight emotion came over him, and when she came out of the door the next minute, in a simple English dress and a grey felt hat on her rich dark blonde hair, holding a book in her hand, just as she had appeared a year ago, an unexpected feeling of happiness suddenly streamed over him. She did not see him at once, for he was standing in the shadow of a house. She opened her umbrella and went as far as the corner where she had been in the habit of waiting for him the previous year. He gazed at her for a while and was glad that she looked so fine and distinguished. Then he followed her quickly, and caught her up in a few strides. She informed him at once that she could not go to the opera with him. Her father had been taken ill this afternoon.

George was very disappointed. “Won’t you at any rate come with me for the first act?”

She shook her head. “No, I am not very keen on that sort of thing. It is much better for you to give the seat to some friend. Go and fetch Nürnberger or Bermann.”

“No,” he replied, “if you can’t come with me I’d rather go alone. I should have enjoyed it so much. I am not very keen on the performance personally. I’d prefer to stay with you... so far as I am concerned, even at your people’s; but I must go. I have — to make a report.”

Anna backed him up. “Of course you must go,” and she added: “I wouldn’t advise you, too, to spend an evening with us. It’s really not particularly jolly.”

He had taken the umbrella out of her hand and held it over her, while she held his arm. “I say, Anna,” he said, “I should like to make a suggestion!” He was surprised that he should be looking for a way of leading up to it, and began hesitatingly: “My few days in Vienna are, of course, more or less unsettled and cut up — and now there’s this depressed atmosphere at your people’s as well.... We are not really managing to see anything of each other: don’t you agree?”

She nodded without looking at him.

“So wouldn’t you like to come part of the way with me, Anna, when I go back again?”

She looked at him sideways in her arch way and did not answer.

He went on speaking. “I can, you see, quite well manage to get an extra day’s leave if I wire to the theatre. It would really be awfully nice if we had a few hours all to ourselves.”

She consented with sincerity but not enthusiasm and made her decision depend on the state of her father’s health. She then asked him how he had spent the day.

He told her in detail, and also added his programme for to-morrow. “So we two will see each other in the evening,” he said. “I’ll come to your place if that’s convenient, and then we’ll arrange further details.”

“Yes,” said Anna, and looked in front of her down the damp brown-grey street.

He tried again to persuade her to come to the opera with him, but it was futile. He then inquired about her singing lessons and followed that up by speaking about his own activity, as though he had to convince her that after all he was not having a much better time than she was. And he referred to his letters, in which he had written about everything in full detail.

“So far as that’s concerned...” she said suddenly in quite a hard voice.... And when, hurt by her tone, he could not help throwing back his head, she proceeded: “What is there really in letters, however detailed they are?”

He knew what she was thinking about — he felt a certain heaviness at heart. Was there not in the very inexorableness of this silence all that she refused to voice aloud? — question, reproach and rage. He had already felt this morning and now felt again that a certain sense of positive enmity to himself was rising within her, against which she herself seemed to be struggling in vain. Was this morning the first time...? Had it not dated far longer back? Perhaps it had been always there, from the very first moment when they had belonged to each other, and even in the moments of their supreme happiness? Had not this hostile feeling been present when she pressed her bosom against his behind dark curtains to the music of the organ, when she waited for him in the room at the hotel in Rome, with eyes red with tears, while he had been watching with delight from Monte Pincio the sun setting in the Campagna, and had realised that he was finding this hour of solitary enjoyment the most wonderful in the whole journey? Had it not been present when he ran down the gravel path on a hot morning, dropped down at her feet and cried in her lap as though it had been the lap of a mother? And when he had sat by her bedside and looked out into the garden at eventime, while the dead child she had borne an hour ago lay silent on the white linen cloth, had it not been there again, drearier than ever, so that it would have been almost unbearable, if they had not long ago managed to put up with it, in the way one manages to endure so much of the unsatisfactoriness and so much of the sorrow that comes up out of the depths of human intercourse? And now how painfully did he feel this sense of hostility as he walked arm-in-arm with her, holding the umbrella carefully over her, down the damp streets? It was there again — menacing and familiar. The words which she had spoken were still ringing in his ears: "What is there really in letters, however detailed they are?"... But even more solemnly there rang in his ears the unspoken words: What does the most ardent kiss in which body and soul seem to fuse really come to? What does the fact that we travelled together for months through strange lands really come to? What does the fact that I had a child by you come to? What does the fact that you cried out in my lap your remorse for your deception? What does it all come to, when you still go and leave me quite alone?... Why, I was alone at the very moment when my body drank in the germ of life which I carried within me for nine months, which was intended to live amongst strangers, though our own child, and which did not wish to remain on earth!

But while all this sank heavily into his soul he agreed in a light tone that she was really quite right and that letters — even though they were actually twenty pages long — could not contain much in particular; and while a harrowing pity for her sprang up in him he gently expressed the hope that there would be a time in which they would neither of them any longer be thrown back upon mere letters. And then he found words of greater tenderness, told her of those lonely walks of his in the outskirts of the strange town when he thought of her; told her of the hours in that meaningless hotel room, with its view of the linden-planted square, and of his yearning for her, which was always present whether he sat alone at his work or accompanied singers at the pianoforte or chatted with new acquaintances. But when he stood with her in front of the house door, with her hand in his, and looked up into her eyes as he murmured a bright goodbye, he was shocked to see in them the flickering out of a jaded sense of disillusionment that had almost ceased to be painful. And he knew that all the words which he had spoken to her had meant nothing to her, had meant less than nothing, since the one word, the word she scarcely hoped for any more, and yet longed for all the time, had not come.

A quarter of an hour later George was sitting in his stall at the opera. He was first a little depressed and limp, but the pleasure of enjoyment soon began to course through his veins. And when Brangäne threw the king's cloak over her mistress's shoulders, Kurwenal announced the king's approach and the ship's crew on the deck hailed the land amid all the glory of the resplendent heavens, George had long ago forgotten a bad night in the train, some boring commissions, an extremely forced conversation with an old Jewish doctor and a walk on the wet pavement which mirrored the light of the lamps by the side of a young lady who looked decent, distinguished and somewhat depressed. And when the curtain fell for the first time and the light streamed through the enormous room, upholstered in red and gold, he did not feel any unpleasant sense of being brought back to sober life, but he rather felt as though he were plunging his head out of one dream into another; while a reality which was full of all kinds of wretched complications flew impotently past somewhere outside. The atmosphere of this house, so it seemed to him, had never made him so intensely happy as it did to-day. He had never felt so palpably that all the audience, so long as they were here, were protected in some mystic way against all the pain and all the dirt of life. He stood up in his corner seat, which was in front by the middle gangway, saw many a pleased glance turn towards him and felt conscious of looking handsome, elegant and even somewhat unusual. And besides that he was — and this filled him with satisfaction — a man who had a profession, a position, a man who sat in this very theatre with a responsible commission to perform, as a kind of envoy from a German court theatre. He looked round with his opera-glass. From the back of the stalls Gleissner greeted him with a somewhat too familiar nod of his head and seemed immediately afterwards to be expatiating on George's personal characteristics to the young lady who sat next to him. Who could she be? Was it the harlot which the author, with his hobby for experimenting on souls, wanted to make into a saint, or was it the saint whom he wanted to make into a harlot? Hard to say, thought George. They'd both look about the same, halfway.

George felt the lens of an opera-glass burning on the top of his head. He looked up. It was Else, who was looking down to him from a box in the first tier. Frau Ehrenberg sat near her and between them there bowed over the front of the box a tall young man who was no other than James Wyner. George bowed and two minutes later stepped into the box, to find himself greeted with friendliness but not a trace of surprise. Else, in a low-cut black velvet dress, with a small pearl necklet round her throat and a somewhat strange though interesting coiffure, held out her hand to him. "And how did you manage to get here? On leave? Sacked? Run away?"

George explained, briefly and good-humouredly.

"It was very nice of you," said Frau Ehrenberg, "to have sent us a line from Detmold."

"He really shouldn't have done that, either," remarked Else. "It was quite calculated to make one think that he had gone off to America with some one or other."

James was standing in the middle of the box, tall and gaunt, with his chiselled face and his dark smooth hair parted at the side. "Well, George, how do you like Detmold?"

Else was looking at him with dropped eyelashes. She seemed delighted with his way of still always speaking German as though he had to translate it to himself out of English. Anyway, she employed the occasion to make a joke and said: "How George likes it in Detmold! I am afraid your question is indiscreet, James." Then she turned to George. "We are engaged, you know."

"We haven't yet sent out any cards, you know," added Frau Ehrenberg.

George offered his congratulations.

"Lunch with us to-morrow," said Frau Ehrenberg. "You will only meet a few people. I'm sure they'll all be very glad to see you again — Sissy, Frau Oberberger, Willy Eissler."

George excused himself. He could not bind himself to any specific time, but if he possibly could he would very much like to look in during the course of the afternoon.

"Quite so," said Else in a low voice, without looking at him, while her arm, in its long white glove, lay carelessly on the ledge of the box. "You are probably spending the middle of the day in the family circle."

George pretended not to hear and praised to-night's performance. James declared that he liked Tristan better than all the other operas by Wagner, including the Meistersingers.

Else simply remarked: "It's awfully fine, but as a matter of fact I'm all against love-philtres and things in that line."

George explained that the love-philtre was to be regarded as a symbol, whereupon Else declared that she had a distaste for symbols as well. The first signal for the second act was given. George took his leave and rushed downstairs with only just enough time to take his place before the curtain rose. He remembered again the semi-official capacity in which he was sitting in the theatre to-night, and determined not to surrender himself unreservedly to his impressions. He soon managed to discover that it was possible to produce the love-scene quite differently from the way in which it was being done to-night. Nor did he think it right that Melot, by whose hand Tristan was doomed to die, should be represented by a second-rate singer, as was nearly always the case. After the fall of the curtain on the second act he got up with a kind of increased self-consciousness, stood up in his seat and looked frequently up to the box in the first tier, from which Frau Ehrenberg nodded to him benevolently, while Else spoke to James, who was standing still behind her with crossed arms. It struck George that he would see James's sister again to-morrow. Did she still often think of that wonderful hour in the park in the afternoon, amid the dark green sultriness of the park, in the warm perfume of the moss and the pines? How far away that was! He then remembered a fleeting kiss in the nocturnal shadow of the garden wall at Lugano. How far away that was too! He thought of the evening under the plane-tree, and the conversation about Leo came again into his mind. A remarkable fellow that Leo, really. How consistently he had stuck to his plan! For he must have formed it a long time ago. And obviously Leo had only waited for the day when he could doff his uniform to put it into execution. George had received no answer to the letter which he had immediately written him after hearing about the duel. He resolved to visit Leo in prison if it were possible.

A man in the first row greeted him. It was Ralph Skelton. George arranged by pantomimic signs to meet him at the end of the performance.

The lights were extinguished, the prelude to the third act began. George heard the tired sea-waves surging against the desolate beach and the grievous sighs of a mortally wounded hero were wafted through the blue thin air. Where had he heard this last? Hadn't it been in Munich...? No, it couldn't be so far back. And he suddenly remembered the hour when the sheets of the Tristan music had been spread open before him on a balcony beneath a wooden gable. A sunny path opposite ran to the churchyard between field and forest, while a cross had flashed with its golden light; down in the house a woman he loved had groaned in agony and he had felt sick at heart. And yet this memory, too, had its own melancholy sweetness, like all else that had completely passed. The balcony, the little blue angel between the flowers, the white seat under the pear-tree, where was it all now? He would see the house again once more, once more before he left Vienna.

The curtain rose. The shawm rang out yearningly beneath the pale expanse of an unsympathetic heaven. The wounded hero slumbered in the shade of the linden branches, and by his head watched Kurwenal the faithful. The shawm was silent, the herdsman bent questioningly over the wall and Kurwenal made answer. By Jove, that was a voice of unusual timbre! If we only had a baritone like that, thought George. And many other things, too, which we need! If he were only given the requisite power he felt himself able, in the course of time, to turn the modest theatre at which he worked into a first-class stage. He dreamed of model performances to which people would stream from far and wide. He no longer sat there as an envoy, but as a man to whom it was perhaps vouchsafed to be himself a leader in not too distant days. Further and higher coursed his hopes. Perhaps just a few years — and his own original harmonies would be ringing through a spacious hall of a musical festival, and the audience would be listening as thrilled as the one to-day, while somewhere outside a hollow reality would be flowing impotently past. Impotently? That was the question. Did he know whether it was given him to compel human beings by his art as it had been given to the master to whom they were listening to-day — to triumph over the difficulty, wretchedness and awfulness of everyday life? Impatience and doubt tried to rise out of his soul; but his will and common-sense quickly banished them and he now felt again the pure happiness he always experienced when he heard beautiful music, without thinking of the fact that he often wished himself to do creative work and obtain recognition for doing it.

In moments like this the only relation to his beloved art of which he was conscious was that he was able to understand it with deeper appreciation than any other human being. And he felt that Heinrich had spoken the truth when they had ridden together through a forest damp with the morning dew: it was not creative work — it was simply the atmosphere of his art which was necessary to his existence. He was not one of the damned, like Heinrich, who always felt driven to catch hold of things, to mould them, to preserve them, and who found his world fall to pieces whenever it tried to escape from his creative hand.

Isolde in Brangäne's arms had dropped dead over Tristan's body, the last notes were dying away, the curtain fell. George cast a glance up to the box in the first tier. Else stood by the ledge with her look turned towards him, while James put her dark-red cloak over her shoulders, and it was only now, that after a nod of the head as quick as though she had meant no one to notice it, she turned towards the exit. Remarkable, thought George from a distance: there is a certain... melancholy romantic something about the way she carries herself, about many of her movements. It is then that she reminds me most of the gipsy girl of Nice, or the strange young person with whom I stood in front of the Titian Venus in Florence.... Did she ever love me? No. And she doesn't love her James either. Who is it then?... Perhaps... it was really that mad drawing-master in Florence. Or no one at all. Or Heinrich, of all people?...

He met Skelton in the foyer. "Back again?" queried the latter.

"Only for a few days," replied George.

It transpired that Skelton had not really known what George was doing and had thought that he was on a kind of musical tour through the German towns for the purposes of study. He was now more or less surprised to hear that George was here on leave and had been practically commissioned by the manager to inspect the new production of Tristan. "Will this suit you?" said Skelton. "I've got an appointment with Breitner; at the 'Imperial,' the white room."

"Excellent," replied George. "I'm staying there."

Doctor von Breitner was already smoking one of his celebrated big cigars when the two men appeared at his table. "What a surprise!" he exclaimed, when George greeted him. He had heard that George was engaged as conductor in Düsseldorf.

"Detmold," said George, and he thought: "The people here don't bother about me particularly.... But what does it matter?"

Skelton described the Tristan performance and George mentioned that he had spoken to the Ehrenbergs.

"Do you know that Oskar Ehrenberg is on his way to India or Ceylon?" asked Doctor von Breitner.

"Really!"

"And whom do you think with?"

"Some woman, I suppose?"

"Oh, of course. I've even heard they've got five or seven women with them."

"Who?— 'they.'"

"Oskar Ehrenberg... and... have a guess.... Well, the Prince of Guastalla!"

"Impossible!"

"Funny, eh? They became very thick this year at Ostend or at Spa.... Cherchez... et cetera. It seems that just as there are women, you know, for whom people fight duels there's also another class across whom, as it were, you shake hands. Now they've left Europe together. Perhaps they'll found a kingdom on some island or other and Oskar Ehrenberg will be prime minister."

Willy Eissler appeared. His complexion was sallow, his voice hoarse and he looked as if he had been keeping late hours. "Hullo, Baron! Forgive me not being thunderstruck but I have already heard that you are here. Some one or other saw you in the Kärtnerstrasse."

George requested Willy to remember Count Malnitz to his father. He himself, he was sorry to say, had no time on this occasion to look up the old gentleman, to whom, as he observed with a pretty mock-modesty, he owed his position in Detmold.

"So far as your future is concerned, Baron," said Willy, "I never had any anxiety about it, particularly since I heard Bellini sing your songs last year — or was it further back? But it is quite a good idea of yours, deciding to leave Vienna. You'd have been bound to have been taken for a dilettante here for a cool twenty or thirty years. That's always the way in Vienna. I know it. When people know that a man comes of a good family, has a taste too for pretty ties, good cigarettes and various other amenities of life, they don't believe that he has real artistic capacity. You wouldn't be taken seriously here without proof from outside.... So hurry up and furnish us with a brilliant one, Baron."

"I'll make an effort to," said George.

"By the way, have you heard the latest, gentlemen?" began Willy again. "Leo Golowski, the one-year-volunteer who shot First-Lieutenant Sefranek, is free."

"Let out on bail?" asked George.

"No, he's quite free. His advocate addressed a petition to the Emperor to quash the proceedings, and it turned out successful to-day."

"Incredible!" exclaimed Breitner.

"Why are you so surprised, Breitner?" said Willy. "It is possible, you know, for something sensible to happen in Austria once in a blue moon."

"A duel is never sensible," said Skelton, "and therefore a pardon for a duel can't be sensible either."

"A duel, my dear Skelton, is either something very much worse or something very much better than sensible," replied Willy. "It is either a ghastly folly or a relentless necessity, either a crime or an act of deliverance. It is not sensible and doesn't need to be so. In exceptional cases, one can't make any headway at all with common-sense, and I am sure you too will concede, Skelton, that in a case like the one of which we have just been speaking a duel was inevitable."

"Absolutely," said Breitner.

"I can imagine a polity," observed Skelton, "in which differences of that kind were settled by a court."

"Differences of that kind settled by a court! Oh, I say!... Do you really think, Skelton, that in a case where there is no question of right or of possession at issue, but where men confront each other with a stupendous hate, do you really think that a proper settlement could be arrived at by means of a fine or imprisonment? The fact, gentlemen, that refusal to fight a duel in such cases is regarded as a piece of cowardice by all people who possess temperament, honour and honesty has a fairly deep significance. In the case of Jews at any rate," he added. "So far as the Catholics are concerned it is well known that it is only their orthodoxy which keeps them from fighting."

"That's certainly the case," said Breitner simply.

George wanted to know details of the affair between Leo Golowski and the First-Lieutenant.

"Quite so," said Willy. "Of course you've only just arrived. Well, the First-Lieutenant gave him a fine ragging for the whole year, and as a matter of fact — —"

"I know the prelude," interrupted George. "Part of it from first-hand information."

"Really! Well, the prelude, to stick to that expression, was over on the first of October. I mean Leo Golowski had finished his year of service. And on the second he placed himself in front of the barracks early in the morning and quietly waited till the First-Lieutenant came out of the door. As soon as he did he stepped up to him; the First-Lieutenant reached for his sword, but Leo Golowski grabs hold of his hand, doesn't let it go, puts his other fist in front of his forehead. There is a story, too, that Leo is supposed to have flung the following words at the First-Lieutenant.... I don't know if it's true."

"What words?" asked George curiously.

"'You were worth more than I was yesterday, Herr First-Lieutenant; now we are on an equality for the time being — but one of us will be worth more than the other again by this time to-morrow.'"

"Somewhat Talmudic," remarked Breitner.

"You, of course, must be the best judge of that, Breitner," replied Willy, and went on with his story. "Well, the duel took place next morning in the fields by the Danube — three exchanges of ball at twenty paces without advancing. If that proved abortive the sword till one or other was hors de combat.... The first shots missed on both sides, and after the second... after the second, I say, Golowski was really worth more than the First-Lieutenant, for the latter was worth nothing, less than nothing — a dead man."

"Poor devil," said Breitner.

Willy shrugged his shoulders. "He just happened to have caught a tartar. I'm sorry, too, but one must admit that Austria would be a different place in many respects if all Jews would behave like Leo Golowski in similar cases. Unfortunately...."

Skelton smiled. "You know, Willy, I don't like any one to say anything against the Jews when I am there. I like them, and I should be sorry if people wanted to solve the Jewish question by a series of duels, for when it was all over there wouldn't be a single male specimen left of that excellent race."

At the end of the conversation Skelton had to admit that the duel could not be abolished in Austria for the present. But he reserved the right of putting the question whether that fact was really an argument in favour of the duel, and not rather an argument against Austria, since many other countries — he refrained from mentioning any out of a sense of modesty — had discarded the duel for centuries. And did he go too far if he ventured to designate Austria — the country, too, in which he had felt really at home for the last six years — as the country of social shams? In that country more than anywhere else there existed wild disputes without a touch of hate and a kind of tender love without the need of fidelity. Quite humorous personal likings existed or came into existence between political opponents; party colleagues, on the other hand, reviled, libelled and betrayed each other. You would only find a few people who would vouchsafe specific views on men and things, and anyway even these few would be only too ready to make reservations and admit exceptions. The political conflict there gave one quite the impression as though the apparently most bitter enemies, while exchanging their most virulent abuse, winked to each other: "It's not meant so seriously."

"What do you think, Skelton?" asked Willy. "Would you wink, too, if the bullets were flying on both sides?"

"You certainly would, Willy, unless death were staring you in the face. But that circumstance, I think, doesn't affect one's mood but only one's demeanour."

They went on sitting together for a long time and continued gossiping. George heard all kinds of news. He learned among other things that Demeter Stanzides had concluded the purchase of the estate on the Hungarian-Croatian frontier, and that the Rattenmamsell was looking forward to a happy event. Willy Eissler was much excited at the result of this crossing of the races, and amused himself in the meanwhile by inventing names for the expected child, such as Israel Pius or Rebecca Portiuncula.

Subsequently the whole party betook itself to the neighbouring café. George played a game of billiards with Breitner and then went up to his room. He made out in bed a time-table for the next day and finally sank into a deliciously deep sleep.

The paper he had ordered the day before was brought in with the tea in the morning, together with a telegram. The manager requested him to report on a singer. To George's delight it was the one he had heard yesterday in Kurwenal. He was also allowed to stay three days beyond his specified leave, "in order to put his affairs in order at his convenience," since an alteration of the programme happened to allow it. Excellent, really, thought George. It struck him that he had completely forgotten his original intention of wiring for a prolongation of his leave. I have got even more time for Anna now than I thought, he reflected. We might perhaps go into the mountains. The autumn days are fine and mild, and at this time one would be pretty well alone and undisturbed anywhere. But supposing there is an accident again — an — accident — again!...

Those were the very words in which the thought had flown through his mind. He bit his lips. Was that how he had suddenly come to regard the matter? An accident.... Where was the time when he had thought of himself almost with pride as a link in an endless chain which went from the first ancestors to the last descendants? And for a few moments he seemed to himself like a failure in the sphere of love, somewhat dubious and pitiable.

He ran his eye over the paper. The proceedings against Leo Golowski had been quashed by an Imperial pardon. He had been discharged from prison last evening. George was very glad and decided to visit Leo this very day. He then sent a telegram to the Count, and made out a report with due formality and detail on yesterday's performance. When he got out into the street it was nearly eleven. The air had the cool clearness of autumn. George felt thoroughly rested, refreshed and in a good temper. The day lay before him rich with hopes and promised all kinds of excitement. Only something troubled him without his immediately knowing what it was.... Oh yes, the visit in the Paulanergasse, the depressing rooms, the ailing father, the aggrieved mother. I'll simply fetch Anna, he thought, take her for a walk and then go and have supper somewhere with her. He passed a flower shop, bought some wonderful dark-red roses and had them sent to Anna with a card on which he wrote: "A thousand wishes. Goodbye till the evening." When he had done this he felt easier in his mind. He then went through the streets in the centre of the town to the old house in which Nürnberger lived. He climbed up the five storeys. A slatternly old servant with a dark cloth over her head opened the door and ushered him into her master's room. Nürnberger was standing by the window with his head slightly bent, in the brown high-cut lounge-suit which he liked to wear at home. He was not alone. Heinrich, of all people, got up from the old arm-chair in front of the secretary with a manuscript in his hand. George was heartily welcomed.

"Has your being in Vienna anything to do with the crisis in the management of the opera?" asked Nürnberger. He refused to allow this observation to be simply passed over as a joke. "Look here," he said, "if little boys who a short time ago were only in a position to give formal proof of their connection with German literature on the strength of the regularity of their visits to a literary café, are invited to take appointments as readers on the Berlin stage, well, in an age like this I see no occasion for astonishment if Baron Wergenthin is fetched in triumph to the Vienna opera after his no doubt strenuous six weeks' career as the conductor of a German Court theatre."

George paid a tribute to truth by explaining that he had only obtained a short leave to put his Vienna affairs in order, and did not forget to mention that he had seen the new production of Tristan yesterday as a kind of agent for his manager, but he smiled ironically at himself all the time. Then he gave a short and fairly humorous description of his experiences up to the present in the little capital. He even touched jestingly on the Court concerts as though he were far from taking his position, his present successes, the theatre, or indeed life in general with any particular seriousness.

Conversation then turned on Leo Golowski's release from prison. Nürnberger rejoiced at this unhoped-for issue, but yet firmly refused to be surprised at it, for the most highly improbable things always happened in life, and particularly in Austria, as they all knew very well. But when George mentioned the rumour of Oskar Ehrenberg's yachting trip with the Prince as a new proof of the soundness of Nürnberger's theory, he was at first inclined nevertheless to be slightly sceptical. Yet he finished by admitting its possibility, since his imagination, as he had known for a long time, was invariably surpassed by reality.

Heinrich looked at the time. It was time for him to say goodbye.

"Haven't I disturbed you, gentlemen?" asked George. "I think you were reading something, Heinrich, when I came in?"

“I had already finished,” replied Heinrich.

“You’ll read me the last act to-morrow, Heinrich?” said Nürnberger.

“I have no intention of doing so,” replied Heinrich with a laugh. “If the first two acts are as great a frost in the theatre as they were with you, my dear Nürnberger, it will be positively impossible to play the thing through to the end. We’ll assume, Nürnberger, that you rush indignantly out of the stalls into the open air. I’ll let you off the cat-calls and the rotten eggs.”

“Hang it all!” exclaimed George.

“You’re exaggerating again, Heinrich,” said Nürnberger. “I only ventured to make a few objections,” he said, turning to George, “that’s all. But he’s an author, you know.”

“It all depends on what you mean by ‘objection,’” said Heinrich. “After all, it is only an objection to the life of a fellow human being if you cut his head open with a hatchet; only it’s a fairly effective one.” He pointed to his manuscript and turned to George. “You know what that is? My political tragi-comedy. No wreaths, by request.”

Nürnberger laughed. “I assure you, Heinrich, you could still make something really splendid out of your subject. You can even keep the whole scenario and a number of the characters. All you need to do is to make up your mind to be less fair when you revise your draft.”

“But surely his fairness is a fine thing,” said George.

Nürnberger shook his head. “One may be anywhere else, only not in the drama,” and turning to Heinrich again, “In a piece like that, which deals with a question of the day, or indeed several questions, as you really intended, you’ll never do any good with a purely objective treatment. The theatre public demands that the subjects tackled by the author should be definitely settled, or that at any rate some illusion of that kind should be created. For of course there never is any real solution, and an apparent solution can only be made by a man who has the courage or the simplicity or the temperament to take sides. You’ll soon appreciate the fact, my dear Heinrich, that fairness is no good in the drama.”

“Do you know, Nürnberger,” said Heinrich, “one perhaps might do some good even with fairness. I think I simply haven’t got the right kind. As a matter of fact, you know, I’ve no desire at all to be fair. I imagine it must be so wonderfully nice to be unfair. I think it would be the most healthy gymnastic exercise for one’s soul that one could possibly practise. It must do one such a lot of good to be able really to hate the man whose views you are combating. It saves one, I’m sure, a great deal of inner strength which you can expend far better yourself in the actual fight. Yes, if one still preserves fairness of heart.... But my fairness is here,” and he pointed to his forehead. “I do not stand above parties either, but I belong to them all in a kind of way, or am against them all. I have not got the divine but the dialectical fairness. And that’s why” — he held his manuscript high up— “it has resulted in such a boring and fruitless lot of twaddle.”

“Woe to the man,” said Nürnberger, “who is rash enough to write anything like that about you.”

“Well, you see,” replied Heinrich with a smile, “if some one else were to say it, one couldn’t suppress the slight suspicion that he might be right. But now I must really go. Good-bye, George. I’m very sorry that you missed me yesterday. When are you leaving again?”

“To-morrow.”

“Anyway, I shall see you before you leave. I’m home to-day the whole afternoon and evening. You will find a man who has resolutely turned away from the questions of the day and devoted himself again to the eternal problems, death and love.... Do you believe in death, by-the-bye, Nürnberger? I am not asking you about love.”

“That somewhat cheap joke from a man in your position,” said Nürnberger, “makes me suspect that in spite of your very dignified demeanour my criticism has....”

“No, Nürnberger, I swear to you that I am not wounded. I have rather a comfortable sensation of the whole thing being finished with.”

“Finished with, why so? It is still quite possible that I’ve made a mistake, and that this very piece, which I didn’t think quite a success, will have a success on the stage which will make you into a millionaire. I should be deeply grieved if on account of my criticism, which may be very far from being authoritative....”

“Quite so, quite so, Nürnberger. We must all of us always admit the possibility that we may be mistaken. And the next time I’ll write another piece, and one with the following title too: ‘Nobody’s going to take me in,’ and you shall be the hero of it, Nürnberger.”

Nürnberger smiled. “... I? That means you’ll take a man whom you imagine you know, that you’ll try to describe those sides of his character which suit your game — that you’ll suppress others which are no use to you, and the result....”

“The result,” interrupted Heinrich, “will be a portrait taken by a mad photographer with a spoilt camera during an earthquake and an eclipse of the sun. Is that right, or is there anything missing?”

“The psychology ought to be exhaustive,” said Nürnberger.

Heinrich took his leave in boisterous spirits and went away with his rolled-up manuscript. When he had gone George remarked: “His good temper strikes me as a bit of a pose, you know.”

“Do you think so? I have always found him in remarkably good form lately.”

“In really good form? Do you seriously think so? After what he has gone through?”

“Why not? Men who are so almost exclusively self-centred as he is get over emotional troubles with surprising quickness. Characters of that type, and as a matter of fact other kinds of men as well, feel the slightest physical discomfort far more acutely than any kind of sentimental pain, even the faithlessness and death of the persons they happen to love. It comes no doubt from the fact that every emotional pain flatters our vanity somehow or other, and that you can’t say the same thing about an attack of typhoid or a catarrh in the stomach. Then there is this additional point about artistic people, for while catarrh of the stomach provides positively no copy at all (at any rate that used to be reasonably certain a short time ago) you can get anything you jolly well like out of your emotional pains, from lyric poems down to works on philosophy.”

“Emotional pains are of very different kinds, of course,” replied George. “And being deceived or deserted by a mistress... or even her dying a natural death... is still rather a different thing to her killing herself on our account.”

“Do you know for a certainty,” replied Nürnberger, “that Heinrich’s mistress really killed herself on his account?”

“Didn’t Heinrich tell you, then?...”

“Of course, but that doesn’t prove much. Even the shrewdest amongst us are always fools about the things which concern ourselves.”

Such remarks as these on the part of Nürnberger produced a strangely disconcerting effect on George. They belonged to the class of which Nürnberger was rather fond, and which, as Heinrich had once observed, quite destroyed all the point of all human intercourse, and in fact of all human relations.

Nürnberger went on speaking. “We only know two facts. One is that our friend once had a liaison with a girl and the other that the girl in question threw herself into the water. We both of us know practically nothing about all the intervening facts, and Heinrich probably doesn’t know anything more about them either. None of us can know why she killed herself, and perhaps the poor girl herself didn’t know either.”

George looked through the window and saw roofs, chimneys and weather-beaten pipes, while fairly near was the light-grey tower with the broken stone cupola. The sky opposite was pale and empty. It suddenly occurred to George that Nürnberger had not yet made any inquiry about Anna. What was he probably thinking? Thinking no doubt that George had deserted her, and that she had already consoled herself with another lover. Why did I come to Vienna? he thought desultorily, as though his journey had had no other purpose than to listen to Nürnberger giving him what had now turned out to be a sufficiently pessimistic analysis of life. It struck twelve. George took his leave. Nürnberger accompanied him as far as the door and thanked him for his visit. He inquired earnestly about what George was doing in his new home, about his work and his new acquaintances, as though their previous conversation on the subject had not really counted, and now learned for the first time of the accident which was responsible for George's sudden appointment in the little town.

"Yes, that's just what I always say," he then remarked. "It is not we who make our fate, but some circumstance outside us usually sees to that — some circumstance which we were not in a position to influence in any way, which we never have a chance of bringing into the sphere of our calculations. After all, do you deserve any credit...? I feel justified in putting this question, much as I respect your talent. Nor does old Eissler, whose interest in your affairs you once told me about, deserve any credit either for your being wired to from Detmold and finding your true sphere of work there so quickly. No. An innocent man, some one you don't know, had to die a sudden death to enable you to find that particular place vacant. And what a lot of other things which you were equally unable to influence, and which you were quite unable to foresee, had to come on the scene to enable you to leave Vienna with a light heart — to enable you, in fact, to leave it at all."

George felt hurt. "What do you mean by a light heart?" he asked.

"I mean a lighter heart than you would have had under other circumstances. If the little creature had remained alive who knows whether you...."

"You can take it from me that I would have gone away, even then. And Anna would have taken it quite as much as a matter of course as she does now. Don't you believe me? Why, perhaps I'd have gone with an even lighter heart if that matter had turned out otherwise. Why, it was Anna who persuaded me to accept. I was quite undecided. You have no idea what a good sensible creature Anna is."

"Oh, I don't doubt it at all. According to all you have told me about her from time to time, she certainly seems to have behaved with more dignity in her position than young ladies of her social status are usually accustomed to exhibit on such occasions."

"My dear Herr Nürnberger, the position really wasn't as dreadful as all that."

"Come, don't say that. For however much things may have been made easier by your courtesy and consideration, take it from me that the young lady is bound to have felt frequently during the last months the irregularity of her position. I am sure there isn't a single member of the feminine sex, however daring and advanced may be her views, who doesn't prefer in a case like that to have a ring on her finger. And it's all in favour, too, of your friend's sensible and dignified behaviour that she never allowed you to notice it, and that she took the bitter disillusionment at the end of these nine months, which were certainly not entirely a bed of roses, with calmness and self-possession."

"Disillusionment is rather a mild word. Pain would perhaps be more correct."

"I dare say it was both. But in this case, as in most others, the burning wound of pain heals more quickly than the throbbing piercing wound of disillusionment."

"I don't quite understand."

"Well, my dear George, you don't doubt, do you, that if the little creature had remained alive you two would have married very quickly; why, you'd even be married this very day."

"And you think that now, just because we have no child.... Yes, you seem to be of the opinion that... that... it's all over between us. But you are quite wrong, quite wrong, my dear friend."

"My dear George," replied Nürnberger, "both of us would prefer not to speak about the future. Neither you nor I know the place where a strand of our fate is being spun at this very moment. You didn't have the slightest inkling, either, when that conductor was attacked by a stroke, and if I now wish you luck in your future career I don't know whose death I have not conjured down by that very wish."

They took leave of each other on the landing. Nürnberger cried after George from the stairs: "Let me hear from you now and then."

George turned round once more. "And mind you do the same." He only saw Nürnberger's gesture of resigned remonstrance, smiled involuntarily, hurried down the stairs and took a conveyance at the nearest corner.

He pondered over Nürnberger and Bermann on his way to the Golowskis'. What a strange relationship it was between them. A scene which he thought he had seen some time or other in a dream came into George's mind. The two sat opposite each other, each held a mirror in front of the other. The other saw himself in it with the mirror in his hand, and in that mirror the other again with his mirror in his hand, and so on to infinity; but did either of them really know the other, did either of them really know himself? George's mind became dizzy. He then thought of Anna. Was Nürnberger right again? Was it really all over? Could it really ever end? Ever?... Life is long! But were even the ensuing months dangerous? No. That was not to be taken seriously, however it might turn out. Perhaps Micaela.... And in Easter he would be in Vienna again. Then there came the summer, they would be together, and then? Yes, what then? Engagement? Herr Rosner and Frau Rosner's son-in-law, Joseph's brother-in-law! Oh well, what did he care about the family? It was Anna after all who was going to be his wife, that good gentle sensible creature.

The fly stopped in front of an ugly fairly new house, painted yellow, in a wide monotonous street. George told the driver to wait and went into the doorway. The house looked quite dilapidated from inside. Mortar had crumbled away from the walls in many places and the steps were dirty. There was a smell of bad fat coming out of some of the kitchen windows. Two fat Jewesses were talking on the landing of the first storey in a jargon which George found positively intolerable. One of them said to a boy whom she held by the hand: "Moritz, let the gentleman pass."

Why does she say that? thought George, there's plenty of room; she obviously wants to get into conversation with me. As though I could do her any harm or any good! An expression of Heinrich's in a long-past conversation came into his mind: "An enemy's country."

A servant-girl showed him into a room which he immediately recognised as Leo's. Books and papers on the writing-table, the piano open, a Gladstone bag, which was still not completely unpacked, open on the sofa. The door opened the next minute. Leo came in, embraced his visitor and kissed him so quickly on both cheeks that the man who was welcomed with such heartiness had no time to be embarrassed.

"This is nice of you," said Leo, and shook both his hands.

"You can't imagine how glad I was..." began George.

"I believe you.... But please come in with me. We are having dinner, you know, but it's nearly over."

He took him into the next room. The family was gathered round the table.

"I don't think you know my father yet," observed Leo, and introduced them to each other.

Old Golowski got up, put away the serviette which he had tied round his neck and held out his hand to George. The latter was surprised that the old man should look so completely different from what he had expected. He was not patriarchal, grey-bearded and venerable, but with his clean-shaven face and broad cunning features looked more like an ageing provincial comedian than anything else.

"I am very glad to make your acquaintance, Herr Baron," he said, while one could read in his crafty eyes... "I know everything."

Therese hastily asked George the conventional questions: when he had come, how long he was staying, how he was; he answered patiently and courteously, and she looked him in the face with animation and curiosity.

Then he asked Leo about his plans for the near future.

"I must first practise the piano industriously, so as not to make a fool of myself before my pupils. People were very nice to me, of course. I had books, as many as I wanted, but they certainly didn't put a piano at my disposition." He turned to Therese. "You should certainly flog that point to death in one of your next speeches. This bad treatment of prisoners awaiting trial must be abolished."

"It was no laughing matter for him this time yesterday," said old Golowski.

"If you think by any chance," said Therese, "that the good luck which happened to come your way will alter my views you are making a violent mistake. On the contrary." And turning to George she continued: "Theoretically, you know, I am absolutely against their having let him out. If you'd simply knocked the fellow down dead, as you would have been quite entitled to do, without this abominable farce of a duel you'd never have been let out, but would have served your five to ten years for a certainty. But since you went in for this ghastly life-and-death gamble which is favoured by the State, because you cringed down to the military point of view you've been pardoned. Am I not right?" She turned again to George.

The latter only nodded and thought of the poor young man whom Leo had shot, who as a matter of fact had had nothing else against the Jews except that he disliked them just as much as most people did after all — and whose real fault had only been that he had tried it on the wrong man.

Leo stroked his sister's hair and said to her: "Look here, if you say publicly in your next speech what you've just said to-day within these four walls you'll really impress me."

"Yes, and you'll impress me," replied Therese, "if you take a ticket to Jerusalem to-morrow with old Ehrenberg."

They got up from the table. Leo invited George to come into his room with him.

"Shall I be disturbing you?" asked Therese. "I too would like to see something of him, you know."

They all three sat in Leo's room and chatted. Leo seemed to be enjoying his regained freedom without either scruples or remorse. George felt strangely affected by this. Therese sat on the sofa in a dark well-fitting dress. To-day was the first occasion on which she resembled the young lady who had drunk Asti under a plane-tree in Lugano, when she was the mistress of a cavalry officer, and who had subsequently kissed some one else. She asked George to play the piano. She had never yet heard him. He sat down, played something from Tristan and then improvised with happy inspiration. Leo expressed his appreciation.

"What a pity that he is not staying," said Therese, as she leaned against the wall and crossed her hands over her high coiffure.

"I am coming back at Easter," replied George, and looked at her.

"But only to disappear again," said Therese.

"That may be," replied George, and the thought that his home was no longer here, that he had no home at all anywhere, and would not have for a long time, suddenly overwhelmed him.

"How would it be," said Leo, "if we went on a tour together in the summer? — you, Bermann and I? I promise you that you won't be bored by theoretical conversation like you were once last autumn... do you still remember?"

"Oh well," said Therese, stretching herself, "nothing will come of it anyway. Deeds, gentlemen!"

"And what comes of deeds?" asked Leo. "Putting them at the highest, they simply save individual situations for the time being."

"Yes, deeds which you do for yourself," said Therese. "But I only call a real deed what one is capable of doing for others, without any feeling of revenge, without any personal vanity, and if possible anonymously."

At last George had to go. What a lot of things he still had to see to.

"I'll come part of the way with you," said Therese to him.

Leo embraced him again, and said: "It really was nice of you."

Therese disappeared to fetch her hat and jacket. George went into the next room. Old Frau Golowski seemed to have been waiting for him; with a strangely anxious face she came up to him and put an envelope in his hand.

"What is that?"

"The account, Herr Baron. I didn't want to give it to Anna.... It might perhaps have upset her too much."

"Oh yes...." He put the envelope in his pocket and thought that it felt strangely different to any other....

Therese appeared with a little Spanish hat, ready to go out. "Here I am. Goodbye, mamma. Shan't be home for dinner."

She went down the stairs with George and threw him sideways a glance of pleasure.

"Where can I take you?" asked George.

"Just take me along with you. I'll get out somewhere."

They got in, the vehicle went on. She put to him all kinds of questions which he had already answered in the apartment, as though she took it for granted that he was now bound to be more candid with her than before the others. She did not learn anything except that he felt comfortable in his new surroundings and that his work gave him satisfaction. Had his appearance been a great surprise for Anna? No, not at all. He had of course given her notice of it. And was it really true that he meant to come back again at Easter? It was his definite intention....

She seemed surprised. "Do you know that I had almost imagined...."

"What?"

"That we would never see you again!"

He was somewhat moved and made no answer. The thought then ran through his mind: Would it not have been more sensible...? He was sitting quite close to Therese and felt the warmth of her body, as he had done before in Lugano. In what dream of hers might she now be living — in the dark jumbled dream of making humanity happy, or the light gay dream of a new romantic adventure? She kept looking insistently out of the window. He took her hand, without resistance, and put it to his lips.

She suddenly turned round to him and said innocently: "Yes, stop now. I'd better get out here."

He let go her hand and looked at Therese.

"Yes, my dear George. What wouldn't one fall into," she said, "if one didn't" — she gave an ironic smile — "have to sacrifice oneself for humanity? Do you know what I often think?... Perhaps all this is only a flight from myself."

"Why.... Why do you take to flight?"

"Goodbye, George."

The vehicle stopped. Therese got out, a young man stood still and stared at her, she disappeared in the crowd. I don't think she'll finish up on the scaffold, thought George. He drove to his hotel, had his midday meal, lit a cigarette, changed his clothes and went to Ehrenbergs'.

James, Sissy, Willy Eissler and Frau Oberberger were with the ladies of the house in the dining-room taking black coffee. George sat down between Else and Sissy, drank a glass of Benedictine and answered with patience and good humour all the questions which his new activities had provoked. They soon went into the drawing-room, and he now sat for a time in the raised alcove with Frau Oberberger, who looked young again to-day and was particularly anxious to hear more intimate details about George's personal experiences in Detmold. She refused to believe him when he denied having started intrigues with all the singers in the place. Of course she simply regarded theatrical life as nothing but a pretext and opportunity for romantic adventures. Anyway, she always made a point of thinking she detected the most monstrous goings-on in the coulisses behind the curtain, in the dressing-rooms and in the manager's office. When George had no option but to disillusion her, by his report of the simple, respectable, almost philistine life of the members of the opera, and by the description of his own hardworking life, she visibly began to go to pieces, and soon he found himself sitting opposite an aged woman, in whom he recognised the same person as had appeared to him last summer, first in the box of a little white-and-red theatre and later in a now almost forgotten dream. He then went and stood with Sissy near the marble Isis, and each sought to find in the eyes of the other during their harmless chatter a memory of an ardent hour beneath the deep shade of a dark green park in the afternoon. But to-day that memory seemed to them both to be plunged in unfathomable depths.

Then he went and sat next to Else at the little table on which books and photographs were lying. She first addressed to him some conventional questions like all the rest. But suddenly she asked quite unexpectedly and somewhat gently: "How is your child?"

"My child...." He hesitated. "Tell me, Else, why do you ask me...? Is it simply curiosity?"

"You are making a mistake, George," she replied calmly and seriously. "You usually make mistakes about me, as a matter of fact. You take me for quite superficial, or God knows what. Well, there's no point in talking about it any more. Anyway, my asking after the child is not quite so incomprehensible. I should very much like to see it sometime."

"You would like to see it?" He was moved.

"Yes, I even had another idea.... But one which you will probably think quite mad."

"Let's hear it, Else."

"I was thinking, you know, we might take it with us."

"Who, we?"

"James and I."

"To England?"

"Who's told you we're going to England? We are staying here. We've already taken a place in 'Cottage' [A fashionable district in Vienna] outside. No one need know that it is your child."

"What a romantic thought!"

"Good gracious, why romantic? Anna can't keep it with her, and you certainly can't. Where could you put it during the rehearsals? In the prompter's box, I suppose?"

George smiled. "You are very kind, Else."

"I'm not kind at all. I only think why should an innocent little creature pay the penalty or suffer for.... Oh well, I mean it can't help it.... After all... is it a boy?"

"It was a boy." He paused, then he said gently: "It's dead, you know." And he looked in front of him.

"What! Oh, I see... you want to protect yourself against my officiousness."

"No, Else, how can you?... No, Else, in matters like that one doesn't lie."

"It's true, then? But how did it...?"

"It was still-born."

She looked at the ground. "No? How awful!" She shook her head. "How awful!... And now she's lost everything quite suddenly."

George gave a slight start and was unable to answer. How every one seemed to take it for granted that the Anna affair was finished. And Else did not pity him at all. She had no idea of how the death of the child had shocked him. How could she have an idea either? What did she know of the hour when the garden had lost its colour for him and the heavens their light, because his own beautiful child lay dead within the house?

Frau Ehrenberg joined them. She declared that she was particularly satisfied with George. Anyway, she had never doubted that he would show what he was made of as soon as he once got started in a profession. She was firmly convinced, too, that they would have him here in Vienna as a conductor in three to five years. George pooh-poohed the idea. For the time being he had not thought of coming back to Vienna. He felt that people worked more and with greater seriousness outside in Germany. Here one always ran the danger of losing oneself.

Frau Ehrenberg agreed, and took the opportunity to complain about Heinrich Bermann, who had lapsed into silence as an author and now never showed himself anywhere.

George defended him and felt himself obliged to state positively that Heinrich was more industrious than he had ever been. But Frau Ehrenberg had other examples of the corrupting influence of the Vienna air, particularly Nürnberger, who now seemed to have cut himself completely off from the world. As for what had happened to Oskar... could that have happened in any other town except Vienna? Did George know, by-the-by, that Oskar was travelling with the Prince of Guastalla? Her tone did not indicate that she regarded that as anything special, but George noticed that she was a little proud of it, and entertained the opinion somewhere at the back of her mind that Oskar had turned out all right after all.

While George was speaking to Frau Ehrenberg he noticed that Else, who had retired with James into the recess, was directing glances towards him — glances full of melancholy and of knowledge, which almost frightened him. He soon took his leave, had a feeling that Else's handshake was inconceivably cold, while those of the others were amiably indifferent, and went.

"How funny it all is," he thought in the vehicle which drove him to Heinrich's. People knew everything before he did. They had known of his liaison with Anna before it had begun, and now they knew that it was over before he did himself. He had half a mind to show them all that they were making a mistake. Of course, in so vital an affair as that one should be very careful not to decide on one's course of action out of considerations of pique. It was a good thing that a few months were now before him in which he could pull himself together and have time for mature reflection. It would be good for Anna, too, particularly good for her, perhaps. Yesterday's walk with her in the rain over the brown wet streets came into his mind again, and struck him as ineffably sad. Alas, for the hours in the arched room into which the strains of the organ opposite had vibrated through the floating curtain of snow — where were they? Yes, where had these hours gone to? And so many other wonderful hours as well! He saw himself and Anna again in his mind's eye, as a young couple on their honeymoon, walking through streets which had the wonderful atmosphere of a strange land; commonplace hotel rooms, where he had only stayed with her for a few days, suddenly presented themselves before him, consecrated as it were by the perfume of memory.... Then his love appeared to him, sitting on a white seat, beneath the heavy branches, with her high forehead girdled with the deceptive presentiment of gentle motherhood. And finally she stood there with a sheet of music in her hand while the white curtain fluttered gently in the wind. And when he realised that it was the same room in which she was now waiting for him, and that not more than a year had gone by since that evening hour in the late summer when she had sung his own songs for the first time to his own accompaniment, he breathed heavily and almost anxiously in his corner.

When he was in Heinrich's room a few minutes afterwards he asked him not to look upon this as a visit. He only wanted to shake hands with him. He would fetch him for a walk to-morrow morning if that suited him.... Yes — the idea occurred to him while he was speaking — for a kind of farewell walk in the Salmansdorf Forest.

Heinrich agreed, but asked him to stay just a few minutes. George asked him jestingly if he had already recovered from his failure of this morning.

Heinrich pointed to the secretary, on which were lying loose sheets covered with large nervous writing. "Do you know what that is? I have taken up Ägidius again, and just before you came I thought of an ending which was more or less feasible. I'll tell you more about it to-morrow if it will interest you."

"By all means. I am quite excited about it. It's a good thing, too, that you have settled down to a definite piece of work again."

"Yes, my dear George, I don't like being quite alone, and must create some society for myself as quickly as possible, people I choose myself... otherwise, any one who wants to come along, and one is not keen on being at home to every chance ghost."

George told him that he had called on Leo and found him in far better spirits than he had ever expected.

Heinrich leaned against the secretary with both his hands buried in his trouser pockets and his head slightly bent; the shaded lamp made uncertain shadows on his face. "Why didn't you expect to find him in good spirits? If it had been us... if it had been me, at any rate, I should probably have felt exactly the same."

George was sitting on the arm of a black leather arm-chair with crossed legs and his hat and stick in his hand. "Perhaps you are right," he said, "but I must confess all the same that when I saw his cheerful face I found it very strange to realise that he had a human life on his conscience."

"You mean," said Heinrich, beginning to walk up and down the room, "that it is one of those cases where the relationship of cause and effect is so illuminating that you are justified in saying quietly 'he has killed' without its looking like a mere juggle of words.... But speaking generally, George, don't you think that we regard these matters a little superficially? We must see the flash of a dagger or hear the whistle of a bullet in order to realise that a murder has been committed. As though any man who let any one else die would be in most cases different from a murderer in anything else except having managed the business more comfortably and being more of a coward...."

"Are you really reproaching yourself, Heinrich? If you had really believed that it was bound to turn out like that... I am sure you would not have... let her die."

"Perhaps... I don't know. But I can tell you one thing, George: if she were still alive — I mean if I had forgiven her, to use the expression you are so fond of using now and then — I should regard myself as guiltier than I do to-day. Yes, yes, that's how it is. I will confess to you, George, there was a night... there were a few nights, when I was practically crushed by grief, by despair, by.... Other people would have taken it for remorse, but it was nothing of the kind. For amid all my grief, all my despair, I knew quite well that this death meant a kind of redemption, a kind of reconciliation, a kind of cleanness. If I had been weak or less vain... as you no doubt regard it... if she had been my mistress again, something far worse than that death would have happened for her as well... loathing and anguish, rage and hate, would have crawled around our bed... our memories would have rotted bit by bit — why, our love would have decomposed whilst its body was still alive. It had no right to be. It would have been a crime to have protracted the life of this love affair which was sick unto death, just as it is a crime — and what is more, will be regarded so in the future — to protract the life of a man who is doomed to a painful death. Any sensible doctor will tell you as much. And that is why I'm very far from reproaching myself. I don't want to justify myself before you or before any one else in the world, but that is just how it is. I can't feel guilty. I often feel very bad, but that hasn't the least thing in the world to do with any consciousness of guilt."

"You went there just afterwards?" asked George.

"Yes, I went there. I even stood by when they lowered the coffin into the ground. Yes, I trained there with the mother." He stood by the window, quite in the darkness, and shook himself. "No, I shall never forget it. Besides, it is only a lie to say that people come together in a common sorrow. People never come together if they're not natural affinities. They feel even further away from each other in times of trouble. That journey! When I remember it! I read nearly the whole time, too. I found it positively intolerable to talk to the silly old creature. There is no one one hates more than some one who is quite indifferent to you and requires your sympathy. We stood together by her grave, too, the mother and I — I, the mother, and a few actors from the little theatre.... And afterwards I sat in the inn with her alone, after the funeral — a tête-à-tête wake. A desperate business, I can tell you. Do you know, by-the-by, where she lies buried? By your lake, George. Yes. I have often found myself driven to think of you. You know of course where the churchyard is? Scarcely a hundred yards from Auhof. There's a delightful view on to our lake, George; of course, only if one happens to be alive."

George felt a slight horror. He got up. "I am afraid I must leave you, Heinrich. I am expected. You'll excuse me?"

Heinrich came up to him out of the darkness of the window. "Thank you very much for your visit. Well, to-morrow, isn't it? I suppose you are going to Anna now? Please give her my best wishes. I hear she is very well. Therese told me."

"Yes, she looks splendid. She has completely recovered."

"I'm very glad. Well, till to-morrow then. I'm extremely glad that I shall be able to see you again before you leave. You must still have all kinds of things to tell me. I've done nothing again but talk about myself."

George smiled. As though he hadn't grown used to this with Heinrich. "Good-bye," he said, and went.

Much of what Heinrich had said echoed in George's mind when he sat again in his fiacre. "We must see the flash of a dagger in order to realise that a murder has been committed." George felt that there was a kind of subterranean connection, but yet one which he had guessed for a long time, between the meaning of these words and a certain dull sense of discomfort which he had frequently felt in his own soul. He thought of a past hour when he had felt as though a gamble over his unborn child was going on in the clouds, and it suddenly struck him as strange that Anna had not yet spoken a word to him about the child's death, that she had even avoided in her letters any reference, not only to the final misfortune, but also to the whole period when she had carried the child under her bosom.

The conveyance approached its destination. Why is my heart beating? thought George. Joy?... Bad conscience?... Why to-day all of a sudden? She can't have any grievance against me.... What nonsense! I am run down and excited at the same time, that's what it is. I shouldn't have come here at all. Why have I seen all these people again? Wasn't I a thousand times better off in the little town where I had started a new life, in spite of all my longings?... I ought to have met Anna somewhere else. Perhaps she will come away with me.... Then everything will still come right in the end. But is anything wrong?... Are our relations really in a bad way? And is it a crime to prolong them?... That may be a convenient excuse on certain occasions.

When he went into Rosners' the mother, who was sitting alone at the table, looked up from her book and shut it with a snap. The light of a lamp that was swinging gently to and fro flowed from overhead on to the table, distributing itself equally in all directions. Josef got up from a corner of the sofa. Anna, who had just come out of her room, stroked her high wavy hair with both hands, welcomed George with a light nod of the head and gave him at this moment the impression of being rather an apparition than real flesh and blood. George shook hands with every one and inquired after Herr Rosner's health.

"He is not exactly bad," said Frau Rosner, "but he finds it difficult to stand up."

Josef apologised at being found sleeping on the sofa. He had to use the Sunday in order to rest himself. He was occupying a position on his paper which often kept him there till three o'clock in the morning.

"He is working very hard now," said his mother corroboratively.

"Yes," said Josef modestly, "when a fellow gets real scope, so to speak...." He went on to observe that the Christliche Volksbote was enjoying a larger and larger circulation, particularly in Germany. He then addressed some questions to George about his new home, and showed a keen interest in the population, the condition of the roads, the popularity of cycling and the surrounding neighbourhood.

Frau Rosner, on her side, made polite inquiries about the composition of the repertoire. George supplied the information and a conversation was soon in progress, in which Anna also played a substantial part, and George found himself suddenly paying a visit to a middle-class and conventional family where the daughter of the house happened to be musical. The conversation finally finished up in George feeling himself bound to express a wish to hear the young lady sing once more — and he had as it were to pull himself together to realise that the woman whose voice he had asked to hear was really his own Anna.

Josef made his excuses; he was called away by an appointment with club friends in the café. "Do you still remember, Herr Baron... the classy party on the Sophienalp?"

"Of course," replied George, smiling, and he quoted: "Der Gott, der Eisen wachsen liess...."

"Der wollte keine Knechte," added Josef. "But we have left off singing that now for a long time. It is too like the 'Watch on the Rhine,' and we don't want to have it cast in our teeth any more that we have a sneaking fancy for the other side of the frontier. We had great fights about it on the committee. One gentleman even sent in his resignation. He's a solicitor, you know, in the office of Doctor Fuchs, the National German Deputy. Yes, it's all politics, you know." He winked. They must not think, of course, that now that he himself had an insight into the machinery of public life he still took the swindle seriously. With the scarcely surprising remark that he could tell a tale or two if he wanted, he took his leave. Frau Rosner thought it time to go and look after her husband.

George sat alone with Anna, opposite her by the round table, over which the hanging lamp shed its light.

"Thank you for the beautiful roses," said Anna. "I have them inside in my room." She got up, and George followed her. He had quite forgotten that he had sent her any flowers. They were standing in a high glass in front of the mirror. They were dark red and their reflection was opaque and colourless. The piano was open, some music stood ready and two candles were burning at the side. Apart from that all the light in the room was what came from the adjoining apartment through the wide opening left by the door.

"You've been playing, Anna?" He came nearer. "The Countess's Aria? Been singing, too?"

"Yes — tried to."

"All right?"

"It is beginning to... I think so. Well, we'll see. But first tell me what you have been doing all to-day."

"In a minute. We haven't welcomed each other at all so far." He embraced and kissed her.

"It is a long time since — —" she said, smiling past him.

"Well?" he asked keenly, "are you coming with me?"

Anna hesitated. “But what do you really think of doing, George?”

“Quite simple. We can go away to-morrow afternoon. You can choose the place. Reichenau, Semmering, Brühl, anywhere you like.... And I’ll bring you back in the morning the day after to-morrow.” Something or other kept him back from mentioning the telegram which gave him three whole days to do what he liked with.

Anna looked in front of her. “It would be very nice,” she said tonelessly, “but it really won’t be possible, George.”

“On account of your father?”

She nodded.

“But he is surely better, isn’t he?”

“No, he is not at all well. He is so weak. They wouldn’t of course reproach me directly in any way. But I... I can’t leave mother alone now, for that kind of excursion.”

He shrugged his shoulders, feeling slightly wounded at the designation which she had chosen.

“Come, be frank,” she added in a jesting manner. “Are you really so keen on it?”

He shook his head, almost as if in pain, but he felt that this gesture also was lacking in sincerity. “I don’t understand you, Anna,” he said, more weakly than he really meant. “To think that a few weeks of being away from each other, to think of... well, I don’t know what to call it.... It is as though we had got absolutely out of touch. It’s really me, Anna, it’s really me....” he repeated in a vehement but tired voice. He got up from the chair in front of the piano. He took her hands and put them to his lips, feeling nervous and somewhat moved.

“What was Tristan like?” she inquired.

He gave her a conscientious account of the performance and did not leave out his visit to the Ehrenbergs’ box. He spoke of all the people whom he had seen and conveyed to her Heinrich Bermann’s wishes. He then drew her on to his knee and kissed her. When he removed his face from hers he saw tears running over her cheeks. He pretended to be surprised, “What’s the matter, child?... But why, why...?”

She got up and went to the window with her face turned away from him.

He stood up too, feeling somewhat impatient, walked up and down the room once or twice, then went up to her, pressed her close to him, and then immediately began again in great haste: “Anna, just think it over and see if you really can’t come with me! It would all be so different from what it is here. We could really talk things over thoroughly. We have got such important matters to discuss. I need your advice as well, about the plans I am to make for next year. I’ve written to you about it, haven’t I? It is very probable, you see, that I shall be asked to sign a three years’ contract in the next few days.”

“What am I to advise you?” she said. “After all, you know best whether it suits you there or not.”

He began to tell her about the kind and talented manager who clearly wished to have him for a collaborator; about the old and sympathetic conductor who had once been so famous; about a very diminutive stage-hand who was called Alexander the Great; about a young lady with whom he had studied the Micaela, and who was engaged to a Berlin doctor; and about a tenor, who had already been working at the theatre for twenty-seven years and hated Wagner violently. He then began to talk about his own personal prospects, artistic and financial. There was no doubt that he could soon attain an excellent and assured position at the little Court Theatre. On the other hand one had to bear in mind that it was dangerous to bind oneself for too long; a career like that of the old conductor would not be to his taste. Of course... temperaments varied. He for his part believed himself safe from a fate like that.

Anna looked at him all the time, and finally said in a half jesting, half meditative tone, as though she were speaking to a child: “Yes, isn’t he trying hard?”

The thrust went home. “In what way am I trying hard?”

“Look here, George, you don’t owe me explanations of any kind.”

“Explanations? But you are really.... Really, I’m not giving you any explanations, Anna. I’m simply describing to you how I live and what kind of people I have to deal with... because I flatter myself that these things interest you, in the same way that I told you where I had been yesterday and to-day.”

She was silent, and George felt again that she did not believe him, that she was justified in not believing him — even though now and again the truth happened to come from his lips. All kinds of words were on the tip of his tongue, words of wounded pride, of rage, of gentle persuasion — each seemed to him equally worthless and empty. He made no reply, sat down at the piano and gently struck some notes and chords. He now felt again as though he loved her very much and was simply unable to tell it her, and as though this hour of meeting would have been quite different if they had celebrated it elsewhere. Not in this room, not in this town; in a place, for preference, which they neither of them knew, in a new strange environment, yes, then perhaps everything would have been again just as it had been once before. Then they would have been able to have rushed into each other’s arms — as once before, with real yearning, and found delight — and peace. The idea occurred to him: “If I were to say to her now ‘Anna! Three days and three nights belong to us!’ If I were to beg her... with the right words.... Entreat her at her feet.... ‘Come with me, come!’... She would not hold out long! She would certainly follow me....” He knew it. Why did he not speak the right words? Why did he not entreat her? Why was he silent, as he sat at the piano and gently struck notes and chords...? Why?... Then he felt her soft hand upon his head. His fingers lay heavy on the notes, some chord or other vibrated. He did not dare to turn round. She knows it, too, he felt. What does she know?... Is it true, then...? Yes... it is true. And he thought of the hour after the birth of his dead child — when he had sat by her bed and she had lain there in silence, with her looks turned towards the gloomy garden.... She had known it even then — earlier than he — that all was over. And he lifted his hands from the piano, took hers, which were still lying on his head, guided them to his cheeks, drew her to him till she was again quite close, and she slowly dropped down on to his knees. And he began again, shyly: “Anna... perhaps... you could manage to.... Perhaps I too could manage for a few days’ more leave if I were to telegraph. Anna dear... just listen.... It would be really so beautiful....” A plan came to him from the very depths of his consciousness. If he really were to go travelling with her for some days, and were to take the opportunity honestly to say to her, “It must end, Anna, but the end of our love must be beautiful like the beginning was. Not dim and gloomy like these hours in your people’s house....” If I were honestly to say that to her — somewhere in the country — would it not be more worthy of her and mine — and our past happiness...? And with this plan in his mind he grew more insistent, bolder, almost passionate.... And his words had the same ring again as they had had a long, long time ago.

Sitting on his knees, with her arms around his neck, she answered gently: “George, I am not — going to go through it another time....”

He already had a word upon his lips with which he could have dissipated her alarm. But he kept it back, for if put in so many words it would have simply meant that while he was thinking of course of living again a few hours of delight with her, he did not feel inclined to take any responsibility upon himself. He felt it. All he need say to avoid wounding her was this one thing: “You belong to me for ever! — You really must have a child by me — I’ll fetch you at Christmas or Easter at the outside. And we will never be parted from each other any more.” He felt the way in which she waited for these words with one last hope, with a hope in whose realisation she had herself ceased to believe. But he was silent. If he had said aloud the words she was yearning for he would have bound himself anew, and... he now realised more deeply than he had ever realised before that he wanted to be free.

She was still resting on his knees, with her cheek leaning on his. They were silent for a long time and knew that this was the farewell. Finally George said resolutely: “Well, if you don’t want to come with me, Anna, then I’ll go straight back — to-morrow, and we’ll see each other again in the spring. Until then there are only letters. Only in the event of my coming at Christmas if I can....”

She had got up and was leaning against the piano. “The boy’s mad again,” she said. “Isn’t it really better if we don’t see each other till after Easter?”

“Why better?”

“By then — everything will be so much clearer.”

He tried to misunderstand her. “You mean about the contract?”

“Yes....”

“I must make up my mind in the next few weeks. The people want of course to know where they are. On the other hand, even if I did sign for three years, and other chances came along, they wouldn’t keep me against my will. But up to the present it really seems to me that staying in that small town has been an extremely sound thing for me. I have never been able to work with such concentration as there. Haven’t I written to you how I have often sat at my secretary after the theatre till three o’clock in the morning, and woken up fresh at eight o’clock after a sound sleep?”

She gazed at him all the time with a look at once pained and reflective, which affected him like a look of doubt. Had she not once believed in him! Had she not spoken those words of trust and tenderness to him in a twilight church: “I will pray to Heaven that you become a great artist”? He felt again as though she did not think anything like as much of him as in days gone by. He felt troubled and asked her uncertainly: “You’ll allow me, of course, to send you my violin sonata as soon as it is finished? You know I don’t value anybody else’s criticism as much as I do yours.” And he thought: If I could only just keep her as a friend... or win her over again... as a friend... is it possible?

She said: “You have also spoken to me about a few new fantasies you have written just for the pianoforte.”

“Quite right; but they are not yet quite ready. But there’s another one which I... which I...” he himself found his hesitations foolish— “composed last summer by the lake where that poor girl was drowned, Heinrich’s mistress you know, which you don’t know yet either. Couldn’t I... I’ll play it to you quite gently; would you like me to?”

She nodded and shut the door. There, just behind him, she stood motionless as he began.

And he played. He played the little piece with all its passionate melancholy which he had composed by that lake of his, when Anna and the child had been completely forgotten. It was a great relief to him that he could play it to her. She must be bound to understand the message of these notes. It was impossible for her not to understand. He heard himself as it were speaking in the notes; he felt as though it was only now that he understood himself. Farewell, my love, farewell. It was very beautiful. And now it is over... farewell, my love.... We have lived through what was fated for both of us. And whatever the future may hold for me and for you we shall always mean something to each other which we can neither of us ever forget. And now my life goes another way.... And yours too. It must be over... I have loved you. I kiss your eyes.... I thank you, you kind, gentle, silent one. Farewell, my love... farewell.... The notes died away. He had not looked up from the keys while he was playing: he now turned slowly round. She stood behind him solemn and with lips which quivered slightly. He caught her hands and kissed them. “Anna, Anna...” he exclaimed. He felt as if his heart would break.

“Don’t quite forget me,” she said softly.

“I’ll write to you as soon as I’m there again.”

She nodded.

“And you’ll write to me, too, Anna... everything... everything... you understand?”

She nodded again.

“And... and... I’ll see you again early to-morrow.”

She shook her head. He wanted to make some reply as though he were astonished — as if it were really a matter of course that he should see her again before his departure. She lightly lifted her hand as though requesting him to be silent. He stood up, pressed her to him, kissed her mouth, which was cool and did not answer his kiss, and left the room. She stayed behind standing with limp arms and shut eyes. He hurried down the stairs. He felt down below in the street as though he must go up again — and say to her: “But it’s all untrue! That was not our goodbye. I really do love you. I belong to you. It can’t be over....”

But he felt that he ought not to. Not yet. Perhaps to-morrow. She would not escape him between this evening and to-morrow morning... and he rushed aimlessly about the empty streets as though in a slight delirium of grief and freedom. He was glad he had made no appointments with any one and could remain alone. He dined somewhere far off in an old low smoky inn in a silent corner while people from another world sat at the neighbouring tables, and it seemed to him that he was in a foreign town: lonely, a little proud of his loneliness and a little frightened of his pride.

The following day George was walking with Heinrich about noon through the avenues of the Dornbacher Park. An air which was heavy with thin clouds enveloped them, the sodden leaves crackled and slid underneath their feet, and through the shrubbery there glistened that very road on which they had gone the year before towards the reddish-yellow hill. The branches spread themselves out without stirring, as though oppressed by the distant sultriness of the greyish sun.

Heinrich was just describing the end of his drama, which had occurred to him yesterday. Ägidius had been landed on the island ready after his death-journey to undergo within seven days his foretold doom. The prince gives him his life. Ägidius does not take it and throws himself from the cliffs into the sea.

George was not satisfied: “Why must Ägidius die?” He did not believe in it.

Heinrich could not understand the necessity for any explanation at all. “Why, how can he go on living?” he exclaimed. “He was doomed to death. It was with his hand before his eyes that he lived the most splendid, the most glorious days that have ever been vouchsafed to man as the uncontrolled lord upon the ship, the lover of the Princess, the friend of the sages, singers and star-gazers, but always with the end before his eyes. All this richness would, so to speak, lose its point: why, his sublime and majestic expectation of his last minute would be bound to become transformed in Ägidius’s memory into a ridiculous dupe’s fear of death, if all this death-journey were to turn out in the end to be an empty joke. That’s why he must die.”

“Then you think it’s true?” asked George, with even greater doubt than before. “I can’t help it — I don’t.”

“That doesn’t matter,” replied Heinrich. “If you thought it true now, things would be too easy for me. But it would have become true as soon as the last syllable of my piece is written. Or....” He did not go on speaking. They walked up a meadow, and soon the expanse of the familiar valley spread out at their feet. The Sommerhaidenweg gleamed on the hill-slope on their right, on the other side hard by the forest the yellow-painted inn was visible with its red wooden terraces, and not far off was the little house with the dark grey gable. The town could be descried in an uncertain haze, the plain floated still further towards the heights and far in the distance loomed the pale low drawn outlines of the mountains. They now had to cross a broad highway and at last a footpath took them down over the fields and meadows. Remote on either side slumbered the forest.

George felt a presentiment of the yearning with which in the years to come, perhaps on the very next day, he would miss this landscape which had now ceased being his home.

At last they stood in front of the little house with the gable which George had wanted to see one last time. The door and windows were boarded up; battered by the weather, as though grown old before its time, it stood there and had no truck with the world.

"Well, so this is what is called saying goodbye," said George lightly. His look fell upon the clay figure in the middle of the faded flower-beds. "Funny," he said to Heinrich, "that I've always taken the blue boy for an angel. I mean I called him that, for I knew, of course, all the time what he looked like and that he was really a curly-headed boy with bare feet, tunic and girdle."

"You will swear a year from to-day," said Heinrich, "that the blue boy had wings."

George threw a glance up to the attic. He felt as though there existed a possibility of some one suddenly coming out on the balcony: perhaps Labinski who had paid him no visits since that dream; or he himself, the George von Wergenthin of days gone by; the George of that summer who had lived up there. Silly fancies. The balcony remained empty, the house was silent and the garden was deep asleep. George turned away disappointed. "Come," he said to Heinrich. They went and took the road to the Sommerhaidenweg.

"How warm it's grown!" said Heinrich, took off his overcoat and threw it over his shoulder, as was his habit.

George felt a desolate and somewhat arid sense of remembrance. He turned to Heinrich: "I'd prefer to tell you straight away. The affair is over."

Heinrich threw him a quick side-glance and then nodded, not particularly surprised.

"But," added George, with a weak attempt at humour, "you are earnestly requested not to think of the angel boy."

Heinrich shook his head seriously. "Thank you. You can dedicate the fable of the blue boy to Nürnberger."

"He's turned out right, once again," said George.

"He always turns out right, my dear George. One can positively never be deceived if one mistrusts everything in the world, even one's own scepticism. Even if you had married Anna he would have turned out right... or at any rate you would have thought so. But at any rate I think... you don't mind my saying so, I suppose... it's sound that it's turned out like this."

"Sound? I've no doubt it is for me," replied George with intentional sharpness, as though he were very far from having any idea of sparing his conduct. "It was perhaps even a duty, in your sense of the term, Heinrich, which I owed to myself to bring it to an end."

"Then it was certainly equally your duty to Anna," said Heinrich.

"That remains to be seen. Who knows if I have not spoilt her life?"

"Her life? Do you still remember Leo Golowski saying about her that she was fated to finish up in respectable life? Do you think, George, that a marriage with you would have been particularly respectable? Anna was perhaps cut out to be your mistress — not your wife. Who knows if the fellow she is going to marry one day or other wouldn't really have every reason to be grateful to you if only men weren't so confoundedly silly? People only have pure memories when they have lived through something — this applies to women quite as much as men."

They walked further along the Sommerhaidenweg in the direction of the town, which towered out of the grey haze, and approached the cemetery.

"Is there really any point," asked George hesitatingly, "in visiting the grave of a creature that has never lived?"

"Does your child lie there?"

George nodded. His child! How strange it always sounded! They walked along the brown wooden palings above which rose the gravestones and crosses, and then followed a low brick wall to the entrance. An attendant of whom they inquired showed them the way over the wide centre path which was planted with willows. There were rows of little oval plates, each one with two short prongs stuck into the ground, on little mounds like sand-castles, close to the planks in a fairly large plot of ground. The mound for which George was looking lay in the middle of the field. Dark red roses lay on it. George recognised them. His heart stood still. What a good thing, he thought, that we didn't meet each other! Did she hope to, I wonder?

"There where the roses are?" asked Heinrich.

George nodded.

They remained silent for a while. "Isn't it a fact," asked Heinrich, "that during the whole time you never once thought of the possibility of its ending like this?"

"Never? I don't quite know. All kinds of possibilities run through one's mind. But of course I never seriously thought of it. Besides, how could one?" He told Heinrich, and not for the first time, of how the Professor had explained the child's death. It had been an unfortunate accident through which one to two per cent. of unborn children were bound to perish. As to why this accident should have taken place in this particular case, that, of course, the Professor had not been able to explain. But was accident anything more than a word? Was not even that accident bound to have its cause?

Heinrich shrugged his shoulders. "Of course.... One cause after the other and its final cause in the beginning of all things. We could of course prevent the happening of many so-called accidents if we had more perception, more knowledge and more power. Who knows if your child's death could not have been prevented at some moment or other?"

"And perhaps it may have been in my own power," said George slowly.

"I don't understand. Was there any premonitory symptom or...."

George stood there staring fixedly at the little mound. "I'll ask you something, Heinrich, but don't laugh at me. Do you think it possible that an unborn child can die from one not longing for it to come, in the way one ought to — dying, as it were, of too little love?"

Heinrich put his hand on his shoulder. "George, how does a sensible man like you manage to get hold of such metaphysical ideas?"

"You can call it whatever you like, metaphysical or silly; for some time past I haven't been able to shake off the thought that to some extent I bear the blame for it having ended like that."

"You?"

"If I said a minute ago that I did not long for it enough I didn't express myself properly. The truth is this: that I had quite forgotten that little creature that was to have come into the world. In the last few weeks immediately before its birth, especially, I had absolutely forgotten it. I can't put it any differently. Of course I knew all the time what was going to happen, but it didn't concern me, as it were. I went on with my life without thinking of it. Not the whole time, but frequently, and particularly in the summer by the lake, my lake as you call it... then I was.... Yes, when I was there I simply knew nothing about my going to have a child."

"I've heard all about it," said Heinrich, looking past him.

George looked at him. "You know what I mean then? I was not only far away from the child, the unborn child, but from the mother too, and in so strange a way that with the best will in the world I can't describe it to you, can't even understand it myself to-day. And there are moments when I can't resist the thought that there must have been some connection between that forgetting and my child's death. Do you think anything like that so absolutely out of the question?"

Heinrich's forehead was furrowed deeply. "Quite out of the question? one can't go as far as that. The roots of things are often so deeply intertwined that we find it impossible to look right down to the bottom. Yes, perhaps there even are connections like that. But even if there are... they are not for you, George! Even if such connections did exist they wouldn't count so far as you were concerned."

"Wouldn't count for me?"

"The whole idea which you just tell me, well, it doesn't fit in with my conception of you. It doesn't come out of your soul. Not a bit of it. An idea of that kind would never have occurred to you your whole life long if you hadn't been intimate with a person of my type, and if it hadn't been your way sometimes not to think your own thoughts but those of men who were stronger — or even weaker than you are. And I assure you, whatever turn your life may have taken even down by that lake, your lake... our lake... you haven't incurred any so-called guilt. It might have been guilt in the case of some one else. But with a man like you whose character — you don't mind my saying this — is somewhat frivolous and a little unconscientious there would certainly be no sense of guilt. Shall I tell you something? As a matter of fact you don't feel guilty about the child at all, but the discomfort which you feel only comes from your thinking yourself under an obligation to feel guilty. Look here, if I had gone through anything like your adventure I might perhaps have been guilty because I might possibly have felt myself guilty."

"Would you have been guilty in a case like mine, Heinrich?"

"No, perhaps I wouldn't. How can I know? You're probably now thinking of the fact that I recently drove a creature straight to her death and in spite of that felt, so to speak, quite guiltless."

"Yes, that's what I'm thinking of. And that's why I don't understand...."

Heinrich shrugged his shoulders. "Yes. I felt quite guiltless. Somewhere or other in my soul and somewhere else, perhaps deeper down, I felt guilty.... And deeper down still, guiltless again. The only question is how deep we look down into ourselves. And when we have lit the lights in all the storeys, why, we are everything at the same time: guilty and guiltless, cowards and heroes, fools and wise men. 'We' — perhaps that's putting it rather too generally. In your case, for example, George, there are far less of these complications, at any rate when you're outside the influence of the atmosphere which I sometimes spread around you. That's why, too, you are better off than I am — much better off. My look-out is ghastly, you know. You surely must have noticed it before. What's the good to me of the lights burning in all my storeys? What's the good to me of my knowledge of human nature and my splendid intelligence? Nothing.... Less than nothing. As a matter of fact there's nothing I should like better, George, than that all the ghastly events of the last months had not happened, just like a bad dream. I swear to you, George, I would give my whole future and God knows what if I could make it undone. But if it were undone... then I should probably be quite as miserable as I am now."

His face became distorted as though he wanted to scream. But immediately afterwards he stood there again, stiff, motionless, pale, as though all his fire had gone out. And he said: "Believe me, George, there are moments when I envy the people with a so-called philosophy of life. As for me, whenever I want to have a decently ordered world I have always first got to create one for myself. That's rather a strain for any one who doesn't happen to be the Deity."

He sighed heavily. George left off answering him. He walked with him under the willows to the exit. He knew that there was no help for this man. It was fated that some time or other he should precipitate himself into the void from the top of a tower which he had circled up in spirals; and that would be the end of him. But George felt in good form and free. He made the resolve to use the three days which still belonged to him as sensibly as possible. The best thing to do was to be alone in some quiet beautiful country-side, to rest himself fully and recuperate for new work. He had taken the manuscript of the violin sonata with him to Vienna. He was thinking of finishing that before all others.

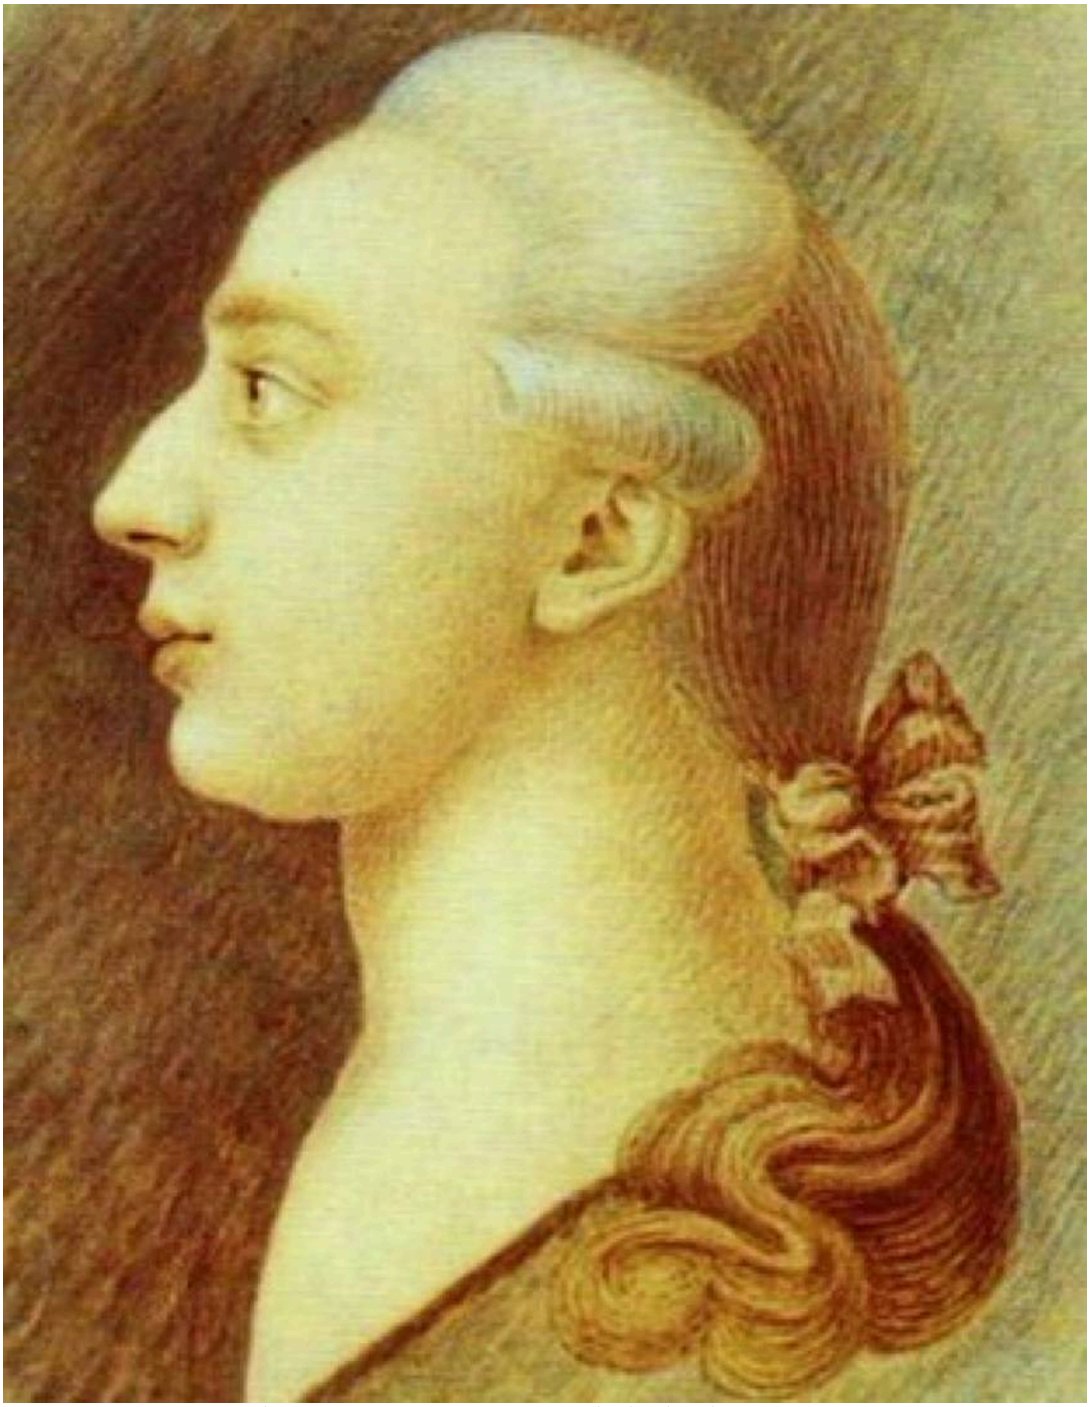
They crossed the doorway and stood in the street. George turned round, but the cemetery wall arrested his gaze. It was only after a few steps that he had a clear view of the valley. All he could do now was to guess where the little house with the grey gables was lying; it was no longer visible from here. Beyond the reddish-yellow hills which shut off the view of the landscape the sky sank down in the faint autumn light. A gentle farewell was taking place within George's soul of much happiness and much sorrow, the echoes of which he heard as it were in the valley which he was now leaving for a long time; and at the same time there was within his soul the greeting of days as yet unknown, which rang to his youth from out the wideness of the world.

Casanova's Homecoming (1918)



Original German Title: 'Casanovas Heimfahrt'

Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul, 1922

This novel first appeared in the Berlin literary journal Die Neue Rundschau in the summer of 1918, with the book edition being published by S. Fischer in the August of the same year. The story revolves around the famed libertine Giacomo Casanova, who, now 53 years old and yearning for his native Venice, grapples with feelings of nostalgia and restlessness as he contemplates returning home after years of exile. Giacomo Casanova (1725-1798) had been an Italian adventurer and writer, who was born in the Republic of Venice and travelled extensively throughout Europe. He is chiefly remembered for his autobiography, written in French and published posthumously as Histoire de ma vie (The Story of My Life). It has come to be regarded as a unique and provocative source of information on the customs and norms of European social life in the eighteenth century.

It is the year 1778 and Casanova waits in Mantua for news from Venice. The Council of Ten is to end the 25-year exile of the now impoverished Venetian from his native city. While waiting, Casanova meets his friend Olivo, who lives in modest comfort. Casanova once had an affair with Olivo's wife, Amalia, now the mother of three young daughters. Amalia still loves Casanova and wants to rekindle the affair. However, Casanova wants to seduce the young Marcolina, Olivo's very young niece. Amalia tries to dissuade him, claiming that the young, handsome Lieutenant Lorenzi is Marcolina's lover. However, Casanova knows better. Lorenzi has been rejected by Marcolina. The girl is studying mathematics in Bologna and is spending her holidays with relatives. Casanova, who is currently trying to gain literary fame with a polemical essay against Voltaire, finds in the beautiful and learned Marcolina a philosophically astute opponent, whose intellect is captivating...

Although in real life Casanova did visit Voltaire in Ferney and the seducer did indeed serve as a spy for Venice, even in his sixth decade, the entire novella is a fabrication. In response to a critique of the book by his sister-in-law, Schnitzler noted in his diary: "To them, telling a story now means being convoluted. Expressionist delusion!—"

POSTFACE

CHAPTER ONE.

CASANOVA WAS IN his fifty-third year. Though no longer driven by the lust of adventure that had spurred him in his youth, he was still hunted athwart the world, hunted now by a restlessness due to the approach of old age. His yearning for Venice, the city of his birth, grew so intense that, like a wounded bird slowly circling downwards in its death flight, he began to move in ever-narrowing circles. Again and again, during the last ten years of his exile, he had implored the Supreme Council for leave to return home. Erstwhile, in the drafting of these petitions — a work in which he was a past master — a defiant, wilful spirit seemed to have guided his pen; at times even he appeared to take a grim delight in his forwardness. But of late his requests had been couched in humble, beseeching words which displayed, ever more plainly, the ache of homesickness and genuine repentance.

The sins of his earlier years (the most unpardonable to the Venetian councillors was his free-thinking, not his dissoluteness, or quarrelsomeness, or rather sportive knavery) were by degrees passing into oblivion, and so Casanova had a certain amount of confidence that he would receive a hearing. The history of his marvellous escape from The Leads of Venice, which he had recounted on innumerable occasions at the courts of princes, in the palaces of nobles, at the supper tables of burghers, and in houses of ill fame, was beginning to make people forget any disrepute which had attached to his name. Moreover, in letters to Mantua, where he had been staying for two months, persons of influence had conveyed hope to the adventurer, whose inward and outward lustre were gradually beginning to fade, that ere long there would come a favorable turn in his fortunes.

Since his means were now extremely slender, Casanova had decided to await the expected pardon in the modest but respectable inn where he had stayed in happier years. To make only passing mention of less spiritual amusements, with which he could not wholly dispense — he spent most of his time in writing a polemic against the slanderer Voltaire, hoping that the publication of this document would serve, upon his return to Venice, to give him unchallenged position and prestige in the eyes of all well-disposed citizens.

One morning he went out for a walk beyond the town limits to excogitate the final touches for some sentences that were to annihilate the infidel Frenchman. Suddenly he fell prey to a disquiet that almost amounted to physical distress. He turned over in his mind the life he had been leading for the last three months. It had grown wearisomely familiar — the morning walks into the country, the evenings spent in gambling for petty stakes with the reputed Baron Perotti and the latter's pock-marked mistress. He thought of the affection lavished upon himself by his hostess, a woman ardent but no longer young. He thought of how he had passed his time over the writings of Voltaire and over the composition of an audacious rejoinder which until that moment had seemed to him by no means inadequate. Yet now, in the dulcet atmosphere of a morning in late summer, all these things appeared stupid and repulsive.

Muttering a curse without really knowing upon whose head he wished it to alight, gripping the hilt of his sword, darting angry glances in all directions as if invisible scornful eyes were watching him in the surrounding solitude, he turned on his heel and retraced his steps back to the town, determined to make arrangements that very hour for immediate departure. He felt convinced that a more genial mood would possess him were he to diminish even by a few miles the distance that separated him from the home for which he longed. It was necessary to hasten, so that he might be sure of booking a place in the diligence. It was to leave at eventide by the eastward road. There was little else to do, for he really need not bother to pay a farewell visit to Baron Perotti. Half an hour would suffice for the packing of all his possessions. He thought of the two suits, the shabbier of which he was wearing at that moment; of the much darned, though once elegant, underlinen. With two or three snuffboxes, a gold watch and chain, and a few books, these comprised his whole worldly wealth. He called to mind past splendors, when he had travelled as a man of distinction, driving in a fine carriage; when he had been well furnished both with necessaries and with superfluities; when he had even had his own servingman — who had usually, of course, been a rogue. These memories brought impotent anger in their train, and his eyes filled with tears. A young woman drove towards him, whip in hand. In her little cart, amid sacks and various odds and ends, lay her husband, drunk and snoring. Casanova strode by beneath the chestnut trees that lined the highway, his face working with wrath, unintelligible phrases hissing from between his clenched teeth. The woman glanced at him inquisitively and mockingly at first, then, on encountering an angry glare, with some alarm, and finally, after she had passed, there was amorous invitation in the look she gave him over her shoulder. Casanova, who was well aware that rage and hatred can assume the semblance of youth more readily than can gentleness and amiability, was prompt to realize that a bold response on his part would bring the cart to a standstill, and that the young woman would be ready to give him any assignation he pleased. Nevertheless, although the recognition of this fact put him in a better humor for the nonce, it seemed hardly worth while to waste minutes upon so trivial an adventure. He was content, therefore, to allow the peasant woman to drive her cart and all its contents unimpeded through the dust of the roadway.

The sun was now high in the heavens, and the shade of the trees hardly tempered the heat. Casanova was soon compelled to moderate his pace.

Under the thick powder of dust the shabbiness of his garments was no longer apparent, so that by his dress and bearing he might easily have been taken for a gentleman of station who had been pleased for once in a way to walk instead of drive. He had almost reached the arched gateway near his inn, when he met a heavy country carriage lumbering along the road. In it was seated a stoutish man, well dressed, and still fairly young. His hands were clasped across his stomach, his eyelids drooped, and he seemed about to doze off, when of a sudden he caught sight of Casanova, and a great change took place in him. His whole aspect betrayed great excitement. He sprang to his feet, but too quickly, and fell back into his seat. Rising again, he gave the driver a punch in the back, to make the fellow pull up. But since the carriage did not stop instantly, the passenger turned round so as not to lose sight of Casanova, signalled with both hands, and finally called to him thrice by name, in a thin, clear voice. Not till he heard the voice, did Casanova recognize who it was. By now the carriage had stopped, and Casanova smilingly seized two hands outstretched towards him, saying:

“Olivo, is it really you?”

“Yes, Signor Casanova, it is I. You recognize me, then?”

“Why not? Since I last saw you, on your wedding day, you’ve put on flesh; but very likely I’ve changed a good deal, too, in these fifteen years, though not perhaps in the same fashion.”

“Not a bit of it,” exclaimed Olivo. “Why, Signor Casanova, you have hardly changed at all! And it is more than fifteen years; the sixteen years were up a few days ago. As you can imagine, Amalia and I had a good talk about you on the anniversary of our wedding.”

“Indeed?” said Casanova cordially. “You both think of me at times?”

The tears came to Olivo’s eyes. He was still holding Casanova’s hands, and he pressed them fondly.

“We have so much to thank you for, Signor Casanova. How could we ever forget our benefactor? Should we do so...”

“Don’t speak of it,” interrupted Casanova. “How is Signora Amalia? Do you know, I have been living in Mantua three months, very quietly to be sure, but taking plenty of walks as I always have done. How is it, Olivo, that I never met you or your wife before?"

"The matter is simple, Signor Casanova. Both Amalia and I detest the town, and we gave up living there a long time ago. Would you do me the favor to jump in? We shall be at home in an hour."

Casanova tried to excuse himself, but Olivo insisted.

"I will take no denial. How delighted Amalia will be to see you once more, and how proud to show you our three children. Yes, we have three, Signor Casanova. All girls. Thirteen, ten, and eight — not one of them old enough yet — you'll excuse me, won't you — to have her head turned by Casanova."

He laughed good-humoredly, and made as if to help Casanova into the carriage. The latter shook his head. He had been tempted for a moment by natural curiosity to accept Olivo's invitation. Then his impatience returned in full force, and he assured his would-be host that unfortunately urgent business called him away from Mantua that very afternoon.

What could he expect to find in Olivo's house? Sixteen years were a long time! Amalia would be no younger and no prettier. At his age, a girl of thirteen would not find him interesting. Olivo, too, whom he had known in old days as a lean and eager student, was now a portly, countrified paterfamilias. The proposed visit did not offer sufficient attractions to induce Casanova to abandon a journey that was to bring him thirty or forty miles nearer to Venice.

Olivo, however, was disinclined to take no for an answer. Casanova must at least accept a lift back to the inn, a kindly suggestion that could not decently be refused. It was only a few minutes' drive. The hostess, a buxom woman in the middle thirties, welcomed Casanova with a glance that did not fail to disclose to Olivo the tender relationship between the pair. She shook hands with Olivo as an old acquaintance. She was a customer of Signor Olivo's, she explained to Casanova, for an excellent medium-dry wine grown on his estate.

Olivo hastened to announce that the Chevalier de Seingalt (the hostess had addressed Casanova by this title, and Olivo promptly followed suit) was so churlish as to refuse the invitation of an old friend, on the ridiculous plea that to-day of all days he had to leave Mantua. The woman's look of gloom convinced Olivo that this was the first she had heard of Casanova's intended departure, and the latter felt it desirable to explain that his mention of the journey had been a mere pretext, lest he should incommode his friend's household by an unexpected visit, and that he had, in fact, an important piece of writing to finish during the next few days, and no place was better suited for the work than the inn, where his room was agreeably cool and quiet.

Olivo protested that the Chevalier de Seingalt would do his modest home the greatest possible honor by finishing the work in question there. A change to the country could not but be helpful in such an undertaking. If Casanova should need learned treatises and works of reference, there would be no lack of them, for Olivo's niece, the daughter of a deceased half-brother, a girl who though young was extremely erudite, had arrived a few weeks before with a whole trunkful of books. Should any guests drop in at times of an evening, the Chevalier need not put himself about — unless, indeed, after the labors of the day, cheerful conversation or a game of cards might offer welcome distraction. Directly Casanova heard of the niece, he decided he would like to make her acquaintance, and after a show of further reluctance he yielded to Olivo's solicitation, declaring, however, that on no account would he be able to leave Mantua for more than a day or two. He begged the hostess to forward promptly by messenger any letters that should arrive during his absence, since they might be of the first importance.

Matters having thus been arranged to Olivo's complete satisfaction, Casanova went to his room, made ready for the journey, and returned to the parlor in a quarter of an hour. Olivo, meanwhile, had been having a lively business talk with the hostess. He now rose, drank off his glass of wine, and with a significant wink promised to bring the Chevalier back, not perhaps to-morrow or the day after, but in any case in good order and condition. Casanova, however, had suddenly grown distrait and irritable. So cold was his farewell to the fond hostess that, at the carriage door, she whispered a parting word in his ear which was anything but amiable.

During the drive along the dusty road beneath the glare of the noonday sun, Olivo gave a garrulous and somewhat incoherent account of his life since the friends' last meeting. Shortly after his marriage he had bought a plot of land near the town, and had started in a small way as market gardener. Doing well at this trade, he had gradually been able to undertake more ambitious farming ventures. At length, under God's favor, and thanks to his own and his wife's efficiency, he had been able three years earlier to buy from the pecuniarily embarrassed Count Marazzani the latter's old and somewhat dilapidated country seat with a vineyard attached. He, his wife, and his children were comfortably settled upon this patrician estate, though with no pretence to patrician splendor. All these successes were ultimately due to the hundred and fifty gold pieces that Casanova had presented to Amalia, or rather to her mother. But for this magical aid, Olivo's lot would still have been the same. He would still have been giving instruction in reading and writing to ill-behaved youngsters. Most likely, he would have been an old bachelor and Amalia an old maid.

Casanova let him ramble on without paying much heed. The incident was one among many of the date to which it belonged. As he turned it over in his mind, it seemed to him the most trivial of them all, it had hardly even troubled the waters of memory.

He had been travelling from Rome to Turin or Paris — he had forgotten which. During a brief stay in Mantua, he caught sight of Amalia in church one morning. Pleased with her appearance, with her handsome but pale and somewhat woebegone face, he gallantly addressed her a friendly question. In those days everyone had been complaisant to Casanova. Gladly opening her heart to him, the girl told him that she was not well off; that she was in love with an usher who was likewise poor; that his father and her own mother were both unwilling to give their consent to so inauspicious a union. Casanova promptly declared himself ready to help matters on. He sought an introduction to Amalia's mother, a good-looking widow of thirty-six who was still quite worthy of being courted. Ere long Casanova was on such intimate terms with her that his word was law. When her consent to the match had been won, Olivo's father, a merchant in reduced circumstances, was no longer adverse, being specially influenced by the fact that Casanova (presented to him as a distant relative of the bride's mother) undertook to defray the expenses of the wedding and to provide part of the dowry. To Amalia, her generous patron seemed like a messenger from a higher world. She showed her gratitude in the manner prompted by her own heart. When, the evening before her wedding, she withdrew with glowing cheeks from Casanova's last embrace, she was far from thinking that she had done any wrong to her future husband, who after all owed his happiness solely to the amiability and open-handedness of this marvellous friend. Casanova had never troubled himself as to whether Amalia had confessed to Olivo the length to which she had gone in gratitude to her benefactor; whether, perchance, Olivo had taken her sacrifice as a matter of course, and had not considered it any reason for retrospective jealousy; or whether Olivo had always remained in ignorance of the matter. Nor did Casanova allow these questions to harass his mind to-day.

The heat continued to increase. The carriage, with bad springs and hard cushions, jolted the occupants abominably. Olivo went on chattering in his high, thin voice; talking incessantly of the fertility of his land, the excellencies of his wife, the good behavior of his children, and the innocent pleasures of intercourse with his neighbors — farmers and landed gentry. Casanova was bored. He began to ask himself irritably why on earth he had accepted an invitation which could bring nothing but petty vexations, if not positive disagreeables. He thought longingly of the cool parlor in Mantua, where at this very hour he might have been working unhindered at his polemic against Voltaire. He had already made up his mind to get out at an inn now in sight, hire whatever conveyance might be available, and drive back to the town, when Olivo uttered a loud "Hullo!" A pony trap suddenly pulled up, and their own carriage came to a halt, as if by mutual understanding. Three young girls sprang out, moving with such activity that the knife-board on which they had been sitting flew into the air and was overturned.

"My daughters," said Olivo, turning to Casanova with a proprietary air.

Casanova promptly moved as if to relinquish his seat in the carriage.

"Stay where you are, my dear Chevalier," said Olivo. "We shall be at home in a quarter of an hour, and for that little while we can all make shift together. Maria, Nanetta, Teresina, this is the Chevalier de Seingalt, an old friend of mine. Shake hands with him. But for him you would...."

He broke off, and whispered to Casanova: "I was just going to say something foolish."

Amending his phrase, he said: "But for him, things would have been very different!"

Like their father, the girls had black hair and dark eyes. All of them including Teresina, the eldest, who was still quite the child, looked at the stranger with frank rustic curiosity. Casanova did not stand upon ceremony; he kissed each of the girls upon either cheek. Olivo said a word or two to the lad who was driving the trap in which the children had come, and the fellow whipped up the pony and drove along the road towards Mantua.

Laughing and joking, the girls took possession of the seat opposite Olivo and Casanova. They were closely packed; they all spoke at once; and since their father likewise went on talking, Casanova found it far from easy at first to follow the conversation. One name caught his ear, that of Lieutenant Lorenzi. Teresina explained that the Lieutenant had passed them on horseback not long before, had said he intended to call in the evening, and had sent his respects to Father. Mother had at first meant to come with them to meet Father, but as it was so frightfully hot she had thought it better to stay at home with Marcolina. As for Marcolina, she was still in bed when they left home. When they came along the garden path they had pelted her with hazel nuts through the open window, or she would still be asleep.

"That's not Marcolina's way," said Olivo to his guest. "Generally she is at work in the garden at six or even earlier, and sits over her books till dinner time. Of course we had visitors yesterday, and were up later than usual. We had a mild game of cards — not the sort of game you are used to, for we are innocent folk and don't want to win money from one another. Besides, our good Abbate usually takes a hand, so you can imagine, Chevalier, that we don't play for high stakes."

At the mention of the Abbate, the three girls laughed again, had an anecdote to tell, and this made them laugh more than ever. Casanova nodded amicably, without paying much attention. In imagination he saw Marcolina, as yet unknown to him, lying in her white bed, opposite the window. She had thrown off the bedclothes; her form was half revealed; still heavy with sleep she moved her hands to ward off the hail of nuts. His senses flamed. He was as certain that Marcolina and Lieutenant Lorenzi were in love with one another as if he had seen them in a passionate embrace. He was just as ready to detest the unknown Lorenzi as to long for the never seen Marcolina.

Through the shimmering haze of noon, a small, square tower now became visible, thrusting upward through the greyish-green foliage. The carriage turned into a by-road. To the left were vineyards rising on a gentle slope; to the right the crests of ancient trees showed above the wall of a garden. The carriage halted at a doorway in the wall. The weather-worn door stood wide. The passengers alighted, and at the master's nod the coachman drove away to the stable. A broad path led through a chestnut avenue to the house, which at first sight had an almost neglected appearance. Casanova's attention was especially attracted by a broken window in the first story. Nor did it escape his notice that the battlements of the squat tower were crumbling in places. But the house door was gracefully carved; and directly he entered the hall it was plain that the interior was carefully kept, and was certainly in far better condition than might have been supposed from the outward aspect.

"Amalia," shouted Olivo, so loudly that the vaulted ceiling rang. "Come down as quickly as you can! I have brought a friend home with me, an old friend whom you'll be delighted to see!"

Amalia had already appeared on the stairs, although to most of those who had just come out of the glaring sunlight she was invisible in the twilit interior. Casanova, whose keen vision enabled him to see well even in the dark, had noted her presence sooner than Olivo. He smiled, and was aware that the smile made him look younger. Amalia had not grown fat, as he had feared. She was still slim and youthful. She recognized him instantly.

"What a pleasant surprise!" she exclaimed without the slightest embarrassment, hastening down the stairs, and offering her cheek to Casanova. The latter, nothing loath, gave her a friendly hug.

"Am I really to believe," said he, "that Maria, Nanetta, and Teresina are your very own daughters, Amalia? No doubt the passage of the years makes it possible...."

"And all the other evidence is in keeping," supplemented Olivo. "Rely upon that, Chevalier!"

Amalia let her eyes dwell reminiscently upon the guest. "I suppose," she said, "it was your meeting with the Chevalier that has made you so late, Olivo?"

"Yes, that is why I am late. But I hope there is still something to eat?"

"Marcolina and I were frightfully hungry, but of course we have waited dinner for you."

"Can you manage to wait a few minutes longer," asked Casanova, "while I get rid of the dust of the drive?"

"I will show you your room immediately," answered Olivo. "I do hope, Chevalier, you will find it to your taste; almost as much to your taste," he winked, and added in a low tone, "as your room in the inn at Mantua — though here one or two little things may be lacking."

He led the way upstairs into the gallery surrounding the hall. From one of the corners a narrow wooden stairway led into the tower. At the top, Olivo opened the door into the turret chamber, and politely invited Casanova to enter the modest guest chamber. A maidservant brought up the valise. Casanova was then left alone in a medium-sized room, simply furnished, but equipped with all necessaries. It had four tall and narrow bay-windows, commanding views to the four points of the compass, across the sunlit plain with its green vineyards, bright meadows, golden fields, white roads, light-colored houses, and dusky gardens. Casanova concerned himself little about the view, and hastened to remove the stains of travel, being impelled less by hunger than by an eager curiosity to see Marcolina face to face. He did not change, for he wished to reserve his best suit for evening wear.

CHAPTER TWO.

WHEN CASANOVA REENTERED the hall, a panelled chamber on the ground floor, there were seated at the well-furnished board, his host and hostess, their three daughters, and a young woman. She was wearing a simple grey dress of some shimmering material. She had a graceful figure. Her gaze rested on him as frankly and indifferently as if he were a member of the household, or had been a guest a hundred times before. Her face did not light up in the way to which he had grown accustomed in earlier years, when he had been a charming youth, or later in his handsome prime. But for a good while now Casanova had ceased to expect this from a new acquaintance. Nevertheless, even of late the mention of his name had usually sufficed to arouse on a woman's face an expression of tardy admiration, or at least some trace of regret, which was an admission that the hearer would have loved to meet him a few years earlier. Yet now, when Olivo introduced him to Marcolina as Signor Casanova, Chevalier de Seingalt, she smiled as she would have smiled at some utterly indifferent name that carried with it no aroma of adventure and mystery. Even when he took his seat by her side, kissed her hand, and allowed his eyes as they dwelt on her to gleam with delight and desire, her manner betrayed nothing of the demure gratification that might have seemed an appropriate answer to so ardent a wooing.

After a few polite commonplaces, Casanova told his neighbor that he had been informed of her intellectual attainments, and asked what was her chosen subject of study. Her chief interest, she rejoined, was in the higher mathematics, to which she had been introduced by Professor Morgagni, the renowned teacher at the university of Bologna. Casanova expressed his surprise that so charming a young lady should have an interest, certainly exceptional, in a dry and difficult subject. Marcolina replied that in her view the higher mathematics was the most imaginative of all the sciences; one might even say that its nature made it akin to the divine. When Casanova asked for further enlightenment upon a view so novel to him, Marcolina modestly declined to continue the topic, declaring that the others at table, and above all her uncle, would much rather hear some details of a newly recovered friend's travels than listen to a philosophical disquisition.

Amalia was prompt to second the proposal; and Casanova, always willing to oblige in this matter, said in easy-going fashion that during recent years he had been mainly engaged in secret diplomatic missions. To mention only places of importance, he had continually been going to and fro between Madrid, Paris, London, Amsterdam, and St. Petersburg. He gave an account of meetings and conversations, some grave and some gay, with men and women of all classes, and did not forget to speak of his friendly reception at the court of Catharine of Russia. He jestingly related how Frederick the Great had nearly appointed him instructor at a cadet school for Pomeranian junkers — a danger from which he had escaped by a precipitous flight. Of these and many other things he spoke as recent happenings, although in reality they had occurred years or decades before. Romancing freely, he was hardly conscious when he was lying either on a small scale or on a large, being equally delighted with his own conceits and with the pleasure he was giving to his auditors. While thus recounting real and imaginary incidents, he could almost delude himself into the belief that he was still the bold, radiant Casanova, the favorite of fortune and of beautiful women, the honored guest of secular and spiritual princes, the man whose spendings and gamblings and gifts must be reckoned in thousands. It was possible for him to forget that he was a decayed starveling, supported by pitiful remittances from former friends in England and Spain — doles which often failed to arrive, so that he was reduced to the few and paltry gold pieces which he could win from Baron Perotti or from the Baron's guests. He could even forget that his highest aim now was to return to his natal city where he had been cast into prison and from which, since his escape, he had been banned; to return as one of the meanest of its citizens, as writer, as beggar, as nonentity; to accept so inglorious a close to a once brilliant career.

Marcolina listened attentively like the others, but with the same expression as if she had been listening to someone reading aloud from an amusing narrative. Her face did not betray the remotest realization of the fact that the speaker was Casanova; that she was listening to the man who had had all these experiences and many more; that she was sitting beside the lover of a thousand women. Very different was the fire in Amalia's eyes. To her, Casanova was the same as ever. To her, his voice was no less seductive than it had been sixteen years earlier. He could not but be aware that at a word or a sign, and as soon as he pleased, he could revive this old adventure. But what to him was Amalia at this hour, when he longed for Marcolina as he had never longed for woman before. Beneath the shimmering folds of her dress he seemed to see her naked body; her firm young breasts allured him; once when she stooped to pick up her handkerchief, Casanova's inflamed fancy made him attach so ardent a significance to her movement that he felt near to swooning. Marcolina did not fail to notice the involuntary pause in the flow of his conversation; she perceived that his gaze had begun to flicker strangely. In her countenance he could read a sudden hostility, a protest, a trace of disgust.

Casanova speedily recovered his self-command, and was about to continue his reminiscences with renewed vigor, when a portly priest entered. Olivo introduced him as Abbate Rossi, and Casanova at once recognized him as the man he had met twenty-seven years earlier upon a market boat plying between Venice and Chioggia.

"You had one eye bandaged," said Casanova, who rarely missed a chance of showing off his excellent memory. "A young peasant-woman wearing a yellow kerchief round her head advised you to use a healing unguent which an apothecary with an exceedingly hoarse voice happened to have with him."

The Abbate nodded, and smiled, well-pleased. Then, with a sly expression, he came quite close to Casanova, as if about to tell him a secret. But he spoke out loud.

"As for you, Signor Casanova, you were with a wedding party. I don't know whether you were one of the ordinary guests or whether you were best man, but I remember that the bride looked at you far more languishingly than at the bridegroom. The wind rose; there was half a gale; you began to read a risky poem."

"No doubt the Chevalier only did so in order to lay the storm," said Marcolina.

"I never claim the powers of a wizard," rejoined Casanova. "But I will not deny that after I had begun to read, no one bothered about the storm." The three girls had encircled the Abbate. For an excellent reason. From his capacious pockets he produced quantities of luscious sweets, and popped them into the children's mouths with his stumpy fingers. Meanwhile Olivo gave the newcomer a circumstantial account of the rediscovery of Casanova. Dreamily Amalia continued to gaze at the beloved guest's masterful brown forehead.

The children ran out into the garden; Marcolina had risen from the table and was watching them through the open window. The Abbate had brought a message from the Marchese Celsi, who proposed to call that evening, with his wife, upon his dear friend Olivo.

"Excellent," said Olivo. "We shall have a pleasant game of cards in honor of the Chevalier. I am expecting the two Ricardis; and Lorenzi is also coming — the girls met him out riding this morning."

"Is he still here?" asked the Abbate. "A week ago I was told he had to rejoin his regiment."

"I expect the Marchesa got him an extension of leave from the Colonel."

"I am surprised," interjected Casanova, "that any Mantuese officers can get leave at present." He went on: "Two friends of mine, one from Mantua and the other from Cremona, left last night with their regiments, marching towards Milan."

"Has war broken out?" inquired Marcolina from the window. She had turned round; her face betrayed nothing, but there was a slight quaver in her voice which no one but Casanova noticed.

"It may come to nothing," he said lightly. "But the Spaniards seem rather bellicose, and it is necessary to be on the alert."

Olivo looked important and wrinkled his brow. "Does anyone know," he asked, "whether we shall side with Spain or with France?"

"I don't think Lieutenant Lorenzi will care a straw about that," suggested the Abbate. "All he wants is a chance to prove his military prowess."

"He has done so already," said Amalia. "He was in the battle at Pavia three years ago."

Marcolina said not a word.

Casanova knew enough. He went to the window beside Marcolina and looked out into the garden. He saw nothing but the wide greensward where the children were playing. It was surrounded by a close-set row of stately trees within the encompassing wall.

"What lovely grounds," he said, turning to Olivo. "I should so like to have a look at them."

"Nothing would please me better, Chevalier," answered Olivo, "than to show you my vineyards and the rest of my estate. You need only ask Amalia, and she will tell you that during the years since I bought this little place I have had no keener desire than to welcome you as guest upon my own land and under my own roof. Ten times at least I was on the point of writing you an invitation, but was always withheld by the doubt whether my letter would reach you. If I did happen to hear from some one that he had recently seen you in Lisbon, I could be quite sure that in the interval you would have left for Warsaw or Vienna. Now, when as if by miracle I have caught you on the point of quitting Mantua, and when — I can assure you, Amalia, it was no easy matter — I have succeeded in enticing you here, you are so niggard with your time that — would you believe it, Signor Abbate, he refuses to spare us more than a couple of days!"

"Perhaps the Chevalier will allow himself to be persuaded to prolong his visit," said the Abbate, who was contentedly munching a huge mouthful of peach. As he spoke, he glanced at Amalia in a way that led Casanova to infer that his hostess had told the Abbate more than she had told her husband.

"I fear that will be quite impossible," said Casanova with decision. "I need not conceal from friends who are so keenly interested in my fortunes, that my Venetian fellow-citizens are on the point of atoning for the injustice of earlier years. The atonement comes rather late, but is all the more honorable. I should seem ungrateful, or even rancorous, were I to resist their importunities any longer." With a wave of his hand he warded off an eager but respectful enquiry which he saw taking shape upon his host's lips, and hastened to remark: "Well, Olivo, I am ready. Show me your little kingdom."

"Would it not be wiser," interposed Amalia, "to wait until it is cooler? I am sure the Chevalier would prefer to rest for a while, or to stroll in the shade." Her eyes sought Casanova's with shy entreaty, as if she thought her fate would be decided once again during such a walk in the garden.

No one had anything to say against Amalia's suggestion, and they all went out of doors. Marcolina, who led the way, ran across the sunlit greensward to join the children in their game of battledore and shuttlecock. She was hardly taller than the eldest of the three girls; and when her hair came loose in the exercise and floated over her shoulders she too looked like a child. Olivo and the Abbate seated themselves on a stone bench beneath the trees, not far from the house. Amalia sauntered on with Casanova. As soon as the two were out of hearing, she began to converse with Casanova in a tone which seemed to ignore the lapse of years.

"So we meet again, Casanova! How I have longed for this day. I never doubted its coming."

“A mere chance has brought me,” said Casanova coldly.

Amalia smiled. “Have it your own way,” she said. “Anyhow, you are here! All these sixteen years I have done nothing but dream of this day!”

“I can’t help thinking,” countered Casanova, “that throughout the long interval you must have dreamed of many other things — and must have done more than dream.”

Amalia shook her head. “You know better, Casanova. Nor had you forgotten me, for were it otherwise, in your eagerness to get to Venice, you would never have accepted Olivo’s invitation.”

“What do you mean, Amalia? Can you imagine I have come here to betray your husband?”

“How can you use such a phrase, Casanova? Were I to be yours once again, there would be neither betrayal nor sin.”

Casanova laughed. “No sin? Wherefore not? Because I’m an old man?”

“You are not old. For me you can never be an old man. In your arms I had my first taste of bliss, and I doubt not it is my destiny that my last bliss shall be shared with you!”

“Your last?” rejoined Casanova cynically, though he was not altogether unmoved. “I think my friend Olivo would have a word to say about that.”

“What you speak of,” said Amalia reddening, “is duty, and even pleasure; but it is not and never has been bliss.”

They did not walk to the end of the grass alley. Both seemed to shun the neighborhood of the greensward, where Marcolina and the children were playing. As if by common consent they retraced their steps, and, silent now, approached the house again. One of the ground-floor windows at the gable end of the house was open. Through this Casanova glimpsed in the dark interior a half-drawn curtain, from behind which the foot of a bed projected. Over an adjoining chair was hanging a light, gauzy dress.

“Is that Marcolina’s room?” enquired Casanova.

Amalia nodded. “Do you like her?” she said — nonchalantly, as it seemed to Casanova.

“Of course, since she is good looking.”

“She’s a good girl as well.”

Casanova shrugged, as if the goodness were no concern of his. Then: “Tell me, Amalia, did you think me still handsome when you first saw me to-day?”

“I do not know if your looks have changed. To me you seem just the same as of old. You are as I have always seen you, as I have seen you in my dreams.”

“Look well, Amalia. See the wrinkles on my forehead; the loose folds of my neck; the crow’s-feet round my eyes. And look,” he grinned, “I have lost one of my eye teeth. Look at these hands, too, Amalia. My fingers are like claws; there are yellow spots on the finger-nails; the blue veins stand out. They are the hands of an old man.”

She clasped both his hands as he held them out for her to see, and affectionately kissed them one after the other in the shaded walk. “To-night, I will kiss you on the lips,” she said, with a mingling of humility and tenderness, which roused his gall.

Close by, where the alley opened on to the greensward, Marcolina was stretched on the grass, her hands clasped beneath her head, looking skyward while the shuttlecocks flew to and fro. Suddenly reaching upwards, she seized one of them in mid air, and laughed triumphantly. The girls flung themselves upon her as she lay defenceless.

Casanova thrilled. “Neither my lips nor my hands are yours to kiss. Your waiting for me and your dreams of me will prove to have been vain — unless I should first make Marcolina mine.”

“Are you mad, Casanova?” exclaimed Amalia, with distress in her voice.

“If I am, we are both on the same footing,” replied Casanova. “You are mad because in me, an old man, you think that you can rediscover the beloved of your youth; I am mad because I have taken it into my head that I wish to possess Marcolina. But perhaps we shall both be restored to reason. Marcolina shall restore me to youth — for you. So help me to my wishes, Amalia!”

“You are really beside yourself, Casanova. What you ask is impossible. She will have nothing to do with any man.”

Casanova laughed. “What about Lieutenant Lorenzi?”

“Lorenzi? What do you mean?”

“He is her lover. I am sure of it.”

“You are utterly mistaken. He asked for her hand, and she rejected his proposal. Yet he is young and handsome. I almost think him handsomer than you ever were, Casanova!”

“He was a suitor for her hand?”

“Ask Olivo if you don’t believe me.”

“Well, what do I care about that? What care I whether she be virgin or strumpet, wife or widow — I want to make her mine!”

“I can’t give her to you, my friend!” Amalia’s voice expressed genuine concern.

“You see for yourself,” he said, “what a pitiful creature I have become. Ten years ago, five years ago, I should have needed neither helper nor advocate, even though Marcolina had been the very goddess of virtue. And now I am trying to make you play the procuress. If I were only a rich man. Had I but ten thousand ducats. But I have not even ten. I am a beggar, Amalia.”

“Had you a hundred thousand, you could not buy Marcolina. What does she care about money? She loves books, the sky, the meadows, butterflies, playing with children. She has inherited a small competence which more than suffices for her needs.”

“Were I but a sovereign prince,” cried Casanova, somewhat theatrically, as was his wont when strongly moved. “Had I but the power to commit men to prison, to send them to the scaffold. But I am nothing. A beggar, and a liar into the bargain. I importune the Supreme Council for a post, a crust of bread, a home! What a poor thing have I become! Are you not sickened by me, Amalia?”

“I love you, Casanova!”

“Then give her to me, Amalia. It rests with you, I am confident. Tell her what you please. Say I have threatened you. Say you think I am capable of setting fire to the house. Say I am a fool, a dangerous lunatic escaped from an asylum, but that the embraces of a virgin will restore me to sanity. Yes, tell her that.”

“She does not believe in miracles.”

“Does not believe in miracles? Then she does not believe in God either. So much the better! I have influence with the Archbishop of Milan. Tell her so. I can ruin her. I can destroy you all. It is true, Amalia. What books does she read? Doubtless some of them are on the Index. Let me see them. I will compile a list. A hint from me....”

“Not a word more, Casanova! Here she comes. Keep yourself well in hand; do not let your eyes betray you. Listen, Casanova; I have never known a purer-minded girl. Did she suspect what I have heard from you, she would feel herself soiled, and for the rest of your stay she would not so much as look at you. Talk to her; talk to her. You will soon ask her pardon and mine.”

Marcolina came up with the girls, who ran on into the house. She paused, as if out of courtesy to the guest, standing before him, while Amalia deliberately withdrew. Indeed, it actually seemed to Casanova that from those pale, half-parted lips, from the smooth brow crowned with light-brown hair now restored to order, there emanated an aroma of aloofness and purity. Rarely had he had this feeling with regard to any woman; nor had he had it in the case of Marcolina when they were within four walls. A devotional mood, a spirit of self-sacrifice knowing nothing of desire, seemed to take possession of his soul. Discreetly, in a respectful tone such as at that day was customary towards persons of rank, in a manner which she could not but regard as flattering, he enquired whether it was her purpose to resume her studies that evening. She answered that in the country her work was somewhat irregular. Nevertheless, even during free hours, mathematical problems upon which she had recently been pondering, would at times invade her mind unawares. This had just happened while she was lying on the greensward gazing up into the sky.

Casanova, emboldened by the friendliness of her demeanor, asked jestingly what was the nature of this lofty, urgent problem. She replied, in much the same tone, that it had nothing whatever to do with the Cabala, with which, so rumor ran, the Chevalier de Seingalt worked wonders. He would therefore not know what to make of her problem.

Casanova was piqued that she should speak of the Cabala with such unconcealed contempt. In his rare hours of heart-searching he was well aware that the mystical system of numbers which passed by that name had neither sense nor purpose. He knew it had no correspondence with any natural reality; that it was no more than an instrument whereby cheats and jesters — Casanova assumed these roles by turn, and was a master player in both capacities — could lead credulous fools by the nose. Nevertheless, in defiance of his own better judgment, he now undertook to defend the Cabala as a serious and perfectly valid science. He spoke of the divine nature of the number seven, to which there are so many references in Holy Writ; of the deep prophetic significance of pyramids of figures, for the construction of which he had himself invented a new system; and of the frequent fulfilment of the forecasts he had based upon this system. In Amsterdam, a few years ago, through the use of arithmancy, he had induced Hope the banker to take over the insurance of a ship which was already reported lost, whereby the banker had made two hundred thousand gold guilders. He held forth so eloquently in defence of his preposterous theories that, as often happened, he began to believe all the nonsense he was talking. At length he went so far as to maintain that the Cabala was not so much a branch of mathematics as the metaphysical perfectionment of mathematics.

At this point, Marcolina, who had been listening attentively and with apparent seriousness, suddenly assumed a half-commiserating, half-mischievous expression, and said:

“You are trying, Signor Casanova” — she seemed deliberately to avoid addressing him as Chevalier— “to give me an elaborate proof of your renowned talent as entertainer, and I am extremely grateful to you. But of course you know as well as I do that the Cabala has not merely nothing to do with mathematics, but is in conflict with the very essence of mathematics. The Cabala bears to mathematics the same sort of relationship that the confused or fallacious chatter of the Sophists bore to the serene, lofty doctrines of Plato and of Aristotle.”

“Nevertheless, beautiful and learned Marcolina, you will admit,” answered Casanova promptly, “that even the Sophists were far from being such contemptible, foolish apprentices as your harsh criticism would imply. Let me give you a contemporary example. M. Voltaire’s whole technique of thought and writing entitles us to describe him as an Arch-Sophist. Yet no one will refuse the due meed of honor to his extraordinary talent. I would not myself refuse it, though I am at this moment engaged in composing a polemic against him. Let me add that I am not allowing myself to be influenced in his favor by recollection of the extreme civility he was good enough to show me when I visited him at Ferney ten years ago.”

“It is really most considerate of you to be so lenient in your criticism of the greatest mind of the century!”

Marcolina smilingly retorted.

"A great mind — the greatest of the century!" exclaimed Casanova. "To give him such a designation seems to me inadmissible, were it only because, for all his genius, he is an ungodly man — nay positively an atheist. No atheist can be a man of great mind."

"As I see the matter, there is no such incompatibility. But the first thing you have to prove is your title to describe Voltaire as an atheist."

Casanova was now in his element. In the opening chapter of his polemic he had cited from Voltaire's works, especially from the famous Pucelle, a number of passages that seemed peculiarly well-fitted to justify the charge of atheism. Thanks to his unfailing memory, he was able to repeat these citations verbatim, and to marshal his own counter-arguments. But in Marcolina he had to cope with an opponent who was little inferior to himself in extent of knowledge and mental acumen; and who, moreover, excelled him, not perhaps in fluency of speech, but at any rate in artistry of presentation and clarity of expression. The passages Casanova had selected as demonstrating Voltaire's spirit of mockery, his scepticism, and his atheism, were adroitly interpreted by Marcolina as testifying to the Frenchman's scientific genius, to his skill as an author, and to his indefatigable ardor in the search for truth. She boldly contended that doubt, mockery, nay unbelief itself, if associated with such a wealth of knowledge, such absolute honesty, and such high courage, must be more pleasing to God than the humility of the pious, which was apt to be a mask for lack of capacity to think logically, and often enough — there were plenty of examples — a mask for cowardice and hypocrisy.

Casanova listened with growing astonishment. He felt quite incompetent to convert Marcolina to his own way of thinking; all the more as he increasingly realized that her counterstrokes were threatening to demolish the tottering intellectual edifice which, of late years, he had been accustomed to mistake for faith. He took refuge in the trite assertion that such views as Marcolina's were a menace, not only to the ecclesiastical ordering of society, but to the very foundations of social life. This enabled him to make a clever change of front, to pass into the field of politics, where he hoped that his wide experience and his knowledge of the world would render it possible for him to get the better of his adversary. But although she lacked acquaintance with the notable personalities of the age; although she was without inside knowledge of courtly and diplomatic intrigues; although, therefore, she had to renounce any attempt to answer Casanova in detail, even when she felt there was good reason to distrust the accuracy of his assertions — nevertheless, it was clear to him from the tenor of her remarks, that she had little respect for the princes of the earth or for the institutions of state; and she made no secret of her conviction that, alike in small things and in great, the world was not so much a world ruled by selfishness and lust for power, as a world in a condition of hopeless confusion. Rarely had Casanova encountered such freedom of thought in women; never had he met with anything of the kind in a girl who was certainly not yet twenty years old. It was painful to him to remember that in earlier and better days his own mind had with deliberate, self-complacent boldness moved along the paths whereon Marcolina was now advancing — although in her case there did not seem to exist any consciousness of exceptional courage. Fascinated by the uniqueness of her methods of thought and expression, he almost forgot that he was walking beside a young, beautiful, desirable woman, a forgetfulness all the more remarkable as the two were alone in the leafy alley, and at a considerable distance from the house.

Suddenly, breaking off in the middle of a sentence, Marcolina joyfully exclaimed, "Here comes my uncle!"

Casanova, as if he had to rectify an omission, whispered in her ear: "What a nuisance. I should have liked to go on talking to you for hours, Marcolina." He was aware that his eyes were again lighting up with desire.

At this Marcolina, who in the spirited exchange of their recent conversation had almost abandoned her defensive attitude, displayed a renewed reserve. Her expression manifested the same protest, the same repulsion, which had wounded Casanova earlier in the day.

"Am I really so repulsive?" he anxiously asked himself. Then, replying in thought to his own question: "No, that is not the reason. Marcolina is not really a woman. She is a she-professor, a she-philosopher, one of the wonders of the world perhaps — but not a woman."

Yet even as he mused, he knew he was merely attempting to deceive himself, console himself, save himself; and all his endeavors were vain.

Olivo, who had now come up, addressed Marcolina. "Have I not done well to invite some one here with whom you can converse as learnedly as with your professors at Bologna?"

"Indeed, Uncle," answered Marcolina, "there was not one of them who would have ventured to challenge Voltaire to a duel!"

"What, Voltaire? The Chevalier has called him out?" cried Olivo, misunderstanding the jest.

"Your witty niece, Olivo, refers to the polemic on which I have been at work for the last few days, the pastime of leisure hours. I used to have weightier occupations."

Marcolina, ignoring this remark, said: "You will find it pleasantly cool now for your walk. Goodbye for the present." She nodded a farewell, and moved briskly across the greensward to the house.

Casanova, repressing an impulse to follow her with his eyes, enquired: "Is Signora Amalia coming with us?"

"No, Chevalier," answered Olivo. "She has a number of things to attend to in the house; and besides, this is the girls' lesson time."

"What an excellent housewife and mother! You're a lucky fellow, Olivo!"

"I tell myself the same thing every day," responded Olivo, with tears in his eyes.

They passed by the gable end of the house. Marcolina's window was still open; the pale, diaphanous gown showed up against the dark background of the room. Along the wide chestnut avenue they made their way on to the road, now completely in the shade. Leisurely, they walked up the slope skirting the garden wall. Where it ended, the vineyard began. Between tall poles, from which purple clusters hung, Olivo led his guest to the summit. With a complacent air of ownership, he waved towards the house, lying at the foot of the hill. Casanova fancied he could detect a female figure flitting to and fro in the turret chamber.

The sun was near to setting, but the heat was still considerable. Beads of perspiration coursed down Olivo's cheeks, but Casanova's brow showed no trace of moisture. Strolling down the farther slope, they reached an olive grove. From tree to tree vines were trained trellis-wise, while between the rows of olive trees golden ears of corn swayed in the breeze.

"In a thousand ways," said Casanova appreciatively, "the sun brings increase."

With even greater wealth of detail than before, Olivo recounted how he had acquired this fine estate, and how two great vintage years and two good harvests had made him a well-to-do, in fact a wealthy, man.

Casanova pursued the train of his own thoughts, attending to Olivo's narrative only in so far as was requisite to enable him from time to time to interpose a polite question or to make an appropriate comment. Nothing claimed his interest until Olivo, after talking of all and sundry, came back to the topic of his family, and at length to Marcolina. But Casanova learned little that was new. She had lost her mother early. Her father, Olivo's half-brother, had been a physician in Bologna. Marcolina, while still a child, had astonished everyone by her precocious intelligence; but the marvel was soon staled by custom. A few years later, her father died. Since then she had been an inmate in the household of a distinguished professor at the university of Bologna, Morgagni to wit, who hoped that his pupil would become a woman of great learning. She always spent the summer with her uncle. There had been several proposals for her hand; one from a Bolognese merchant; one from a neighboring landowner; and lastly the proposal of Lieutenant Lorenzi. She had refused them all, and it seemed to be her design to devote her whole life to the service of knowledge. As Olivo rambled on with his story, Casanova's desires grew beyond measure, while the recognition that these desires were utterly foolish and futile reduced him almost to despair.

CHAPTER THREE.

CASANOVA AND OLIVO regained the highroad. In a cloud of dust, a carriage drove up, and as they drew near the occupants shouted greetings. The newcomers were an elderly gentleman in elegant attire and a lady who was somewhat younger, of generous proportions, and conspicuously rouged.

"The Marchese," whispered Olivo to his companion.

The carriage halted.

"Good evening, my dear Olivo," said the Marchese. "Will you be so good as to introduce me to the Chevalier de Seingalt? I have no doubt that it is the Chevalier whom I have the pleasure of seeing."

Casanova bowed, saying: "Yes, I am he."

"I am the Marchese Celsi. Let me present the Marchesa, my spouse." The lady offered her finger tips. Casanova touched them with his lips.

The Marchese was two or three inches taller than Casanova, and unnaturally lean. He had a narrow face, of a yellow, waxy tint; his greenish eyes were piercing; his thick eyebrows were of reddish color, and met across the root of the nose. These characteristics gave him a somewhat formidable aspect. "My good Olivo," he said, "we are all going to the same destination. Since it is little more than half a mile to your house, I shall get out and walk with you. You won't mind driving the rest of the way alone," he added, turning to the Marchesa, who had meanwhile been gazing at Casanova with searching, passionate eyes. Without awaiting his wife's answer, the Marchese nodded to the coachman, who promptly lashed the horses furiously, as if he had some reason for driving his mistress away at top speed. In an instant the carriage vanished in a whirl of dust.

"The whole neighborhood," said the Marchese, "is already aware that the Chevalier de Seingalt has come to spend a few days with his friend Olivo. It must be glorious to bear so renowned a name."

"You flatter me, Signor Marchese," replied Casanova. "I have not yet abandoned the hope of winning such a name, but I am still far from having done so. It may be that a work on which I am now engaged will bring me nearer to the goal."

"We can take a short cut here," said Olivo, turning into a path which led straight to the wall of his garden.

"Work?" echoed the Marchese with a doubtful air. "May I enquire to what work you refer, Chevalier?"

"If you ask me that question, Signor Marchese, I shall in my turn feel impelled to enquire what you meant just now when you referred to my renown."

Arrogantly he faced the Marchese's piercing eyes. He knew perfectly well that neither his romance Icosameron nor yet his Confutazione della storia del governo veneto d'Amelot de la Houssaie had brought him any notable reputation as an author. Nevertheless it was his pose to imply that for him no other sort of reputation was desirable. He therefore deliberately misunderstood the Marchese's tentative observations and cautious allusions, which implied that Casanova was a celebrated seducer, gamester, man of affairs, political emissary, or what not. Celsi made no reference to authorship, for he had never heard of either the Refutation of Amelot or the Icosameron. At length, therefore, in polite embarrassment, he said: "After all, there is only one Casanova."

"There, likewise, you are mistaken, Signor Marchese," said Casanova coldly. "I have relatives, and a connoisseur like yourself must surely be acquainted with the name of one of my brothers, Francesco Casanova, the painter."

It seemed that the Marchese had no claim to connoisseurship in this field either, and he turned the conversation to acquaintances living in Naples, Rome, Milan, or Mantua, persons whom Casanova was not unlikely to have met. In this connection he also mentioned the name of Baron Perotti, but somewhat contemptuously.

Casanova was constrained to admit that he often played cards at the Baron's house. "For distraction," he explained; "for half an hour's relaxation before bedtime. In general, I have given up this way of wasting my time."

"I am sorry," said the Marchese, "for I must own it has been one of the dreams of my life to cross swords with you. Not only, indeed, at the card table; for when I was younger I would gladly have been your rival in other fields. Would you believe it — I forget how long ago it was — I once entered Spa on the very day, at the very hour, when you left the place. Our carriages must have passed one another on the road. In Ratisbon, too, I had the same piece of ill luck. There I actually occupied the room of which your tenancy had just expired."

"It is indeed unfortunate," said Casanova, flattered in spite of himself, "that people's paths so often cross too late in life."

"Not yet too late!" exclaimed the Marchese. "There are certain respects in which I shall not be loath to avow myself vanquished before the fight begins. But as regards games of chance, my dear Chevalier, we are perhaps both of us precisely at the age...."

Casanova cut him short. "At the age — very likely. Unfortunately, however, I can no longer look forward to the pleasure of measuring myself at the card table with a partner of your rank. The reason is simple." He spoke in the tone of a dethroned sovereign. "Despite my renown, my dear Marchese, I am now practically reduced to the condition of a beggar."

The Marchese involuntarily lowered his eyes before Casanova's haughty gaze. He shook his head incredulously, as if he had been listening to a strange jest. Olivo, who had followed the conversation with the keenest attention, and had accompanied the skilful parries of his marvellous friend with approving nods, could hardly repress a gesture of alarm. They had just reached a narrow wooden door in the garden wall. Olivo produced a key, and turned the creaking lock. Giving the Marchese precedence into the garden, he arrested Casanova by the arm, whispering:

"You must take back those last words, Chevalier, before you set foot in my house again. The money I have been owing you these sixteen years awaits you. I was only afraid to speak of it. Amalia will tell you. It is counted out and ready. I had proposed to hand it over to you on your departure...."

Casanova gently interrupted him. "You owe me nothing, Olivo. You know perfectly well that those paltry gold pieces were a wedding present from the friend of Amalia's mother. Please drop the subject. What are a few ducats to me?" He raised his voice as he spoke, so that the Marchese, who had paused at a few paces' distance could hear the concluding words. "I stand at a turning-point in my fortunes."

Olivo exchanged glances with Casanova, as if asking permission, and then explained to the Marchese: "You must know that the Chevalier has been summoned to Venice, and will set out for home in a few days."

"I would rather put it," remarked Casanova as they approached the house, "that summonses, growing ever more urgent, have been reaching me for a considerable while. But it seems to me that the senators took long enough to make up their minds, and may in their turn practise the virtue of patience."

"Unquestionably," said the Marchese, "you are entitled to stand upon your dignity, Chevalier."

They emerged from the avenue on to the greensward, across which the shadow of the house had now lengthened. Close to the dwelling, the rest of the little company was awaiting them. All rose and came to meet them. The Abbate led the way, with Marcolina and Amalia on either side. They were followed by the Marchesa, with whom came a tall, young officer, clad in a red uniform trimmed with silver lace, and wearing jack-boots — evidently Lorenzi. As he spoke to the Marchesa, he scanned her powdered shoulders as if they were well-known samples of other beauties with which he was equally familiar. The Marchesa smiled up at him beneath half-closed lids. Even a tyro in such matters could hardly fail to realize the nature of their relationship, or to perceive that they were quite unconcerned at its disclosure. They were conversing in animated fashion, but in low tones; and they ceased talking only when they caught up with the others.

Olivo introduced Casanova and Lorenzi to one another. They exchanged glances with a cold aloofness that seemed to offer mutual assurances of dislike; then, with a forced smile, both bowed stiffly without offering to shake hands. Lorenzi was handsome, with a narrow visage and features sharply cut for his age. At the back of his eyes something difficult to grasp seemed to lurk, something likely to suggest caution to one of experience. For a moment, Casanova was in doubt as to who it was that Lorenzi reminded him of. Then he realized that his own image stood before him, the image of himself as he had been thirty years before. “Have I been reincarnated in his form?” Casanova asked himself. “But I must have died before that could happen.” It flashed through his mind: “Have I not been dead for a long time? What is there left of the Casanova who was young, handsome, and happy?” Amalia broke in upon his musings. As if from a distance, though she stood close at hand, she asked him how he had enjoyed his walk. Raising his voice so that all could hear, he expressed his admiration for the fertile, well-managed estate.

Meanwhile upon the greensward the maidservant was laying the table for supper. The two elder girls were “helping.” With much fuss and giggling, they brought out of the house the silver, the wine glasses, and other requisites.

Gradually the dusk fell; a cool breeze stirred through the garden. Marcolina went to the table, to put the finishing touches to the work of the maidservant and the girls. The others wandered about the greensward and along the alleys. The Marchesa was extremely polite to Casanova. She said that the story of his remarkable escape from The Leads in Venice was not unknown to her, but it would be a pleasure to hear it from his own lips. With a meaning smile she added that she understood him to have had far more dangerous adventures, which he might perhaps be less inclined to recount. Casanova rejoined that he had indeed had a number of lively experiences, but had never made serious acquaintance with that mode of existence whose meaning and very essence were danger. Although, many years before, during troublous times, he had for a few months been a soldier upon the island of Corfu (was there any profession on earth into which the current of fate had not drifted him?), he had never had the good fortune to go through a real campaign, such as that which, he understood, Lieutenant Lorenzi was about to experience — a piece of luck for which he was inclined to envy the Lieutenant.

“Then you know more than I do, Signor Casanova,” said Lorenzi in a challenging tone. “Indeed, you are better informed than the Colonel himself, for he has just given me an indefinite extension of leave.”

“Is that so?” exclaimed the Marchese, unable to master his rage. He added spitefully: “Do you know, Lorenzi, we, or rather my wife, had counted so definitely on your leaving, that we had invited one of our friends, Baldi the singer, to stay with us next week.”

“No matter,” rejoined Lorenzi, unperturbed. “Baldi and I are the best of friends. We shall get on famously together. You think so, don’t you?” he said, turning to the Marchesa with a smile. “You’d better!” said the Marchesa, laughing gaily.

As she spoke she seated herself at the table, beside Olivo, with Lorenzi on the other hand. Opposite sat Amalia, between the Marchese and Casanova. Next to Casanova, at one end of the long, narrow table, was Marcolina; next to Olivo, at the other end, sat the Abbate. Supper, like dinner, was a simple but tasteful meal.

The two elder girls, Teresina and Nanetta, waited on the guests, and served the excellent wine grown on Olivo's hillsides. Both the Marchese and the Abbate paid their thanks to the young waitresses with playful and somewhat equivocal caresses which a stricter parent than Olivo would probably have discountenanced. Amalia seemed to be unaware of all this. She was pale, dejected, and looked like a woman determined to be old, since her own youth had ceased to interest her.

"Is this all that remains of my empire?" thought Casanova bitterly, contemplating her in profile. Yet perhaps it was the illumination which gave so gloomy a cast to Amalia's features. From the interior of the house a broad beam of light fell upon the guests. Otherwise the glimmer in the sky sufficed them. The dark crests of the trees limited the outlook; Casanova was reminded of the eerie garden in which, late one evening many years before, he had awaited the coming of his mistress.

"Murano!" he whispered to himself, and trembled. Then he spoke aloud: "On an island near Venice there is a convent garden where I last set foot several decades ago. At night, there, the scent is just like this."

"Were you ever a monk?" asked the Marchesa, sportively.

"All but," replied Casanova with a smile, explaining, truthfully enough, that when he was a lad of fifteen he had been given minor orders by the archbishop of Venice, but that before attaining full manhood he had decided to lay aside the cassock.

The Abbate mentioned that there was a nunnery close at hand, and strongly recommended Casanova to visit the place if he had never seen it. Olivo heartily endorsed the recommendation, singing the praises of the picturesque old building, the situation, and the diversified beauties of the approach.

"The Lady Abbess, Sister Serafina," continued the Abbate, "is an extremely learned woman, a duchess by birth. She has told me — by letter, of course, for the inmates are under a vow of perpetual silence — that she has heard of Marcolina's erudition, and would like to meet her face to face."

"I hope, Marcolina," said Lorenzi, speaking to her for the first time, "that you will not attempt to imitate the noble abbess in other respects as well as learning."

"Why should I?" rejoined Marcolina serenely. "We can maintain our freedom without vows. Better without than with, for a vow is a form of coercion."

Casanova was sitting next to her. He did not dare to let his foot touch hers lightly, or to press his knee against hers. He was certain that should she for the third time look at him with that expression of horror and loathing, he would be driven to some act of folly. As the meal progressed, as the number of emptied glasses grew and the conversation waxed livelier and more general, Casanova heard, once more as from afar, Amalia's voice.

"I have spoken to Marcolina."

"You have spoken to her?" A mad hope flamed up in him. "Calm yourself, Casanova. We did not speak of you, but only of her and her plans for the future. I say to you again, she will never give herself to any man."

Olivo, who had been drinking freely, suddenly rose, glass in hand, and delivered himself of a few stumbling phrases concerning the great honor conferred upon his humble home by the visit of his dear friend, the Chevalier de Seingalt.

"But where, my dear Olivo, is the Chevalier de Seingalt of whom you speak?" enquired Lorenzi in his clear, insolent voice.

Casanova's first impulse was to throw the contents of his glass in Lorenzi's face.

Amalia touched his arm lightly, to restrain him, and said: "Many people to-day, Chevalier, still know you best by the old and more widely renowned name of Casanova."

"I was not aware," said Lorenzi, with offensive gravity, "that the King of France had ennobled Signor Casanova."

"I was able to save the King that trouble," answered Casanova quietly. "I trust, Lieutenant Lorenzi, that you will be satisfied with an explanation to which the Burgomaster of Nuremberg offered no objection when I gave it to him in circumstances with which I need not weary the company." There was a moment of silent expectation. Casanova continued: "The alphabet is our common heritage. I chose a collocation of letters which pleased my taste, and ennobled myself without being indebted to any prince, who might perhaps have been disinclined to allow my claim. I style myself Casanova, Chevalier de Seingalt. I am indeed sorry, Lieutenant Lorenzi, if this name fails to meet with your approval."

"Seingalt! It is a splendid name," said the Abbate, repeating it several times, as if he were tasting it.

"There is not a man in the world," exclaimed Olivo, "who has a better right to name himself Chevalier than my distinguished friend Casanova!"

"As for you, Lorenzi," added the Marchese, "when your reputation has reached as far as that of Signor Casanova, Chevalier de Seingalt, we shall be willing enough, should you so desire, to give you also the title of Chevalier."

Casanova, somewhat nettled at not being allowed to fight his own battle, was about to resume the defence in person, when out of the dusk of the garden two elderly gentlemen, soberly habited, put in an appearance beside the table. Olivo greeted them with effusive cordiality, being delighted to turn the conversation and to put an end to a dispute that threatened to destroy the harmony of the evening. The newcomers were the brothers Ricardi. As Casanova had learned from Olivo, they were old bachelors. At one time members of the great world, they had been unfortunate in various undertakings. At length they had returned to their birthplace, the neighboring village, to lead a retired life in a tiny house they had rented. They were eccentric fellows, but quite harmless.

The Ricardis expressed their delight at renewing their acquaintance with the Chevalier, whom, they said, they had met in Paris a good many years ago.

Casanova could not recall the meeting.

"Perhaps it was in Madrid?" said the Ricardis.

"Maybe," replied Casanova, though he was absolutely certain that he had never seen either of them before.

The younger of the two was spokesman. The elder, who looked as if he might be ninety at least, accompanied his brother's words with incessant nods and grimaces. By now every one had left the table, and before this the children had disappeared. Lorenzi and the Marchesa were strolling in the dusk across the greensward. Marcolina and Amalia were in the hall, setting out the table for cards.

"What is the aim of all this?" said Casanova to himself, as he stood alone in the garden. "Do they imagine me to be rich? Are they on the lookout for plunder?"

These preparations, the ingratiating manners of the Marchese, the sedulous attentions of the Abbate, the appearance of the brothers Ricardi on the scene, were arousing his suspicions. Was it not possible that Lorenzi might be a party to the intrigue? Or Marcolina? Or even Amalia? For a moment it flashed through his mind that his enemies might be at work upon some scheme of the eleventh hour to make his return to Venice difficult or impossible. But a moment's reflection convinced him the notion was absurd — were it only because he no longer had any enemies. He was merely an old fellow in reduced circumstances. Who was likely to take any trouble to hinder his return to Venice? Glancing through the open window, he saw the company assembling round the table, where the cards lay ready, and the filled wine-glasses were standing. It seemed to him clear beyond all possibility of doubt that there was nothing afoot except an ordinary, innocent game of cards, in which the coming of a new player is always an agreeable change.

Marcolina passed him, and wished him good luck.

"Aren't you going to take a hand?" he said. "At least you will look on?"

"I have something else to do. Good night, Chevalier."

From the interior, voices called out into the night: "Lorenzi."— "Chevalier."— "We are waiting for you."

Casanova, standing in the darkness, could see that the Marchesa was leading Lorenzi away from the open greensward into the greater darkness under the trees. There she would fain have drawn him into her arms, but Lorenzi roughly tore himself away and strode towards the house. Meeting Casanova in the entry, he gave him precedence with mock politeness. Casanova accepted the precedence without a word of thanks.

The Marchese was the first banker. Olivo, the brothers Ricardi, and the Abbate staked such trifling amounts that to Casanova — even to-day when his whole worldly wealth consisted of no more than a few ducats — the game seemed ludicrous. All the more was this the case since the Marchese raked in his winnings and paid out his losses with a ceremonious air, as if he were handling enormous sums. Suddenly Lorenzi, who had hitherto taken no part in the game, staked a ducat, won, let the doubled stake stand; won again and again, and continued to have the same luck with but occasional interruptions. The other men, however, went on staking petty coins, and the two Ricardis in particular seemed quite annoyed if the Marchese failed to give them as much attention as he gave to Lieutenant Lorenzi. The two brothers played together upon the same hazard. Beads of perspiration formed upon the brow of the elder, who handled the cards. The younger, standing behind his brother, talked unceasingly, with the air of giving infallible counsel. When the silent brother won, the loquacious brother's eyes gleamed; but at a loss, he raised despairing eyes heavenward. The Abbate, impassive for the most part, occasionally enunciated some scrap of proverbial wisdom. For instance: "Luck and women cannot be constrained." Or, "The earth is round, and heaven is far away." At times he looked at Casanova with an air of sly encouragement, his eyes moving on from Casanova to rest upon Amalia where she sat beside her husband. It seemed as if his chief concern must be to bring the erstwhile lovers together once again.

As for Casanova, all he could think of was that Marcolina was in her room, undressing in leisurely fashion, and that if the window were open her white skin must be gleaming into the night. Seized with desire so intense as almost to put him beside himself, he moved to rise from his place by the Marchese and to leave the room. The Marchese, however, interpreting this movement as a resolve to take a hand in the game, said:

"At last! We were sure you would not be content to play the part of spectator, Chevalier."

The Marchese dealt him a card. Casanova staked all he had on his person, about ten ducats, which was nearly the whole of his entire wealth. Without counting the amount, he emptied his purse on the table, hoping to lose it at a single cast. That would be a sign of luck. He had not troubled to think precisely what sort of luck it would signify, whether his speedy return to Venice, or the desired sight of Marcolina's nudity. Ere he had made up his mind upon this point, the Marchese had lost the venture. Like Lorenzi, Casanova let the double stake lie; and just as in Lorenzi's case, fortune stood by him. The Marchese no longer troubled himself to deal to the others. The silent Ricardi rose somewhat mortified; the other Ricardi wrung his hands. Then the two withdrew, dumbfounded, to a corner of the room. The Abbate and Olivo took matters more phlegmatically. The former ate sweets and repeated his proverbial tags. The latter watched the turn of the cards with eager attention.

At length the Marchese had lost five hundred ducats to Casanova and Lorenzi. The Marchesa moved to depart, and looked significantly at the Lieutenant on her way out of the room. Amalia accompanied her guest. The Marchesa waddled in a manner that was extremely distasteful to Casanova. Amalia walked along beside her humbly and deprecatingly.

Now that the Marchese had lost all his ready cash, Casanova became banker, and, considerably to the Marchese's annoyance, he insisted that the others should return to the game. The brothers Ricardi eagerly accepted the invitation. The Abbate shook his head, saying he had had enough. Olivo played merely because he did not wish to be discourteous to his distinguished guest.

Lorenzi's luck held. When he had won four hundred ducats in all, he rose from the table, saying: "To-morrow I shall be happy to give you your revenge. But now, by your leave, I shall ride home."

"Home!" cried the Marchese with a scornful laugh — he had won back a few ducats by this time. "That is a strange way to phrase it!" He turned to the others: "The Lieutenant is staying with me. My wife has already driven home. I hope you'll have a pleasant time, Lorenzi!"

"You know perfectly well," rejoined Lorenzi imperturbably, "that I shall ride straight to Mantua, and not to your place, to which you were so good as to invite me yesterday."

"You can ride to bell for all I care!" said the other.

Lorenzi politely took his leave of the rest of the company, and, to Casanova's astonishment, departed without making any suitable retort to the Marchese.

Casanova went on with the game, still winning, so that the Marchese ere long was several hundred ducats in his debt. "What's the use of it all?" thought Casanova at first. But by degrees he was once more ensnared by the lure of the gaming table. "After all," he mused, "this is a lucky turn of fortune. I shall soon be a thousand to the good, perhaps even two thousand. The Marchese will not fail to pay his debt. It would be pleasant to take a modest competence with me to Venice. But why Venice? Who regains wealth, regains youth. Wealth is everything. At any rate, I shall now be able to buy her. Whom? The only woman I want.... She is standing naked at the window.... I am sure she is waiting there, expecting me to come.... She is standing at the window to drive me mad!"

All the same, with unruffled brow he continued dealing the cards, not only to the Marchese, but also to Olivo and to the brothers Ricardi. To the latter from time to time he pushed over a gold piece to which they had no claim, but which they accepted without comment. The noise of a trotting horse came from the road. "Lorenzi," thought Casanova. The hoofbeats echoed for a time from the garden wall, until sound and echo gradually died away.

At length Casanova's luck turned. The Marchese staked more and more boldly. By midnight Casanova was as poor as at the beginning; nay, poorer, for he had lost the few ducats with which he had made his first venture. Pushing the cards away, he stood up with a smile, saying: "Thank you, gentlemen, for a pleasant game."

Olivo stretched out both hands towards Casanova. "Dear friend, let us go on with the game..... You have a hundred and fifty ducats. Have you forgotten them? Not only a hundred and fifty ducats, but all that I have, everything, everything." His speech was thick, for he had been drinking throughout the evening.

Casanova signified his refusal with an exaggerated but courtly gesture. "Luck and women cannot be constrained," he said, bowing towards the Abbate, who nodded contentedly and clapped his hands.

"Till to-morrow, then, my dear Chevalier," said the Marchese. "We will join forces to win the money back from Lieutenant Lorenzi."

The brothers Ricardi insistently demanded that the game should continue. The Marchese, who was in a jovial mood, opened a bank for them. They staked the gold pieces which Casanova had allowed them to win. In a couple of minutes they had lost them all to the Marchese, who declined to go on playing unless they could produce cash. They wrung their hands. The elder began to cry like a child. The younger, to comfort his brother, kissed him on both cheeks. The Marchese enquired whether the carriage had returned, and the Abbate said he had heard it drive up half an hour earlier. Thereupon the Marchese offered the Abbate and the two Ricardis a lift, promising to set them down at their doors. All four left the house together.

When they had gone, Olivo took Casanova by the arm, and assured his guest repeatedly, with tears in his voice, that everything in the house was at Casanova's absolute disposal. They walked past Marcolina's window. Not merely was the window closed, but the iron grating had been fastened; within, the window was curtained. There had been times, thought Casanova, when all these precautions had been unavailing, or had been without significance. They reëntered the house. Olivo would not be dissuaded from accompanying the guest up the creaking staircase into the turret chamber. He embraced Casanova as he bade him good-night.

"To-morrow," he said, "you shall see the nunnery. But sleep as late as you please. We are not early risers here; anyhow we shall adapt the hours to your convenience. Good-night!" He closed the door quietly, but his heavy tread resounded through the house.

CHAPTER FOUR.

THE ROOM IN which Casanova was now left to his own devices was dimly lighted by two candles. His gaze roamed successively to the four windows, looking to the four quarters of heaven. The prospect was much the same from them all. The landscape had a bluish sheen. He saw broad plains with no more than trifling elevations, except to the northward where the mountains were faintly visible. A few isolated houses, farms, and larger buildings, could be made out. Among these latter was one which stood higher than the rest. Here there was still a light in one of the windows, and Casanova imagined it must be the Marchese's mansion.

The furniture of the room was simple. The double bed stood straight out into the room. The two candles were on a long table. There were a few chairs, and a chest of drawers bearing a gilt-framed mirror. Everything was in perfect order, and the valise had been unpacked. On the table, locked, lay the shabby portfolio containing Casanova's papers. There were also some books which he was using in his work; writing materials had been provided.

He did not feel sleepy. Taking his manuscript out of the portfolio, he reread what he had last written. Since he had broken off in the middle of a sentence, it was easy for him to continue. He took up the pen, wrote a phrase or two, then paused.

"To what purpose?" he demanded of himself, as if in a cruel flash of inner illumination. "Even if I knew that what I am writing, what I am going to write, would be considered incomparably fine; even if I could really succeed in annihilating Voltaire, and in making my renown greater than his — would I not gladly commit these papers to the flames could I but have Marcolina in my arms? For that boon, should I not be willing to vow never to set foot in Venice again, even though the Venetians should wish to escort me back to the city in triumph?"

"Venice!"..... He breathed the word once more. Its splendor captivated his imagination, and in a moment its old power over him had been restored. The city of his youth rose before his eyes, enshrined in all the charms of memory. His heart ached with yearning more intense than any that he could recall. To renounce the idea of returning home seemed to him the most incredible of the sacrifices which his destiny might demand. How could he go on living in this poor and faded world without the hope, without the certainty, that he was one day to see the beloved city again? After the years and decades of wanderings and adventures, after all the happiness and unhappiness he had experienced, after all the honor and all the shame, after so many triumphs and so many discomfitures — he must at length find a resting place, must at length find a home.

Was there any other home for him than Venice? Was there any good fortune reserved for him other than this, that he should have a home once more? It was long since in foreign regions he had been able to command enduring happiness. He could still at times grasp happiness, but for a moment only; he could no longer hold it fast. His power over his fellows, over women no less than over men, had vanished. Only where he evoked memories could his words, his voice, his glance, still conjure; apart from this, his presence was void of interest. His day was done!

He was willing to admit what he had hitherto been sedulous to conceal from himself, that even his literary labors, including the polemic against Voltaire upon which his last hopes reposed, would never secure any notable success. Here, likewise, he was too late. Had he in youth but had leisure and patience to devote himself seriously to the work of the pen, he was confident he could have ranked with the leading members of the profession of authorship, with the greatest imaginative writers and philosophers. He was as sure of this as he was sure that, granted more perseverance and foresight than he actually possessed, he could have risen to supreme eminence as financier or as diplomat.

But what availed his patience and his foresight, what became of all his plans in life, when the lure of a new love adventure summoned? Women, always women. For them he had again and again cast everything to the winds; sometimes for women who were refined, sometimes for women who were vulgar; for passionate women and for frigid women; for maidens and for harlots. All the honors and all the joys in the world had ever seemed cheap to him in comparison with a successful night upon a new love quest.

Did he regret what he had lost through his perpetual seeking and never or ever finding, through this earthly and superearthly flitting from craving to pleasure and from pleasure back to craving once more? No, he had no regrets. He had lived such a life as none other before him; and could he not still live it after his own fashion? Everywhere there remained women upon his path, even though they might no longer be quite so crazy about him as of old.

Amalia? He could have her for the asking, at this very hour, in her drunken husband's bed. The hostess in Mantua; was she not in love with him, fired with affection and jealousy as if he were a handsome lad? Perotti's mistress, pockmarked, but a woman with a fine figure? The very name of Casanova had intoxicated her with its aroma of a thousand conquests. Had she not implored him to grant her but a single night of love; and had he not spurned her as one who could still choose where he pleased?

But Marcolina — such as Marcolina were no longer at his disposal. Had such as Marcolina ever been at his disposal? Doubtless there were women of that kind. Perchance he had met more than one such woman before. Always, however, some more willing than she had been available, and he had never been the man to waste a day in vain sighing. Since not even Lorenzi had succeeded with Marcolina, since she had rejected the hand of this comely officer who was as handsome and as bold as he, Casanova, had been in youth, Marcolina might well prove to be that wonder of the world in the existence of which he had hitherto disbelieved — the virtuous woman.

At this juncture he laughed, so that the walls reëchoed. "The bungler, the greenhorn!" he exclaimed out loud, as so often in such self-communings. "He did not know how to make a good use of his opportunities. Or the Marchesa was hanging round his neck all the time. Or perhaps he took her as a next-best, when Marcolina, the philosopher, the woman of learning, proved unattainable!"

Suddenly a thought struck him. "To-morrow I will read her my polemic against Voltaire. I can think of no one else who would be a competent critic. I shall convince her. She will admire me. She will say: 'Excellent, Signor Casanova. Your style is that of a most brilliant old gentleman!' God!.... 'You have positively annihilated Voltaire, you brilliant senior!'"

He paced the chamber like a beast in a cage, hissing out the words in his anger. A terrible wrath possessed him, against Marcolina, against Voltaire, against himself, against the whole world. It was all he could do to restrain himself from roaring aloud in his rage. At length he threw himself upon the bed without undressing, and lay with eyes wide open, looking up at the joists among which spiders' webs were visible, glistening in the candlelight. Then, as often happened to him after playing cards late at night, pictures of cards chased one another swiftly through his brain, until he sank into a dreamless sleep.

His slumber was brief. When he awakened it was to a mysterious silence. The southern and the eastern windows of the turret chamber were open. Through them from the garden and the fields entered a complex of sweet odors. Gradually the silence was broken by the vague noises from near and from far which usually herald the dawn. Casanova could no longer lie quiet; a vigorous impulse towards movement gripped him, and lured him into the open. The song of the birds called to him; the cool breeze of early morning played upon his brow. Softly he opened the door and moved cautiously down the stairs. Cunning, from long experience, he was able to avoid making the old staircase creak. The lower flight, leading to the ground floor, was of stone. Through the hall, where half-emptied glasses were still standing on the table, he made his way into the garden. Since it was impossible to walk silently on the gravel, he promptly stepped on to the greensward, which now, in the early twilight, seemed an area of vast proportions. He slipped into the side alley, from which he could see Marcolina's window. It was closed, barred, and curtained, just as it had been overnight. Barely fifty paces from the house, Casanova seated himself upon a stone bench. He heard a cart roll by on the other side of the wall, and then everything was quiet again. A fine grey haze was floating over the greensward, giving it the aspect of a pond with fugitive outlines. Once again Casanova thought of that night long ago in the convent garden at Murano; he thought of another garden on another night; he hardly knew what memories he was recalling; perchance it was a composite reminiscence of a hundred nights, just as at times a hundred women whom he had loved would fuse in memory into one figure that loomed enigmatically before his questioning senses. After all, was not one night just like another? Was not one woman just like another? Especially when the affair was past and gone? The phrase, "past and gone," continued to hammer upon his temples, as if destined henceforth to become the pulse of his forlorn existence.

It seemed to him that something was rattling behind him along the wall. Or was it only an echo that he heard? Yes, the noise had really come from the house. Marcolina's window had suddenly been opened, the iron grating had been pushed back, the curtain drawn. A shadowy form was visible against the dark interior. Marcolina, clad in a white nightdress, was standing at the window, as if to breathe the fragrance of morning. In an instant, Casanova slipped behind the bench. Peeping over the top of it, through the foliage in the avenue, he watched Marcolina as if spellbound. She stood unthinking, it seemed, her gaze vaguely piercing the twilight. Not until several seconds had elapsed did she appear to collect herself, to grow fully awake and aware, directing her eyes slowly, now to right and now to left. Then she leaned forward, as if seeking for something on the gravel, and next she turned her head, from which her hair was hanging loosely, and looked up towards the windows in the upper story. Thereafter, she stood motionless for a while, supporting herself with a hand on either side of the window-frame as though she were fastened to an invisible cross. Now at length, suddenly illumined as it were from within, her features grew plain to Casanova's vision. A smile flitted across her face. Her arms fell to her sides; her lips moved strangely, as if whispering a prayer; once more she looked searchingly across the garden, then nodded almost imperceptibly, and at the instant someone who must hitherto have been crouching at her feet swung across the sill into the open. It was Lorenzi. He flew rather than walked across the gravel into the alley, which he crossed barely ten yards from Casanova, who held his breath as he lay behind the bench. Lorenzi, hastening on, made his way down a narrow strip of grass running along the wall, and disappeared from view. Casanova heard a door groan on its hinges — the very door doubtless through which he, Olivo, and the Marchese had reëntered the garden on the previous day — and then all was still. Marcolina had remained motionless. As soon as she knew that Lorenzi was safely away, she drew a deep breath, and closed grating and window. The curtain fell back into its place, and all was as it had been. Except for one thing; for now, as if there were no longer any reason for delay, day dawned over house and garden.

Casanova was still lying behind the bench, his arms outstretched before him. After a while he crept on all fours to the middle of the alley, and thence onward till he reached a place where he could not be seen from Marcolina's window or from any of the others. Rising to his feet with an aching back, he stretched body and limbs, and felt himself restored to his senses, as though re-transformed from a whipped hound into a human being — doomed to feel the chastisement, not as bodily pain, but as profound humiliation.

“Why,” he asked himself, “did I not go to the window while it was still open? Why did I not leap over the sill? Could she have offered any resistance; would she have dared to do so; hypocrite, liar, strumpet?”

He continued to rail at her as though he had a right to do so, as though he had been her lover to whom she had plighted troth and whom she had betrayed. He swore to question her face to face; to denounce her before Olivo, Amalia, the Marchese, the Abbate, the servants, as nothing better than a lustful little whore. As if for practice, he recounted to himself in detail what he had just witnessed, delighting in the invention of incidents which would degrade her yet further. He would say that she had stood naked at the window; that she had permitted the unchaste caresses of her lover while the morning wind played upon them both.

After thus allaying the first vehemence of his anger, he turned to consider whether he might not make a better use of his present knowledge. Was she not in his power? Could he not now exact by threats the favors which she had not been willing to grant him for love? But this infamous design was speedily abandoned; not so much because Casanova realized its infamy, as because, even while the plan crossed his mind, he was aware of its futility. Why should Marcolina, accountable to no one but herself, be concerned at his threats? In the last resort she was astute enough, if needs must, to have him driven from the house as a slanderer and blackmailer. Even if, for one reason or another, she were willing to give herself to him in order to preserve the secret of her amours with Lorenzi (he was aware that he was speculating on something beyond the bounds of possibility), a pleasure thus extorted would become for him a nameless torment. Casanova knew himself to be one whose rapture in a love relationship was a thousandfold greater when conferring pleasure than when receiving it. Such a victory as he was contemplating would drive him to frenzy and despair.

Suddenly he found himself at the door in the garden wall. It was locked. Then Lorenzi had a master-key! But who, it now occurred to him to ask, had ridden the horse he had heard trotting away after Lorenzi had left the card table? A servant in waiting for the purpose, obviously.

Involuntarily Casanova smiled his approval. They were worthy of one another, these two, Marcolina and Lorenzi, the woman philosopher and the officer. A splendid career lay before them.

“Who will be Marcolina’s next lover?” he thought questioningly. “The professor in Bologna in whose house she lives? Fool, fool! That is doubtless an old story. Who next? Olivo? The Abbate? Wherefore not? Or the serving-lad who stood gaping at the door yesterday when we drove up? She has given herself to all of them. I am sure of it. But Lorenzi does not know. I have stolen a march on him there.”

Yet all the while he was inwardly convinced that Lorenzi was Marcolina’s first lover. Nay, he even suspected that the previous night was the first on which she had given herself to Lorenzi. Nevertheless, as he made the circuit in the garden within the wall, he continued to indulge these spiteful, lascivious fantasies.

At length he reached the hall door, which he had left open. He must regain the turret chamber unseen and unheard. With all possible caution he crept upstairs, and sank into the armchair which stood in front of the table. The loose leaves of the manuscript seemed to have been awaiting his return. Involuntarily his eyes fell upon the sentence in the middle of which he had broken off. He read: “Voltaire will doubtless prove immortal. But this immortality will have been purchased at the price of his immortal part. Wit has consumed his heart just as doubt has consumed his soul, and therefore.....”

At this moment the morning sun flooded the chamber with red light, so that the page in his hand glowed. As if vanquished, he laid it on the table beside the others. Suddenly aware that his lips were dry, he poured himself a glass of water from the carafe on the table; the drink was lukewarm and sweetish to the taste. Nauseated, he turned his head away from the glass, and found himself facing his image in the mirror upon the chest of drawers. A wan, aging countenance with dishevelled hair stared back at him. In a self-tormenting mood he allowed the corners of his mouth to droop as if he were playing the part of pantaloon on the stage; disarranged his hair yet more wildly; put out his tongue at his own image in the mirror; croaked a string of inane invectives against himself; and finally, like a naughty child, blew the leaves of his manuscript from the table on to the floor.

Then he began to rail against Marcolina again. He loaded her with obscene epithets. “Do you imagine,” he hissed between his teeth, “that your pleasure will last? You will become fat and wrinkled and old just like the other women who were young when you were young. You will be an old woman with flaccid breasts; your hair will be dry and grizzled; you will be toothless, you will have a bad smell. Last of all you will die. Perhaps you will die while you are still quite young. You will become a mass of corruption, food for worms.”

To wreak final vengeance upon her, he endeavored to picture her as dead. He saw her lying in an open coffin, wrapped in a white shroud. But he was unable to attach to her image any sign of decay, and her unearthly beauty aroused him to renewed frenzy. Through his closed eyelids he saw the coffin transform itself into a nuptial bed. Marcolina lay laughing there with lambent eyes. As if in mockery, with her small, white hands she unveiled her firm little breasts. But as he stretched forth his arms towards her, in the moment when he was about to clasp her in his passionate embrace, the vision faded.

CHAPTER FIVE.

SOMEONE WAS KNOCKING at the door. Casanova awoke from a heavy sleep to find Olivo standing before him.

"At your writing so early?"

Casanova promptly collected his wits. "It is my custom," he said, "to work the first thing in the morning. What time is it?"

"Eight o'clock," answered Olivo. "Breakfast is ready in the garden. We will start on our drive to the nunnery as early as you please, Chevalier. How the wind has blown your papers about!"

He stooped to pick up the fallen leaves. Casanova did not interfere. He had moved to the window, and was looking down upon the breakfast table which had been set on the greensward in the shade of the house. Amalia, Marcolina, and the three young girls, dressed in white, were at breakfast. They called up a good-morning. He had no eyes for anyone but Marcolina, who smiled at him frankly and in the friendliest fashion. In her lap was a plateful of early-ripe grapes, which she was eating deliberately.

Contempt, anger, and hatred vanished from Casanova's heart. All he knew was that he loved her. Made drunken by the very sight of her, he turned away from the window to find Olivo on hands and knees still assembling the scattered pages of manuscript from under the table and chest of drawers. "Don't trouble any further," he said to his host. "Leave me to myself for a moment while I get ready for the drive."

"No hurry," answered Olivo, rising, and brushing the dust from his knees. "We shall easily be home in time for dinner. We want to get back early, anyhow, for the Marchese would like us to begin cards soon after our meal. I suppose he wants to leave before sunset."

"It doesn't matter to me what time you begin cards," said Casanova, as he arranged his manuscript in the portfolio. "Whatever happens, I shall not take a hand in the game."

"Yes you will," explained Olivo with a decision foreign to his usual manner. Laying a roll of gold pieces on the table, he continued: "Thus do I pay my debt, Chevalier. A belated settlement, but it comes from a grateful heart." Casanova made a gesture of refusal.

"I insist," said Olivo. "If you do not take the money, you will wound us deeply. Besides, last night Amalia had a dream which will certainly induce you — but I will let her tell the story herself." He turned and left the room precipitately.

Casanova counted the money. Yes, there were one hundred and fifty gold pieces, the very sum that fifteen years earlier he had presented to the bridegroom, the bride, or the bride's mother — he had forgotten which.

"The best thing I could do," he mused, "would be to pack up the money, say farewell to Olivo and Amalia, and leave the place at once, if possible without seeing Marcolina again. Yet when was I ever guided by reason? — I wonder if news has reached Mantua from Venice? But my good hostess promised to forward without fail anything that might arrive."

The maid meanwhile had brought a large earthenware pitcher filled with water freshly drawn from the spring. Casanova sponged himself all over. Greatly refreshed, he dressed in his best suit, the one he had intended to wear the previous evening had there been time to change. Now, however, he was delighted that he would be able to appear before Marcolina better clad than on the previous day, to present himself in a new form as it were.

So he sauntered into the garden wearing a coat of grey satin richly embroidered and trimmed with Spanish lace; a yellow waistcoat; and knee-breeches of cherry-colored silk. His aspect was that of a man who was distinguished without being proud. An amiable smile played about his lips, and his eyes sparkled with the fire of inextinguishable youth. To his disappointment, he found no one but Olivo, who bade him be seated, and invited him to fall to upon the modest fare. Casanova's breakfast consisted of bread, butter, milk, and eggs, followed by peaches and grapes, which seemed to him the finest he had ever eaten. Now the three girls came running across the lawn. Casanova kissed them in turn, bestowing on the thirteen-year-old Teresina such caresses as the Abbate had been free with on the previous day. Her eyes gleamed in a way with which Casanova was familiar. He was convinced this meant something more to her than childish amusement.

Olivo was delighted to see how well the Chevalier got on with the girls. "Must you really leave us to-morrow morning?" he enquired tentatively. "This very evening," rejoined Casanova jovially. "You know, my dear Olivo, I must consider the wishes of the Venetian senators...."

"How have they earned the right to any such consideration from you?" broke in Olivo. "Let them wait. Stay here for another two days at least; or, better still, for a week."

Casanova slowly shook his head. He had seized Teresina's hands, and held her prisoner between his knees. She drew herself gently away, with a smile no longer that of a child. At this moment Amalia and Marcolina emerged from the house. Olivo besought them to second his invitation. But when neither found a word to say on the matter, Casanova's voice and expression assumed an unduly severe emphasis as he answered: "Quite out of the question."

On the way through the chestnut avenue to the road, Marcolina asked Casanova whether he had made satisfactory progress with the polemic. Olivo had told her that his guest had been at the writing-table since early morning.

Casanova was half inclined to make an answer that would have been malicious in its ambiguity, and would have startled his auditor without betraying himself. Reflecting, however, that premature advances could do his cause nothing but harm, he held his wit in leash, and civilly rejoined that he had been content to make a few emendations, the fruit of his conversation with her yesterday.

Now they all seated themselves in the lumbering carriage. Casanova sat opposite Marcolina, Olivo opposite Amalia. The vehicle was so roomy that, notwithstanding the inevitable joltings, the inmates were not unduly jostled one against the other. Casanova begged Amalia to tell him her dream. She smiled cordially, almost brightly, no longer displaying any trace of mortification or resentment.

"In my dream, Casanova, I saw you driving past a white building in a splendid carriage drawn by six chestnut horses. Or rather, the carriage pulled up in front of this building, and at first I did not know who was seated inside. Then you got out. You were wearing a magnificent white court dress embroidered with gold, so that your appearance was almost more resplendent than it is to-day." Her tone conveyed a spice of gentle mockery. "You were wearing, I am sure of it, the thin gold chain you are wearing to-day, and yet I had never seen it until this morning!" This chain, with the gold watch and gold snuff-box set with garnets (Casanova was fingering it as she spoke), were the only trinkets of value still left to him. "An old man, looking like a beggar, opened the carriage door. It was Lorenzi. As for you, Casanova, you were young, quite young, younger even than you seemed to me in those days." She said "in those days" quite unconcernedly, regardless of the fact that in the train of these words all her memories came attendant, winging their way like a flight of birds. "You bowed right and left, although there was not a soul within sight; then you entered the house. The door slammed to behind you. I did not know whether the storm had slammed it, or Lorenzi. So startling was the noise that the horses took fright and galloped away with the carriage. Then came a clamor from neighboring streets, as if people were trying to save themselves from being run over; but soon all was quiet again. Next I saw you at one of the windows. Now I knew it was a gaming-house. Once more you bowed in all directions, though the whole time there was no one to be seen. You looked over your shoulder, as if someone were standing behind you in the room; but I knew that no one was there. Now, of a sudden, I saw you at another window, in a higher story, where the same gestures were repeated. Then higher still, and higher, and yet higher, as if the building were piled story upon story, interminably. From each window in succession, you bowed towards the street, and then turned to speak to persons behind you — who were not really there at all. Lorenzi, meanwhile, kept on running up the stairs, flight after flight, but was never able to overtake you. He wanted you because you had forgotten to give him a gratuity....."

"What next?" enquired Casanova, when Amalia paused.

"There was a great deal more, but I have forgotten," said Amalia.

Casanova was disappointed. In such cases, whether he was relating a dream or giving an account of real incidents, it was his way to round off the narrative, attempting to convey a meaning. He remarked discontentedly: "How strangely everything is distorted in dreams. Fancy, that I should be wealthy; and that Lorenzi should be a beggar, and old!"

"As far as Lorenzi is concerned," interjected Olivo, "there is not much wealth about him. His father is fairly well off, but no one can say that of the son."

Casanova had no need to ask questions. He was speedily informed that it was through the Marchese that they had made the Lieutenant's acquaintance. The Marchese had brought Lorenzi to the house only a few weeks before. A man of the Chevalier's wide experience would hardly need prompting to enlighten him as to the nature of the young officer's relationship to the Marchesa. After all, if the husband had no objection, the affair was nobody else's business.

"I think, Olivo," said Casanova, "that you have allowed yourself to be convinced of the Marchese's complaisance too easily. Did you not notice his manner towards the young man, the mingling of contempt and ferocity? I should not like to wager that all will end well."

Marcolina remained impassive. She seemed to pay no attention to this talk about Lorenzi, but sat with unruffled countenance, and to all appearance quietly delighting in the landscape. The road led upwards by a gentle ascent zigzagging through groves of olives and holly trees. Now they reached a place where the horses had to go more slowly, and Casanova alighted to stroll beside the carriage. Marcolina talked of the lovely scenery round Bologna, and of the evening walks she was in the habit of taking with Professor Morgagni's daughter. She also mentioned that she was planning a journey to France next year, in order to make the personal acquaintance of Saugrenue, the celebrated mathematician at the university of Paris, with whom she had corresponded. "Perhaps," she said with a smile, "I may look in at Ferney on the way, in order to learn from Voltaire's own lips how he has been affected by the polemic of the Chevalier de Seingalt, his most formidable adversary."

Casanova was walking with a hand on the side of the carriage, close to Marcolina's arm. Her loose sleeve was touching his fingers. He answered quietly: "It matters less what M. Voltaire thinks about the matter than what posterity thinks. A final decision upon the merits of the controversy must be left to the next generation."

"Do you really think," said Marcolina earnestly, "that final decisions can be reached in questions of this character?"

"I am surprised that you should ask such a thing, Marcolina. Though your philosophic views, and (if the term be appropriate) your religious views, seem to me by no means irrefutable, at least they must be firmly established in your soul — if you believe that there is a soul."

Marcolina, ignoring the personal animus in Casanova's words, sat looking skyward over the tree-crests, and tranquilly rejoined: "Ofttimes, and especially on a day like this" — to Casanova, knowing what he knew, the words conveyed the thrill of reverence in the newly awakened heart of a woman— “I feel as if all that people speak of as philosophy and religion were no more than playing with words. A sport nobler perhaps than others, nevertheless more unmeaning than them all. Infinity and eternity will never be within the grasp of our understanding. Our path leads from birth to death. What else is left for us than to live a life accordant with the law that each of us bears within — or a life of rebellion against that law? For rebellion and submissiveness both issue from God.”

Olivo looked at his niece with timid admiration, then turned to contemplate Casanova with some anxiety. Casanova was in search of a rejoinder which should convince Marcolina that she was in one breath affirming and denying God, or should prove to her that she was proclaiming God and the Devil to be the same. He realized, however, that he had nothing but empty words to set against her feelings, and to-day words did not come to him readily. His expression showed him to be somewhat at a loss, and apparently reminded Amalia of the confused menaces he had uttered on the previous day. So she hastened to remark: “Marcolina is deeply religious all the same, I can assure you, Chevalier.”

Marcolina smiled.

“We are all religious in our several ways,” said Casanova civilly.

Now came a turn in the road, and the nunnery was in sight. The slender tops of cypresses showed above the encircling wall. At the sound of the approaching carriage, the great doors had swung open. The porter, an old man with a flowing white beard, bowed gravely and gave them admittance. Through the cloisters, between the columns of which they caught glimpses of an overgrown garden, they advanced towards the main building, from whose unadorned, grey, and prison-like exterior an unpleasantly cool air was wafted. Olivo pulled the bellrope; the answering sound was high-pitched, and died away in a moment. A veiled nun silently appeared, and ushered the guests into the spacious parlor. It contained merely a few plain wooden chairs, and the back was cut off by a heavy iron grating, beyond which nothing could be seen but a vague darkness.

With bitterness in his heart, Casanova recalled the adventure which still seemed to him the most wonderful of all his experiences. It had begun in just such surroundings as the present. Before his eyes loomed the forms of the two inmates of the Murano convent who had been friends in their love for him. In conjunction they had bestowed upon him hours of incomparable sweetness. When Olivo, in a whisper, began to speak of the strict discipline imposed upon this sisterhood — once they were professed, the nuns must never appear unveiled before a man, and they were vowed to perpetual silence — a smile flitted across Casanova’s face.

The Abbess suddenly emerged from the gloom, and was standing in their midst. In silence she saluted her guests, and with an exaggerated reverence of her veiled head acknowledged Casanova’s expressions of gratitude for the admission of himself, a stranger. But when Marcolina wished to kiss her hand, the Abbess gathered the girl in her arms. Then, with a wave of the hand inviting them to follow, she led the way through a small room into a cloister surrounding a quadrangular flower-garden. In contrast to the outer garden, which had run wild, this inner garden was tended with especial care. The flower-beds, brilliant in the sunshine, showed a wonderful play of variegated colors. The warm odors were almost intoxicating. One, intermingled with the rest, aroused no responsive echo in Casanova’s memory. Puzzled, he was about to say a word on the subject to Marcolina, when he perceived that the enigmatic, stimulating fragrance emanated from herself. She had removed her shawl from her shoulders and was carrying it over her arm. From the opening of her gown came a perfume at once kindred to that of the thousand flowers of the garden, and yet unique.

The Abbess, still without a word, conducted the visitors between the flower-beds upon narrow, winding paths which traversed the garden like a lovely labyrinth. The graceful ease of her gait showed that she was enjoying the chance of showing others the motley splendors of her garden. As if she had determined to make her guests giddy, she moved on faster and ever faster like the leader of a lively folk-dance. Then, quite suddenly, so that Casanova seemed to awaken from a confusing dream, they all found themselves in the parlor once more. On the other side of the grating, dim figures were moving. It was impossible to distinguish whether, behind the thick bars, three or five or twenty veiled women were flitting to and fro like startled ghosts. Indeed, none but Casanova, with eyes preternaturally acute to pierce the darkness, could discern that they were human outlines at all.

The Abbess attended her guests to the door, mutely gave them a sign of farewell, and vanished before they had found time to express their thanks for her courtesy.

Suddenly, just as they were about to leave the parlor, a woman's voice near the grating breathed the word "Casanova." Nothing but his name, in a tone that seemed to him quite unfamiliar. From whom came this breach of a sacred vow? Was it a woman he had once loved, or a woman he had never seen before? Did the syllables convey the ecstasy of an unexpected reencounter, or the pain of something irrecoverably lost; or did it convey the lamentation that an ardent wish of earlier days had been so late and so fruitlessly fulfilled? Casanova could not tell. All that he knew was that his name, which had so often voiced the whispers of tender affection, the stammerings of passion, the acclamations of happiness, had to-day for the first time pierced his heart with the full resonance of love. But, for this very reason, to probe the matter curiously would have seemed to him ignoble and foolish. The door closed behind the party, shutting in a secret which he was never to unriddle. Were it not that the expression on each face had shown timidly and fugitively that the call to Casanova had reached the ears of all, each might have fancied himself or herself a prey to illusion. No one uttered a word as they walked through the cloisters to the great doors. Casanova brought up the rear, with bowed head, as if on the occasion of some profoundly affecting farewell.

The porter was waiting. He received his alms. The visitors stepped into the carriage, and started on the homeward road. Olivo seemed perplexed; Amalia was distrait. Marcolina, however, was quite unmoved. Too pointedly, in Casanova's estimation, she attempted to engage Amalia in a discussion of household affairs, a topic upon which Olivo was compelled to come to his wife's assistance. Casanova soon joined in the discussion, which turned upon matters relating to kitchen and cellar. An expert on these topics, he saw no reason why he should hide his light under a bushel, and he seized the opportunity of giving a fresh proof of versatility. Thereupon, Amalia roused herself from her brown study. After their recent experience — at once incredible and haunting — to all, and especially to Casanova, there was a certain comfort derivable from an extremely commonplace atmosphere of mundane life. When the carriage reached home, where an inviting odor of roast meat and cooking vegetables assailed their nostrils, Casanova was in the midst of an appetizing description of a Polish pasty, a description to which even Marcolina attended with a flattering air of domesticity.

CHAPTER SIX

IN A STRANGELY tranquillized, almost happy mood, which was a surprise to himself, Casanova sat at table with the others, and paid court to Marcolina in the sportive manner which might seem appropriate from a distinguished elderly gentleman towards a well-bred young woman of the burgher class. She accepted his attentions gracefully, in the spirit in which they appeared to be offered. He found it difficult to believe that his demure neighbor was the same Marcolina from whose bedroom window he had seen a young officer emerge, a man who had obviously held her in his arms but a few moments earlier. It was equally difficult for him to realize how this tender girl, who was fond of romping on the grass with other children, could conduct a learned correspondence with Saugrenue, the renowned mathematician of Paris. Yet simultaneously he derided himself for the inertness of his imagination. Had he not learned a thousand times that in the souls of all persons who are truly alive, discrepant elements, nay, apparently hostile elements, may coexist in perfect harmony? He himself, who shortly before had been so profoundly moved, had been desperate, had been ready for evil deeds, was now so gentle, so kindly, in so merry a mood, that Olivo's little daughters were shaking their sides with laughter. Nevertheless, as was usual with him after strong excitement, his appetite was positively ferocious, and this served to warn him that order was not yet fully restored in his soul.

With the last course, the maid brought in a despatch which had just arrived for the Chevalier by special messenger from Mantua. Olivo noticed that Casanova grew pale. He told the servant to provide the messenger with refreshment, then turned to his guest.

"Pray don't stand upon ceremony, Chevalier. Read your letter."

"If you will excuse me," answered Casanova. He went to the window and opened the missive with simulated indifference. It was from Signor Bragadino, an old friend of the family and a confirmed bachelor, over eighty years of age, and for the last decade a member of the Supreme Council. He had shown more interest than other patrons in pressing Casanova's suit. The letter was beautifully written, although the characters were a little shaky. It was as follows:

"My dear Casanova:

"I am delighted, at length, to be able to send you news which will, I hope, be substantially accordant with your wishes. The Supreme Council, at its last sitting, which took place yesterday evening, did not merely express its willingness to permit your return to Venice. It went further. The Council desires that your advent should be as speedy as possible, since there is an intention to turn to immediate account the active gratitude which you have foreshadowed in so many of your letters.

"Since Venice has been deprived for so long of the advantage of your presence, you may perhaps be unaware, my dear Casanova, that quite recently the internal affairs of our beloved native city have taken a rather unfavorable trend both politically and morally. Secret societies have come into existence, directed against the constitution of the Venetian state, and even, it would seem, aiming at its forcible overthrow. As might be expected, the members of these societies, persons whom it would not be too harsh to denominate conspirators, are chiefly drawn from certain free-thinking, irreligious, and lawless circles. Not to speak of what goes on in private, we learn that in the public squares and in coffee houses, the most outrageous, the most treasonable conversations, take place. But only in exceptional instances has it been possible to catch the guilty in the act, or to secure definite proof against the offenders. A few admissions have been enforced by the rack, but these confessions have proved so untrustworthy that several members of the Council are of opinion that for the future it would be better to abstain from methods of investigation which are not only cruel but are apt to lead us astray. Of course there is no lack of individuals well-affected towards public order and devoted to the welfare of the state, individuals who would be delighted to place their services at the disposal of the government; but most of them are so well known as stalwart supporters of the existing constitution that when they are present people are chary in their utterances and are most unlikely to give vent to treasonable expressions.

"At yesterday's sitting, one of the senators, whom I will not name, expressed the opinion that a man who had the reputation of being without moral principle and who was furthermore regarded as a freethinker — in short, Casanova, such a man as yourself — if recalled to Venice would not fail to secure prompt and sympathetic welcome in the very circles which the government regards with such well-grounded suspicion. If he played his cards well, such a man would soon inspire the most absolute confidence.

"In my opinion, irresistibly, and as if by the force of a law of nature, there would gravitate around your person the very elements which the Supreme Council, in its indefatigable zeal for the state, is most eager to render harmless and to punish in an exemplary manner. For your part, my dear Casanova, you would give us an acceptable proof of your patriotic zeal, and would furnish in addition an infallible sign of your complete conversion from all those tendencies for which, during your imprisonment in The Leads, you had to atone by punishment which, though severe, was not, as you now see for yourself (if we are to believe your epistolary assurances), altogether unmerited. I mean, should you be prepared, immediately on your return home, to act in the way previously suggested, to seek acquaintance with the elements sufficiently specified above, to introduce yourself to them in the friendliest fashion as one who cherishes the same tendencies, and to furnish the Senate with accurate and full reports of everything which might seem to you suspicious or worthy of note.

"For these services the authorities would offer you, to begin with, a salary of two hundred and fifty lire per month, apart from special payments in cases of exceptional importance. I need hardly say that you would receive in addition, without too close a scrutiny of the items, an allowance for such expenses as you might incur in the discharge of your duties (I refer, for instance, to the treating of this individual or of that, little gifts made to women, and so on).

"I do not attempt to conceal from myself that you may have to fight down certain scruples before you will feel inclined to fulfil our wishes. Permit me, however, as your old and sincere friend (who was himself young once), to remind you that it can never be regarded as dishonorable for a man to perform any services that may be essential for the safety of his beloved fatherland — even if, to a shallow-minded and unpatriotic citizen, such services might seem to be of an unworthy character. Let me add, Casanova, that your knowledge of human nature will certainly enable you to draw a distinction between levity and criminality, to differentiate the jester from the heretic. Thus it will be within your power, in appropriate cases, to temper justice with mercy, and to deliver up to punishment those only who, in your honest opinion, may deserve it.

"Above all I would ask you to consider that, should you reject the gracious proposal of the Supreme Council, the fulfilment of your dearest wish — your return to Venice — is likely to be postponed for a long and I fear for an indefinite period; and that I myself, if I may allude to the matter, as an old man of eighty-one, should be compelled in all human probability to renounce the pleasing prospect of ever seeing you again in this life.

"Since, for obvious reasons, your appointment will be of a confidential and not of a public nature, I beg you to address to me personally your reply, for which I make myself responsible, and which I wish to present to the Council at its next sitting a week hence. Act with all convenient speed, for, as I have previously explained, we are daily receiving offers from thoroughly trustworthy persons who, from patriotic motives, voluntarily place themselves at the disposal of the Supreme Council. Nevertheless, there is hardly one among them who can compare with you, my dear Casanova, in respect of experience or intelligence. If, in addition to all the arguments I have adduced, you take my personal feelings into account, I find it difficult to doubt that you will gladly respond to the call which now reaches you from so exalted and so friendly a source.

"Till then, receive the assurances of my undying friendship.

"BRAGADINO."

"Postscript. Immediately upon receipt of your acceptance, it will be a pleasure to me to send you a remittance of two hundred lire through the banking firm of Valori in Mantua. The sum is to defray the cost of your journey.

"B."

Long after Casanova had finished reading the letter, he stood holding the paper so as to conceal the deathly pallor of his countenance. From the dining-table came a continuous noise, the rattle of plates and the clinking of glasses; but conversation had entirely ceased. At length Amalia ventured to say: "The food is getting cold, Chevalier; won't you go on with your meal?"

"You must excuse me," replied Casanova, letting his face be seen once more, for by now, owing to his extraordinary self-control, he had regained outward composure. "I have just received the best possible news from Venice, and I must reply instantly. With your leave, I will go to my room."

"Suit yourself, Chevalier," said Olivo. "But do not forget that our card party begins in an hour."

In the turret chamber Casanova sank into a chair. A chill sweat broke out over his body; he shivered as if in the cold stage of a fever; he was seized with such nausea that he felt as if he were about to choke. For a time he was unable to think clearly, and he could do no more than devote his energies to the task of self-restraint without quite knowing why he did so. But there was no one in the house upon whom he could vent his fury; and he could not fail to realize the utter absurdity of a half-formed idea that Marcolina must be in some way contributory to the intolerable shame which had been put upon him.

As soon as he was in some degree once more master of himself, his first thought was to take revenge upon the scoundrels who had believed that he could be hired as a police spy. He would return to Venice in disguise, and would exert all his cunning to compass the death of these wretches — or at least of whomever it was that had conceived the despicable design.

Was Bragadino the prime culprit? Why not? An old man so lost to all sense of shame that he had dared to write such a letter to Casanova; a dotard who could actually believe that Casanova, whom he had personally known, would set his hand to this ignominious task. He no longer knew Casanova! Nor did anyone know him, in Venice or elsewhere. But people should learn to know him once more.

It was true that he was no longer young enough or handsome enough to seduce an honest girl. Nor did he now possess the skill and the agility requisite for an escape from prison, or for gymnastic feats upon the roof-tops. But in spite of his age, he was cleverer than anyone else! Once back in Venice, he could do anything he pleased. The first step, the essential step, was to get back. Perhaps it would not be necessary to kill anyone. There were other kinds of revenge, grimmer, more devilish, than a commonplace murder. If he were to feign acceptance of the Council's proposal, it would be the easiest thing in the world to compass the destruction of those whom he wished to destroy, instead of bringing about the ruin of those whom the authorities had in mind, and who were doubtless the finest fellows among all the inhabitants of Venice! Monstrous! Because they were the enemies of this infamous government, because they were reputed heretics, were they to languish in The Leads where he had languished twenty-five years ago, or were they to perish under the executioner's axe? He detested the government a hundred times more than they did, and with better reason. He had been a lifelong heretic; was a heretic to-day, upon sincerer conviction than them all. What a queer comedy he had been playing of late years — simply from tedium and disgust. He to believe in God? What sort of a God was it who was gracious only to the young, and left the old in the lurch? A God who, when the fancy took him, became a devil; who transformed wealth into poverty, fortune into misfortune, happiness into despair. "You play with us — and we are to worship you? To doubt your existence is the only resource left open to us if we are not to blaspheme you! You do not exist; for if you did exist, I should curse you!"

Shaking his clenched fists heavenward, he rose to his feet. Involuntarily, a detested name rose to his lips. Voltaire! Yes, now he was in the right mood to finish his polemic against the sage of Ferney. To finish it? No, now was the time to begin it. A new one! A different one! One in which the ridiculous old fool should be shown up as he deserved: for his pusillanimity, his half-heartedness, his subservience. He an unbeliever? A man of whom the latest news was that he was on excellent terms with the priests, that he visited church, and on feast days actually went to confession! He a heretic? He was a chatterbox, a boastful coward, nothing more! But the day of reckoning was at hand, and soon there would be nothing left of the great philosopher but a quill-driving buffoon.

What airs he had given himself, this worthy M. Voltaire! "My dear M. Casanova, I am really vexed with you. What concern have I with the works of Merlin? It is your fault that I have wasted four hours over such nonsense."

All a matter of taste, excellent M. Voltaire! People will continue to read Merlin long after La Pucelle has been forgotten. Possibly they will continue to prize my sonnets, the sonnets you returned to me with a shameless smile, and without saying a word about them. But these are trifles. Do not let us spoil a great opportunity because of our sensitiveness as authors. We are concerned with philosophy — with God! We shall cross swords, M. Voltaire, unless you die before I have a chance to deal with you.

He was already in the mind to begin his new polemic, when it occurred to him that the messenger was waiting for an answer. He hastily indited a letter to the old duffer Bragadino, a letter full of hypocritical humility and simulated delight. With joy and gratitude he accepted the pardon of the Council. He would expect the remittance by return of post, so that with all possible speed he might present himself before his patrons, and above all before the honored old family friend, Bragadino.

When he was in the act of sealing the letter, someone knocked gently at the door. At the word, Olivo's eldest daughter, the thirteen-year-old Teresina, entered, to tell him that the whole company was assembled below, and that the Chevalier was impatiently awaited at the card table. Her eyes gleamed strangely; her cheeks were flushed; her thick, black hair lay loose upon her temples; her little mouth was half open.

"Have you been drinking wine, Teresina?" asked Casanova striding towards her.

"Yes. How did you know?" She blushed deeper, and in her embarrassment she moistened her lips with her tongue.

Casanova seized her by the shoulders, and, breathing in her face, drew her to the bed. She looked at him with great helpless eyes in which the light was now extinguished. But when she opened her mouth as if to scream, Casanova's aspect was so menacing that she was almost paralyzed with fear, and let him do whatever he pleased.

He kissed her with a tender fierceness, whispering: "You must not tell the Abbate anything about this, Teresina, not even in confession. Some day, when you have a lover or a husband, there is no reason why he should know anything about it. You should always keep your own counsel. Never tell the truth to your father, your mother, or your sisters, that it may be well with you on earth. Mark my words." As he spoke thus blasphemously, Teresina seemed to regard his utterance as a pious admonition, for she seized his hand and kissed it reverently as if it had been a priest's.

He laughed. "Come," he said, "come, little wife, we will walk arm in arm into the room downstairs!"

She seemed a little coy at first, but smiled with genuine gratification.

It was high time for them to go down, for they met Olivo coming up. He was flushed and wore a frown, so that Casanova promptly inferred that the Marchese or the Abbate had roused his suspicions by some coarse jest concerning Teresina's prolonged absence. His brow cleared when he beheld Casanova on the threshold, standing arm in arm with the girl as if in sport.

"I'm sorry to have kept you all waiting, Olivo," said Casanova. "I had to finish my letter." He held the missive out to Olivo in proof of his words.

"Take it," said Olivo to Teresina, smoothing her rumpled hair. "Hand it to the messenger."

"Here are two gold pieces for the man," added Casanova. "He must bestir himself, so that the letter may leave Mantua for Venice to-day. And ask him to tell my hostess at the inn that I shall return this evening."

"This evening?" exclaimed Olivo. "Impossible!"

"Oh, well, we'll see," observed Casanova affably. "Here, Teresina, take this, a gold piece for yourself." When Olivo demurred, Casanova added: "Put it in your moneybox, Teresina. That letter is worth any amount of gold pieces!"

Teresina tripped away, and Casanova nodded to himself contentedly. In days gone by he had possessed the girl's mother and grandmother also, and he thought it a particularly good joke that he was paying the little wench for her favors under the very eyes of her father.

CHAPTER SEVEN.

WHEN CASANOVA ENTERED the hall with Olivo, cards had already begun. He acknowledged with serene dignity the effusive greeting of the company, and took his place opposite the Marchese, who was banker. The windows into the garden were open. Casanova heard voices outside; Marcolina and Amalia strolled by, glanced into the room for a moment, and then disappeared.

While the Marchese was dealing, Lorenzi turned to Casanova with ceremonious politeness, saying: "My compliments, Chevalier. You were better informed than I. My regiment is under orders to march tomorrow afternoon."

The Marchese looked surprised. "Why did you not tell us sooner, Lorenzi?"

"The matter did not seem of such supreme importance."

"It is of no great importance to me," said the Marchese. "But don't you think it is of considerable importance to my wife?" He laughed raucously. "As a matter of fact, I have some interest in the matter myself. You won four hundred ducats from me yesterday, and there is not much time left in which to win them back."

"The Lieutenant won money from us too," said the younger Ricardi. The elder, silent as usual, looked over his shoulder at his brother, who stood behind the elder's chair as on the previous day.

"Luck and women....." began the Abbate.

The Marchese finished the sentence for him: "....cannot be constrained."

Lorenzi carelessly scattered his gold on the table. "There you are. I will stake it all upon a single card, if you like, Marchese, so that you need not wait for your money."

Casanova suddenly became aware of a feeling of compassion for Lorenzi, a feeling he was puzzled to account for. But he believed himself to be endowed with second-sight, and he had a premonition that the Lieutenant would fall in his first encounter.

The Marchese did not accept the suggestion of high stakes, nor did Lorenzi insist. They resumed the game, therefore, much as on the previous night, everyone taking a hand at first, and only moderate sums being ventured. A quarter of an hour later, however, the stakes began to rise, and ere long Lorenzi had lost his four hundred ducats to the Marchese.

Casanova had no constancy either in luck or ill-luck. He won, lost, and won again, in an almost ludicrously regular alternation.

Lorenzi drew a breath of relief when his last gold piece had gone the way of the others. Rising from the table, he said: "I thank you, gentlemen. This," he hesitated for a moment, "this will prove to have been my last game for a long time in your hospitable house. If you will allow me, Signor Olivo, I will take leave of the ladies before riding into town. I must reach Mantua ere nightfall in order to make preparations for to-morrow."

"Shameless liar," thought Casanova. "You will return here to-night, to Marcolina's arms!" Rage flamed up in him anew.

"What!" exclaimed the Marchese maliciously. "The evening will not come for hours. Is the game to stop so early? If you like, Lorenzi, my coachman shall drive home with a message to the Marchesa to let her know that you will be late."

"I am going to ride to Mantua," rejoined Lorenzi impatiently. The Marchese, ignoring this statement, went on: “There is still plenty of time. Put up some of your own money, if it be but a single gold piece.” He dealt Lorenzi a card.

“I have not a single gold piece left,” said Lorenzi wearily.

“Really?”

“Not one,” asserted Lorenzi, as if tired of the whole matter.

“Never mind,” said the Marchese, with a sudden assumption of amiability which was far from congenial. “I will trust you as far as ten ducats goes, or even for a larger sum if needs must.”

“All right, a ducat, then,” said Lorenzi, taking up the card dealt to him.

The Marchese won. Lorenzi went on with the game, as if this were now a matter of course, and was soon in the Marchese’s debt to the amount of one hundred ducats.

At this stage Casanova became banker, and had even better luck than the Marchese. There remained only three players. To-day the brothers Ricardi stood aside without complaint. Olivo and the Abbate were merely interested onlookers.

No one uttered a syllable. Only the cards spoke, and they spoke in unmistakable terms. By the hazard of fortune all the cash found its way to Casanova. In an hour he had won two thousand ducats; he had won them from Lorenzi, though they came out of the pockets of the Marchese, who at length sat there without a soldo.

Casanova offered him whatever gold pieces he might need. The Marchese shook his head. “Thanks,” he said, “I have had enough. The game is over as far as I am concerned.”

From the garden came the laughing voices of the girls. Casanova heard Teresina’s voice in particular, but he was sitting with his back to the window and did not turn round. He tried once more to persuade the Marchese to resume the game — for the sake of Lorenzi, though he hardly knew what moved him. The Marchese refused with a yet more decisive headshake.

Lorenzi rose, saying: “I shall have the honor, Signor Marchese, of handing the amount I owe you to you personally, before noon to-morrow.”

The Marchese laughed drily. “I am curious to know how you will manage that, Lieutenant Lorenzi. There is not a soul, in Mantua or elsewhere, who would lend you as much as ten ducats, not to speak of two thousand, especially to-day. For to-morrow you will be on the march, and who can tell whether you will ever return?”

“I give you my word of honor, Signor Marchese, that you shall have the money at eight o’clock to-morrow morning.”

“Your word of honor,” said the Marchese, “is not worth a single ducat to me, let alone two thousand.”

The others held their breath. Lorenzi, apparently unmoved, merely answered: “You will give me satisfaction, Signor Marchese.”

“With pleasure, Signor Lieutenant,” rejoined the Marchese, “as soon as you have paid your debt.”

Olivo, who was profoundly distressed, here intervened, stammering slightly: “I stand surety for the amount, Signor Marchese. Unfortunately I have not sufficient ready money on the spot; but there is the house, the estate.....” He closed the sentence with an awkward wave of the hand.

“I refuse to accept your surety, for your own sake,” said the Marchese. “You would lose your money.”

Casanova saw that all eyes were turned towards the gold that lay on the table before him. “What if I were to stand surety for Lorenzi,” he thought. “What if I were to pay the debt for him? The Marchese could not refuse my offer. I almost think I ought to do it. It was the Marchese’s money.”

But he said not a word. He felt that a plan was taking shape hi his mind, and that above all he needed time in which he might become clear as to its details.

“You shall have the money this evening, before nightfall,” said Lorenzi. “I shall be in Mantua in an hour.”

“Your horse may break its neck,” replied the Marchese. “You too; intentionally, perhaps.”

“Anyhow,” said the Abbate indignantly, “the Lieutenant cannot get the money here by magic.”

The two Ricardis laughed; but instantly restrained their mirth.

Olivo once more addressed the Marchese. “It is plain that you must grant Lieutenant Lorenzi leave to depart.”

“Yes, if he gives me a pledge,” exclaimed the Marchese with flashing eyes, as if this idea gave him peculiar delight.

“That seems rather a good plan,” said Casanova, a little absent-mindedly, for his scheme was ripening.

Lorenzi drew a ring from his finger and flicked it across the table.

The Marchese took it up, saying: “That is good for a thousand.”

“What about this one?” Lorenzi threw down another ring in front of the Marchese.

The latter nodded, saying: “That is good for the same amount.”

“Are you satisfied now, Signor Marchese?” enquired Lorenzi, moving as if to go.

“I am satisfied,” answered the Marchese, with an evil chuckle; “all the more, seeing that the rings are stolen.”

Lorenzi turned sharply, clenching his fist as if about to strike the Marchese. Olivo and the Abbate seized Lorenzi’s arm.

“I know both the stones, though they have been reset,” said the Marchese without moving from his place. “Look, gentlemen, the emerald is slightly flawed, or it would be worth ten times the amount. The ruby is flawless, but it is not a large one. Both the stones come from a set of jewels which I once gave my wife. And, since it is quite impossible for me to suppose that the Marchesa had them reset in rings for Lieutenant Lorenzi, it is obvious that they have been stolen — that the whole set has been stolen. Well, well, the pledge suffices, Signor Lieutenant, for the nonce.”

“Lorenzi!” cried Olivo, “we all give you our word that no one shall ever hear a syllable from us about what has just happened.”

“And whatever Signor Lorenzi may have done,” said Casanova, “you, Signor Marchese, are the greater rascal of the two.”

“I hope so,” replied the Marchese. “When anyone is as old as we are, Chevalier de Seingalt, assuredly he should not need lessons in rascality. Good-evening, gentlemen.”

He rose to his feet. No one responded to his farewell, and he went out.

For a space the silence was so intense, that once again the girls’ laughter was heard from the garden, now seeming unduly loud.

Who would have ventured to utter the word that was searing Lorenzi’s soul, as he stood at the table with his arm still raised? Casanova, the only one of the company who had remained seated, derived an involuntary artistic pleasure from the contemplation of this fine, threatening gesture, meaningless now, but seemingly petrified, as if the young man had been transformed into a statue.

At length Olivo turned to him with a soothing air; the Ricardis, too, drew near; and the Abbate appeared to be working himself up for a speech. But a sort of shiver passed over Lorenzi’s frame. Automatically but insistently he silently indicated his rejection of any offers at intervention. Then, with a polite inclination of the head, he quietly left the room.

Casanova, who had meanwhile wrapped up the money in a silken kerchief, instantly followed. Without looking at the others’ faces, he could feel that they were convinced it was his instant intention to do what they had all the while been expecting, namely, to place his winnings at Lorenzi’s disposal.

CHAPTER EIGHT.

CASANOVA OVERTOOK LORENZI in the chestnut avenue. Speaking lightly, he said: "May I have the pleasure of accompanying you on your walk, Lieutenant Lorenzi?"

Lorenzi, without looking at him, answered in an arrogant tone which seemed hardly in keeping with his situation: "As you please, Chevalier; but I am afraid you will not find me an amusing companion."

"Perhaps, Lieutenant, you will on the other hand find me an entertaining companion. If you have no objection, let us take the path through the vineyard, where our conversation will be undisturbed."

They turned aside from the high-road into the narrow footway running beside the garden wall, along which Casanova had walked with Olivo on the previous day.

"You are right in supposing," began Casanova, "that I have it in mind to offer you the sum of money which you owe to the Marchese. Not as a loan. That, if you will excuse my saying so, seems to me rather too risky a venture. I could let you have it as a slight return for a service which I think you may be able to do me."

"Go on," said Lorenzi coldly.

"Before I say any more," answered Casanova, in a similar tone, "I must make a condition upon your acceptance of which the continuance of this conversation depends."

"Name your condition."

"Give me your word of honor that you will listen to me without interruption, even though what I have to say may arouse your displeasure or your wrath. When you have heard me to the end, it will rest entirely with yourself whether you accept a proposal which, I am well aware, is of an extremely unusual nature. But I want you to answer it with a simple Yes or No. Whatever the issue, no one is to hear a word concerning what passes at this interview between two men of honor, who are perhaps no better than they should be."

"I am ready to listen to your proposal."

"You accept my condition?"

"I will not interrupt you."

"And you will answer nothing beyond Yes or No?"

"Nothing beyond Yes or No."

"Very well," said Casanova. They walked slowly up the hill, between the vine stocks, in the sultry heat of the late afternoon. Casanova began to speak: "We shall perhaps understand one another best if we discuss the matter logically. It is obvious that you have absolutely no chance of obtaining the money you owe the Marchese within the prescribed time. There can be no doubt that he has made up his mind to ruin you should you fail to pay. Since he knows more of you than he actually disclosed to us to-day" — Casanova was venturing beyond the limits of his own knowledge, but he loved to take these little risks when following up a path decided on in advance— "you are absolutely in the power of the old ruffian, and your fate as an officer and a gentleman would be sealed. There you have one side of the question. On the other hand, you will be saved as soon as you have paid your debt, and as soon as you get back those rings — however you may have come by them. This will mean the recovery of an existence which is otherwise practically closed. Since you are young, handsome, and bold, it will mean the recovery of an existence which offers splendor, happiness, and renown. This appears to me a most attractive prospect; especially seeing that the only alternative is an inglorious, nay, a shameful ruin; for such a prospect, I should be willing to sacrifice a prejudice which I had never really possessed. I am well aware, Lorenzi," he added quickly, as if expecting contradiction and desiring to forestall it, “I am well aware, that you have no more prejudices than I have or ever had. What I am going to ask of you is merely what I should in your place under like circumstances be willing to do, without a moment’s hesitation. Indeed, I have never hesitated, at the call of destiny or as the outcome of caprice, to commit a rascality, or rather, that to which fools give such a name. Like you, Lorenzi, I have ever been ready to hazard my life for less than nothing, and to call it quits. I am ready to do so now, if my proposal prove inacceptable. We are made of the same stuff, you and I; we are brothers in spirit; we may therefore disclose our souls to one another without false shame, proud in our nakedness. Here are my two thousand ducats. Call them yours, if you enable me to spend to-night in your place with Marcolina. — Let us not stand still, if you please, Lorenzi. Let us continue our walk.” They walked through the fields, beneath the fruit trees, between which the vines, heavy with grape-clusters, were trellised. Casanova went on without a pause: “Don’t answer me yet, Lorenzi, for I have not finished. My request would naturally be, if not monstrous, at least preposterous, if it were your intention to make Marcolina your wife, or if Marcolina’s own hopes or wishes turned in this direction. But just as last night was your first night spent in love together” — he uttered this guess as if he had absolute knowledge of the fact— “so also was the ensuing night predestined, according to all human calculation, according to your own expectations and Marcolina’s, to be your last night together for a long period and probably for ever. I am absolutely convinced that Marcolina herself, in order to save her lover from certain destruction, and simply upon his wish, would be perfectly willing to give this one night to his savior. For she, too, is a philosopher, and is therefore just as free from prejudices as we are. Nevertheless, certain as I am that she would meet the test, I am far from intending that it should be imposed upon her. To possess a woman outwardly passive but inwardly resistant, would be far from satisfying my desires, least of all in the present case. I wish, not merely as a lover, but also as one beloved, to taste a rapture which I should be prepared to pay for with my life. Understand this clearly, Lorenzi. For the reason I have explained, Marcolina must not for an instant suspect that I am the man whom she is clasping to her sweet bosom; she must be firmly convinced that you are in her arms. It is your part to pave the way for this deception; mine to maintain it. You will not have much difficulty in making her understand that you will have to leave her before dawn. Nor need you be at a loss for a pretext as to the necessity for perfectly mute caresses when you return at night, as you will promise to return. To avert all danger of discovery at the last moment, I shall, when the time comes for me to leave, act as if I heard a suspicious noise outside the window. Seizing my cloak, — or rather yours, which you must of course lend me for the occasion — I shall vanish through the window, never to return. For, of course, I shall take my leave this evening. But half-way back to Mantua, telling the coachman that I have forgotten some important papers, I shall return here on foot. Entering the garden by the side door (you must give me the master-key), I shall creep to Marcolina’s window, which must be opened for me at midnight. I shall have taken off my clothes in the carriage, even to my shoes and stockings, and shall wear only your cloak, so that when I take to flight nothing will be left to betray either you or me. The cloak and the two thousand ducats will be at your disposal at five o’clock to-morrow morning in the inn at Mantua, so that you may deliver over the money to the Marchese even before the appointed hour. I pledge my solemn oath to fulfil my side of the bargain. I have finished.”

Suddenly he stood still. The sun was near to setting. A gentle breeze made the yellow ears rustle; the tower of Olivo’s house glowed red in the evening light. Lorenzi, too, halted. His pale face was motionless, as he gazed into vacancy over Casanova’s shoulder. His arms hung limp by his sides, whereas Casanova’s hand, ready for any emergency, rested as if by chance upon the hilt of his sword. A few seconds elapsed, and Lorenzi was still silent. He seemed immersed in tranquil thought, but Casanova remained on the alert, holding the kerchief with the ducats in his left hand, but keeping the right upon his sword-hilt. He spoke once more.

“You have honorably fulfilled my conditions. I know that it has not been easy. For even though we may be free from prejudices, the atmosphere in which we live is so full of them that we cannot wholly escape their influence. And just as you, Lorenzi, during the last quarter of an hour, have more than once been on the point of seizing me by the throat; so I, I must confess, played for a time with the idea of giving you the two thousand ducats as to my friend. Rarely, Lorenzi, have I been so strangely drawn to anyone as I was to you from the first. But had I yielded to this generous impulse, the next moment I should have regretted it bitterly. In like manner you, Lorenzi, hi the moment before you blow your brains out, would desperately regret having been such a fool as to throw away a thousand nights of love with new and ever new women for one single night of love which neither night nor day was to follow.”

Lorenzi remained mute. His silence continued for many minutes, until Casanova began to ask himself how long his patience was to be tried. He was on the point of departing with a curt salutation, and of thus indicating that he understood his proposition to have been rejected, when Lorenzi, without a word slowly moved his right hand backwards into the tail-pocket of his coat. Casanova, ever on his guard, instantly stepped back a pace, and was ready to duck. Lorenzi handed him the key of the garden door.

Casanova’s movement, which had certainly betokened fear, brought to Lorenzi’s lips the flicker of a contemptuous smile. Casanova was able to repress all sign of his rising anger, for he knew that had he given way to it he might have ruined his design. Taking the key with a nod, he merely said: “No doubt that means Yes. In an hour from now — an hour will suffice for your understanding with Marcolina — I shall expect you in the turret chamber. There, in exchange for your cloak, I shall have the pleasure of handing you the two thousand gold pieces without further delay. First of all, as a token of confidence; and secondly because I really do not know what I should do with the money during the night.”

They parted without further formality. Lorenzi returned to the house by the path along which they had both come. Casanova made his way to the village by a different route. At the inn there, by paying a considerable sum as earnest money, he was able to arrange for a carriage to await him at ten o’clock that evening for the drive from Olivo’s house into Mantua.

CHAPTER NINE.

RETURNING TO THE house, Casanova disposed of his gold in a safe corner of the turret chamber. Thence he descended to the garden, where a spectacle awaited him, not in itself remarkable, but one which touched him strangely in his present mood. Upon a bench at the edge of the greensward Olivo was sitting beside Amalia, his arm round her waist. Reclining at their feet were the three girls, tired out by the afternoon's play. Maria, the youngest, had her head in her mother's lap, and seemed to be asleep; Nanetta lay at full length on the grass with her head pillowed on her arm; Teresina was leaning against her father's knee, and he was stroking her hair. As Casanova drew near, Teresina greeted him, not with the look of lascivious understanding which he had involuntarily expected, but with a frank smile of childlike confidence, as if what had passed between them only a few hours before had been nothing more than some trivial pastime. Olivo's face lighted up in friendly fashion, and Amalia nodded a cordial greeting. It was plain to Casanova that they were receiving him as one who had just performed a generous deed, but who would prefer, from a sense of refinement, that no allusion should be made to the matter.

"Are you really determined to leave us tomorrow, Chevalier?" enquired Olivo.

"Not to-morrow," answered Casanova, "but, as I told you, this very evening."

Olivo would fain have renewed his protests, but Casanova shrugged, saying in a tone of regret: "Unfortunately, my letter from Venice leaves me no option. The summons sent to me is so honorable in every respect that to delay my return home would be an unpardonable affront to my distinguished patrons." He asked his host and hostess to excuse him for a brief space. He would go to his room, make all ready for departure, and would then be able to enjoy the last hours of his stay undisturbed in his dear friends' company.

Disregarding further entreaties, he went to the turret chamber, and first of all changed his attire, since the simpler suit must suffice for the journey. He then packed his valise, and listened for Lorenzi's footsteps with an interest which grew keener from moment to moment. Before the time was up, Lorenzi, knocking once at the door, entered, wearing a dark blue riding-cloak. Without a word, he slipped the cloak from his shoulders and let it fall to the floor, where it lay between the two men, a shapeless mass of cloth. Casanova withdrew his kerchief filled with the gold pieces from beneath the bolster, and emptied the money on the table. He counted the coins under Lorenzi's eyes — a process which was soon over, for many of the gold pieces were worth several ducats each. Putting the stipulated sum into two purses, he handed these to Lorenzi. This left about a hundred ducats for himself. Lorenzi stuffed the purses into his tail-pockets, and was about to leave, still silent.

"Wait a moment, Lorenzi," said Casanova. "Our paths in life may cross once again. If so let us meet as friends. We have made a bargain like many another bargain; let us cry quits."

Casanova held out his hand. Lorenzi would not take it. He spoke for the first time. "I cannot recall that anything was said about this in our agreement." Turning on his heel he left the room. "Do we stand so strictly upon the letter, my friend?" thought Casanova. "It behooves me all the more to see to it that I am not duped in the end." In truth, he had given no serious thought to this possibility. He knew from personal experience that such men as Lorenzi have their own peculiar code of honor, a code which cannot be written in formal propositions, but which they can be relied upon to observe.

He packed Lorenzi's cloak in the top of the valise. Having stowed away upon his person the remaining gold pieces, he took a final glance round the room which he was never likely to revisit. Then with sword and hat, ready for the journey, he made his way to the hall, where he found Olivo, Amalia, and the children already seated at table. At the same instant, Marcolina entered by the garden door. The coincidence was interpreted by Casanova as a propitious sign. She answered his salutation with a frank inclination of the head.

Supper was now served. The conversation dragged a little at first, as if all were oppressed by the thought of the imminent leave-taking. Amalia seemed busied with her girls, concerned to see that they were not helped to too much or too little. Olivo, somewhat irrelevantly, began to speak of a trifling lawsuit he had just won against a neighboring landowner. Next he referred to a business journey to Mantua and Cremona, which he would shortly have to undertake. Casanova expressed the hope that ere long he would be able to entertain his friend in Venice, a city which, by a strange chance, Olivo had never visited. Amalia had seen the place of wonder as a child. She could not recall the journey thither, but could only remember having seen an old man wrapped in a scarlet cloak, disembarking from a long black boat. He had stumbled and had fallen prone.

"Have you never been to Venice either?" asked Casanova of Marcolina, who was seated facing him, so that she could see over his shoulder into the deep gloom of the garden. She shook her head. Casanova mused: "If I could but show you the city in which I passed my youth! Had you but been young with me!" Another thought, as foolish as both of these, crossed his mind: "Even now, if I could but take you there with me."

While thus thinking, at the same time, with the ease of manner peculiar to him in moments of great excitement, he began to speak of his native city. At first his language was cool; he used an artist's touch, as if painting a picture. Warming up by degrees, he entered into details of personal history, so that of a sudden his own figure appeared in the centre of the canvas, filling it with life. He spoke of his mother, the celebrated actress, for whom her admirer Goldoni had written his admirable comedy, La Pupilla. Next he recounted the unhappy days spent in Dr. Gozzi's boarding school. Then he spoke of his childish passion for the gardener's little daughter, who had subsequently run away with a lackey; of his first sermon as a young abbate, after which he found in the offertory bag, in addition to the usual collection, a number of love letters; of his doings as a fiddler in the orchestra of the San Samueli Theatre; of the pranks which he and his companions had played in the alleys, taverns, dancing halls, and gaming-houses of Venice — sometimes masked and sometimes unmasked. In telling the story of these riotous escapades, he was careful to avoid the use of any offensive epithet. He phrased his narrative in choice imaginative language, as if paying due regard to the presence of the young girls, who, like their elders, including Marcolina, listened with rapt attention. The hour grew late, and Amalia sent her daughters to bed. They all kissed Casanova a tender good-night, Teresina behaving exactly like her sisters. He made them promise that they would soon come with their father and mother to visit him in Venice. When they had gone, he spoke with less restraint, but continued to avoid any unsuitable innuendo or display of vanity. His audience might have imagined themselves listening to the story of a Parsifal rather than to that of a Casanova, the dangerous seducer and half-savage adventurer.

He told them of the fair Unknown who had travelled with him for weeks disguised as a man in officer's uniform, and one morning had suddenly disappeared from his side; of the daughter of the gentleman cobbler in Madrid who, in the intervals between their embraces, had studiously endeavored to make a good Catholic of him; of Lia, the lovely Jewess of Turin, who had a better seat on horseback than any princess; of Manon Balletti, sweet and innocent, the only woman he had almost married; of the singer whom he had hissed in Warsaw because of her bad performance, whereupon he had had to fight a duel with her lover, General Branitzky, and had been compelled to flee the city; of the wicked woman Charpillon, who had made such an abject fool of him in London; of the night when he crossed the lagoons to Murano on the way to his adored nun, the night when he nearly lost his life in a storm; of Croce the gamester, who, after losing a fortune at Spa, had taken a tearful farewell of Casanova upon the high-road, and had set off on his way to St. Petersburg, just as he was, wearing silk stockings and a coat of apple-green satin, and carrying nothing but a walking cane.

He told of actresses, singers, dressmakers, countesses, dancers, chambermaids; of gamblers, officers, princes, envoys, financiers, musicians, and adventurers. So carried away was he by the rediscovered charm of his own past, so completely did the triumph of these splendid though irrecoverable experiences eclipse the consciousness of the shadows that encompassed his present, that he was on the point of telling the story of a pale but pretty girl who in a twilit church at Mantua had confided her love troubles to him — absolutely forgetting that this same girl, sixteen years older, now sat at the table before him as the wife of his friend Olivo — when the maid came in to say that the carriage was waiting. Instantly, with his incomparable talent for doing the right thing, Casanova rose to bid adieu. He again pressed Olivo, who was too much affected to speak, to bring wife and children to visit him in Venice. Having embraced his friend, he approached Amalia with intent to embrace her also, but she held out her hand and he kissed it affectionately.

When he turned to Marcolina, she said: "You ought to write down everything you told us this evening, Chevalier, and a great deal more, just as you have penned the story of your flight from The Leads."

"Do you really mean that, Marcolina?" he enquired, with the shyness of a young author.

She smiled with gentle mockery, saying: "I fancy such a book might prove far more entertaining than your polemic against Voltaire."

"Very likely," he thought. "Perhaps I may follow your advice some day. If so, you, Marcolina, shall be the theme of the last chapter."

This notion, and still more the thought that the last chapter was to be lived through that very night, made his face light up so strangely that Marcolina, who had given him her hand in farewell, drew it away again before he could stoop to kiss it. Without betraying either disappointment or anger, Casanova turned to depart, after signifying, with one of those simple gestures of which he was a master, his desire that no one, not even Olivo, should follow him.

He strode rapidly through the chestnut avenue, handed a gold piece to the maid who had brought his valise to the carriage, took his seat and drove away.

The sky was overcast. In the village, lamps were still burning in some of the cottages; but by the time the carriage regained the open road, the only light piercing the darkness was supplied by the yellow rays of the lantern dangling from the shaft. Casanova opened the valise, took out Lorenzi's cloak, flung it over his shoulders, and under this cover rapidly undressed. He packed the discarded clothing, together with shoes and stockings, in the valise, and wrapped himself in the cloak. Then he called to the coachman:

"Stop, we must drive back!"

The coachman turned heavily hi his seat.

"I have left some of my papers in the house. Don't you understand? We must drive back."

When the coachman, a surly, thin greybeard, still hesitated, Casanova said: "Of course I will pay you extra for your trouble. Here you are!" He pressed a gold piece into the man's hand.

The coachman nodded, muttered something, gave his horse a needless cut with the whip, and turned the carriage round. When they drove back through the village, all the houses were dark. A little farther on, the coachman was about to turn into the by-road leading up the gentle ascent to Olivo's house.

"Halt!" cried Casanova. "We won't drive any nearer, lest we should wake them all up. Wait for me here at the corner. I shall be back in a minute or two. If I should happen to keep you longer, you shall have a ducat for every hour!"

The man by his nod seemed to show he understood what was afoot.

Casanova descended and made quickly past the closed door and along the wall to the corner. Here began the path leading through the vineyards. It still led along the wall. Having walked it twice by daylight, Casanova had no difficulty in the dark. Half way up the hill came a second angle in the wall. Here he had again to turn to the right, across soft meadow-land, and in the pitchy night had to feel along the wall until he found the garden door. At length his fingers recognized the change from smooth stone to rough wood, and he could easily make out the framework of the narrow door. He unlocked it, entered the garden, and made all fast again behind him.

Across the greensward he could now discern house and tower. They seemed incredibly far off and yet incredibly large. He stood where he was for a while, looking around. What to other eyes would have been impenetrable darkness, was to him no more than deep twilight. The gravel path being painful to his bare feet, he walked upon the greensward, where, moreover, his footfall made no sound. So light was his tread that he felt as if soaring.

"Has my mood changed," he thought, "since those days when, as a man of thirty, I sought such adventures? Do I not now, as then, feel all the ardors of desire and all the sap of youth course through my veins? Am I not, as of old, Casanova? Being Casanova, why should I be subject, as others are subject, to the pitiful law which is called age!"

Growing bolder, he asked himself: "Why am I creeping in disguise to Marcolina? Is not Casanova a better man than Lorenzi, even though he be thirty years older? Is not she the one woman who would have understood the incomprehensible? Was it needful to commit this lesser rascality, and to mislead another man into the commission of a greater rascality? Should I not, with a little patience, have reached the same goal? Lorenzi would in any case have gone to-morrow, whilst I should have remained. Five days, three days, and she would have given herself to me, knowing me to be Casanova."

He stood close to the wall of the house beneath Marcolina's window, which was still closed. His thoughts ran on: "Is it too late? I could come back to-morrow or the next day. Could begin the work of seduction — in honorable fashion, so to speak. To-night would be but a foretaste of the future. Marcolina must not learn that I have been here to-day — or not until much later."

CHAPTER TEN.

MARCOLINA'S WINDOW WAS still closed. There was no sign from within. It wanted a few minutes to midnight. Should he make his presence known in any way? By tapping gently at the window? Since nothing of this sort had been arranged, it might arouse Marcolina's suspicions. Better wait. It could not be much longer. The thought that she might instantly recognize him, might detect the fraud before he had achieved his purpose, crossed his mind — not for the first time, yet as a passing fancy, as a remote possibility which it was logical to take into account, but not anything to be seriously dreaded.

A ludicrous adventure now recurred to his mind. Twenty years ago he had spent a night with a middle-aged ugly vixen in Soleure, when he had imagined himself to be possessing a beautiful young woman whom he adored. He recalled how next day, in a shameless letter, she had derided him for the mistake that she had so greatly desired him to make and that she had compassed with such infamous cunning. He shuddered at the thought. It was the last thing he would have wished to think of just now, and he drove the detestable image from his mind.

It must be midnight! How long was he to stand shivering there? Waiting in vain, perhaps? Cheated, after all? Two thousand ducats for nothing. Lorenzi behind the curtain, mocking at the fool outside!

Involuntarily he gripped the hilt of the sword he carried beneath the cloak, pressed to his naked body. After all, with a fellow like Lorenzi one must be prepared for any tricks.

At that instant he heard a gentle rattling, and knew it was made by the grating of Marcolina's window hi opening. Then both wings of the window were drawn back, though the curtain still veiled the interior. Casanova remained motionless for a few seconds more, until the curtain was pulled aside by an unseen hand. Taking this as a sign, he swung himself over the sill into the room, and promptly closed window and grating behind him. The curtain had fallen across his shoulders, so that he had to push his way beneath it. Now he would have been in absolute darkness had there not been shining from the depths of the distance, incredibly far away, as if awakened by his own gaze, the faintest possible illumination to show him the way. No more than three paces forward, and eager arms enfolded him. Letting the sword slip from his hand, the cloak from his shoulders, he gave himself up to his bliss.

From Marcolina's sigh of surrender, from the tears of happiness which he kissed from her cheeks, from the ever-renewed warmth with which she received his caresses, he felt sure that she shared his rapture; and to him this rapture seemed more intense than he had ever experienced, seemed to possess a new and strange quality. Pleasure became worship; passion was transfused with an intense consciousness. Here at last was the reality which he had often falsely imagined himself to be on the point of attaining, and which had always eluded his grasp. He held in his arms a woman upon whom he could squander himself, with whom he could feel himself inexhaustible; the woman upon whose breast the moment of ultimate self-abandonment and of renewed desire seemed to coalesce into a single instant of hitherto unimagined spiritual ecstasy. Were not life and death, time and eternity, one upon these lips? Was he not a god? Were not youth and age merely a fable; visions of men's fancy? Were not home and exile, splendor and misery, renown and oblivion, senseless distinctions, fit only for the use of the uneasy, the lonely, the frustrate; had not the words become unmeaning to one who was Casanova, and who had found Marcolina?

More contemptible, more absurd, as the minutes passed, seemed to him the prospect of keeping the resolution which he had made when still pusillanimous, of acting on the determination to flee out of this night of miracle dumbly, unrecognized, like a thief. With the infallible conviction that he must be the bringer of delight even as he was the receiver of delight, he felt prepared for the venture of disclosing his name, even though he knew all the time that he would thus play for a great stake, the loss of which would involve the loss of his very existence. He was still shrouded in impenetrable darkness, and until the first glimmer of dawn made its way through the thick curtain, he could postpone a confession upon whose favorable acceptance by Marcolina his fate, nay his life, depended.

Besides, was not this mute, passionately sweet association the very thing to bind Marcolina to him more firmly with each kiss that they enjoyed? Would not the ineffable bliss of this night transmute into truth what had been conceived in falsehood? His duped mistress, woman of women, had she not already an inkling that it was not Lorenzi, the stripling, but Casanova, the man, with whom she was mingling in these divine ardors?

He began to deem it possible that he might be spared the so greatly desired and ‘yet so intensely dreaded moment of revelation. He fancied that Marcolina, thrilling, entranced, transfigured, would spontaneously whisper his name. Then, when she had forgiven him, he would take her with him that very hour. Together they would leave the house in the grey dawn; together they would seek the carriage that was waiting at the turn of the road; together they would drive away. She would be his for evermore. This would be the crown of his life; that at an age when others were doomed to a sad senility, he, by the overwhelming might of his unconquerable personality, would have won for himself the youngest, the most beautiful, the most gifted of women.

For this woman was his as no woman had ever been before. He glided with her through mysterious, narrow canals, between palaces in whose shadows he was once more at home, under high-arched bridges which blurred figures were swiftly crossing. Many of the wayfarers glanced down for a moment over the parapet, and vanished ere their faces could be discerned.

Now the gondola drew alongside. A marble stairway led up to the stately mansion of Senator Bragadino. It was the only palace holding festival. Masked guests were ascending and descending. Many of them paused with inquisitive glances; but who could recognize Casanova and Marcolina in their dominoes?

He entered the hall with her. Here was a great company playing for high stakes. All the senators, Bragadino among them, were seated round the table in their purple robes. As Casanova came through the door, they whispered his name as if terror-stricken, for the flashing of his eyes behind the mask had disclosed his identity. He did not sit down; he did not take any cards, and yet he joined in the game. He won. He won all the gold on the table, and this did not suffice. The senators had to give him notes of hand. They lost their possessions, their palaces, their purple robes; they were beggars; they crawled round him clad in rags, kissing his hands.

Nearby, in a hall with crimson hangings, there was music and dancing. Casanova wished to dance with Marcolina, but she had vanished. Once again the senators in their purple robes were seated at the table; but now Casanova knew that the hazards at stake were not those of a game of cards; he knew that the destinies of accused persons, some criminal and some innocent, hung in the balance.

What had become of Marcolina? Had he not been holding her by the hand all the time? He rushed down the staircase. The gondola was waiting. On, on, through the maze of canals. Of course the gondolier knew where Marcolina was; but why was he, too, masked? That had not been the custom of old in Venice. Casanova wished to question him, but was afraid. Does a man become so cowardly when he grows old?

Onward, ever onward. How huge Venice had grown during these five-and-twenty years! At length the houses came to an end; the canal opened out; they were passing between islands; there stood the walls of the Murano nunnery, to which Marcolina had fled.

There was no gondola now; he had to swim; how delightful! It was true that in Venice the children were playing with his gold pieces. But what was money to him? The water was now warm, now cold; it dripped from his clothing as he climbed over the wall.

"Where is Marcolina?" he enquired in the parlor, in loud, challenging tones such as only a prince would dare to use.

"I will summon her," said the Lady Abbess, and sank into the ground.

Casanova wandered about; he had wings; he fluttered to and fro along the gratings, fluttered like a bat. "If I had only known sooner that I can fly," he thought. "I will teach Marcolina."

Behind the gratings, the figures of women were moving hither and thither. They were nuns — and yet they were all wearing secular dress. He knew it, though he could not really see them. He knew who they were. Henriette the Unknown; Corticelli and Cristina, the dancers; the bride; Dubois the Beautiful; the accurst vixen of Soleure; Manon Balletti; a hundred others — but never Marcolina!

"You have betrayed me," he cried to the gondolier, who was waiting for him beneath. Never had he hated anyone as he hated this gondolier, and he swore to take an exquisite revenge.

But how foolish he had been to seek Marcolina in the Murano nunnery when she had gone to visit Voltaire. It was fortunate that he could fly, since he had no money left with which to pay for a carriage.

He swam away. But he was no longer enjoying himself. The water grew colder and colder; he was drifting out into the open sea, far from Murano, far from Venice, and there was no ship within sight; his heavy gold-embroidered garments were dragging him down; he tried to strip them off, but it was impossible, for he was holding his manuscript, the manuscript he had to give to M. Voltaire. The water was pouring into his mouth and nose; deadly fear seized him; he clutched at impalpable things; there was a rattling in his throat; he screamed; and with a great effort he opened his eyes.

Between the curtain and the window-frame the dawn was making its way through in a narrow strip of light. Marcolina, in her white nightdress and with hands crossed upon her bosom, was standing at the foot of the bed contemplating Casanova with unutterable horror. Her glance instantly recalled him to his senses. Involuntarily he stretched out his arms towards her with a gesture of appeal. Marcolina, as if rejecting this appeal, waved him away with her left hand, while with the right she continued to grasp her raiment convulsively. Casanova sat up, his eyes riveted upon her. Neither was able to look away from the other. His expression was one of rage and shame; hers was one of shame and disgust. Casanova knew how she saw him, for he saw himself figured in imagination, just as he had seen himself yesterday in the bedroom mirror. A yellow, evil face, deeply lined, with thin lips and staring eyes — a face three times worse than that of yesterday, because of the excesses of the night, the ghastly dream of the morning, and the terrible awakening. And what he read in Marcolina's countenance was not what he would a thousand times rather have read there; it was not thief, libertine, villain. He read only something which crushed him to earth more ignominiously than could any terms of abuse; he read the word which to him was the most dreadful of all words, since it passed a final judgment upon him — old man.

Had it been within his power to annihilate himself by a spell, he would have done so, that he might be spared from having to creep out of the bed and display himself to Marcolina in his nakedness, which must appear to her more loathsome than the sight of some loathsome beast.

But Marcolina, as if gradually collecting herself, and manifestly in order to give him the opportunity which was indispensable, turned her face to the wall. He seized the moment to get out of bed, to raise the cloak from the floor, and to wrap himself in it. He was quick, too, to make sure of his sword. Now, when he conceived himself to have at least escaped the worst contumely of all, that of ludicrousness, he began to wonder whether it would not be possible to throw another light upon this affair in which he cut so pitiful a figure. He was an adept in the use of language. Could he not somehow or other, by a few well-chosen words, give matters a favorable turn?

From the nature of the circumstances, it was evidently impossible for Marcolina to doubt that Lorenzi had sold her to Casanova. Yet however intensely she might hate her wretched lover at that moment, Casanova felt that he himself, the cowardly thief, must seem a thousand times more hateful.

Perhaps another course offered better promise of satisfaction. He might degrade Marcolina by mockery and lascivious phrases, full of innuendo. But this spiteful idea could not be sustained in face of the aspect she had now assumed. Her expression of horror had gradually been transformed into one of infinite sadness, as if it had been not Marcolina's womanhood alone which had been desecrated by Casanova, but as if during the night that had just closed a nameless and inexpiable offence had been committed by cunning against trust, by lust against love, by age against youth. Beneath this gaze which, to Casanova's extremest torment, reawakened for a brief space all that was still good in him, he turned away. Without looking round at Marcolina, he went to the window, drew the curtain aside, opened casement and grating, cast a glance round the garden which still seemed to slumber in the twilight, and swung himself across the sill into the open.

Aware of the possibility that someone in the house might already be awake and might spy him from a window, he avoided the greensward and sought cover in the shaded alley. Passing through the door in the wall, he had hardly closed it behind him, when someone blocked his path. "The gondolier!" was his first idea. For now he suddenly realized that the gondolier in his dream had been Lorenzi. The young officer stood before him. His silver-braided scarlet tunic glowed in the morning light.

"What a splendid uniform," was the thought that crossed Casanova's confused, weary brain. "It looks quite new. I am sure it has not been paid for." These trivial reflections helped him to the full recovery of his wits; and as soon as he realized the situation, his mind was filled with gladness. Drawing himself up proudly, and grasping the hilt of his sword firmly beneath the cloak, he said in a tone of the utmost amiability: "Does it not seem to you, Lieutenant Lorenzi, that this notion of yours has come a thought too late?"

"By no means," answered Lorenzi, looking handsomer than any man Casanova had ever seen before. "Only one of us two shall leave the place alive."

"What a hurry you are in, Lorenzi," said Casanova in an almost tender tone. "Cannot the affair rest until we reach Mantua? I shall be delighted to give you a lift in my carriage, which is waiting at the turn of the road. There is a great deal to be said for observing the forms in these matters, especially in such a case as ours."

"No forms are needed. You or I, Casanova, at this very hour." He drew his sword.

Casanova shrugged. "Just as you please, Lorenzi. But you might at least remember that I shall be reluctantly compelled to appear in a very inappropriate costume." He threw open the cloak and stood there nude, playing with the sword in his hand.

Hate welled up in Lorenzi's eyes. "You shall not be at any disadvantage," he said, and began to strip with all possible speed.

Casanova turned away, and for the moment wrapped himself in his cloak once more, for though the sun was already piercing the morning mists, the air was chill. Long shadows lay across the fields, cast by the sparse trees on the hill-top. For an instant Casanova wondered whether someone might not come down the path. Doubtless it was used only by Olivo and the members of his household. It occurred to Casanova that these were perhaps the last minutes of his life, and he was amazed at his own calmness.

"M. Voltaire is a lucky fellow," came as a passing thought. But in truth he had no interest in Voltaire, and he would have been glad at this supreme moment to have been able to call up pleasanter images than that of the old author's vulturine physiognomy. How strange it was that no birds were piping in the trees over the wall. A change of weather must be imminent. But what did the weather matter to him? He would rather think of Marcolina, of the ecstasy he had enjoyed in her arms, and for which he was now to pay dear. Dear? Cheap enough! A few years of an old man's life hi penury and obscurity. What was there left for him to do in the world? To poison Bragadino? Was it worth the trouble? Nothing was worth the trouble. How few trees there were on the hill! He began to count them. "Five... seven... ten. — Have I nothing better to do?"

"I am ready, Casanova."

Casanova turned smartly. Lorenzi stood before him, splendid in his nakedness like a young god. No trace of meanness lingered in his face. He seemed equally ready to kill or to die.

"What if I were to throw away my sword?" thought Casanova. "What if I were to embrace him?" He slipped the cloak from his shoulders and stood like Lorenzi, lean and naked.

Lorenzi lowered his point in salute, in accordance with the rules of fence. Casanova returned the salute. Next moment they crossed blades, and the steel glittered like silver in the sun.

"How long is it," thought Casanova, "since last I stood thus measuring sword with sword?" But none of his serious duels now recurred to his mind. He could think only of practice with the foils, such as ten years earlier he used to have every morning with his valet Costa, the rascal who afterwards bolted with a hundred and fifty thousand lire. "All the same, he was a fine fencer; nor has my hand forgotten its cunning! My arm is as true, my vision as keen, as ever..... Youth and age are fables. Am I not a god? Are we not both gods? If anyone could see us now. There are women who would pay a high price for the spectacle!"

The blades bent, the points sparkled; at each contact the rapiers sang softly in the morning air. "A fight? No, a fencing match! Why this look of horror, Marcolina? Are we not both worthy of your love? He is but a youngster; I am Casanova!"

Lorenzi sank to the ground, thrust through the heart. The sword fell from his grip. He opened his eyes wide, as if in utter astonishment. Once he raised his head for a moment, while his lips were fixed in a wry smile. Then the head fell back again, his nostrils dilated, there was a slight rattling in his throat, and he was dead.

Casanova bent over him, kneeled beside the body, saw a few drops of blood ooze from the wound, held his hand in front of Lorenzi's mouth — but the breath was stilled. A cold shiver passed through Casanova's frame. He rose and put on his cloak. Then, returning to the body, he glanced at the fallen youth, lying stark on the turf in incomparable beauty. The silence was broken by a soft rustling, as the morning breeze stirred the tree-tops.

"What shall I do?" Casanova asked himself. "Shall I summon aid? Olivo? Amalia? Marcolina? To what purpose? No one can bring him back to life."

He pondered with the calmness invariable to him in the most dangerous moments of his career. "It may be hours before anyone finds him; perhaps no one will come by before evening; perchance later still. That will give me time, and time is of the first importance."

He was still holding his sword. Noticing that it was bloody, he wiped it on the grass. He thought for a moment of dressing the corpse, but to do this would have involved the loss of precious and irrecoverable minutes. Paying the last duties, he bent once more and closed Lorenzi's eyes. "Lucky fellow," he murmured; and then, dreamily, he kissed the dead man's forehead.

He strode along beside the wall, turned the angle, and regained the road. The carriage was where he had left it, the coachman fast asleep on the box. Casanova was careful to avoid waking the man at first. Not until he had cautiously taken his seat did he call out: “Hullo, drive on, can’t you?” and prodded him in the back. The startled coachman looked round, greatly astonished to find that it was broad daylight. Then he whipped up his horse and drove off.

Casanova sat far back in the carriage, wrapped in the cloak which had once belonged to Lorenzi. In the village a few children were to be seen in the streets, but it was plain that the elders were already at work in the fields. When the houses had been left behind Casanova drew a long breath. Opening the valise, he withdrew his clothes, and dressed beneath the cover of the cloak, somewhat concerned lest the coachman should turn and discover his fare’s strange behavior. But nothing of the sort happened. Unmolested, Casanova was able to finish dressing, to pack away Lorenzi’s cloak, and resume his own.

Glancing skyward, Casanova saw that the heavens were overcast. He had no sense of fatigue, but felt tense and wakeful. He thought over his situation, considering it from every possible point of view, and coming to the conclusion that, though grave, it was less alarming than it might have seemed to timid spirits. He would probably be suspected of having killed Lorenzi, but who could doubt that it had been in an honorable fight? Besides, Lorenzi had been lying in wait, had forced the encounter upon him, and no one could consider him a criminal for having fought in self-defence. But why had he left the body lying on the grass like that of a dead dog? Well, nobody could reproach him on that account. To flee away swiftly had been well within his right, had been almost a duty. In his place, Lorenzi would have done the same. But perhaps Venice would hand him over? Directly he arrived, he would claim the protection of his patron Bragadino. Yet this might involve his accusing himself of a deed which would after all remain undiscovered, or at any rate would perhaps never be laid to his charge. What proof was there against him? Had he not been summoned to Venice? Who could say that he went thither as a fugitive from justice? The coachman maybe, who had waited for him half the night. One or two additional gold pieces would stop the fellow’s mouth.

Thus his thoughts ran in a circle. Suddenly he fancied he heard the sound of horses’ hoofs from the road behind him. “Already?” was his first thought. He leaned over the side of the carriage to look backwards. All was clear. The carriage had driven past a farm, and the sound he had heard had been the echo of his own horse’s hoofs. The discovery of this momentary self-deception quieted his apprehensions for a time, so that it seemed to him the danger was over. He could now see the towers of Mantua. “Drive on, man, drive on,” he said under his breath, for he did not really wish the coachman to hear. The coachman, nearing the goal, had given the horse his head. Soon they reached the gate through which Casanova had left the town with Olivo less than forty-eight hours earlier. He told the coachman the name of the inn, and in a few minutes the carriage drew up at the sign of the Golden Lion.

CHAPTER ELEVEN.

CASANOVA LEAPED FROM the carriage. The hostess stood in the doorway. She was bright and smiling, in the mood apparently to give Casanova the warm welcome of a lover whose absence has been regretted and whose return has been eagerly desired. But Casanova looked warningly towards the coachman, implying that the man might be an inconvenient witness, and then told him to eat and drink to his heart's content.

"A letter from Venice arrived for you yesterday, Chevalier," announced the hostess.

"Another?" enquired Casanova, going upstairs to his room.

The hostess followed. A sealed despatch was lying on the table. Casanova opened it in great excitement. He was anxious lest it should prove to be a revocation of the former offer. But the missive contained no more than a few lines from Bragadino, enclosing a draft for two hundred and fifty lire, in order that Casanova, should he have made up his mind to accept, might instantly set out for Venice.

Turning to the hostess, Casanova explained with an air of well-simulated vexation that he was unfortunately compelled to continue his journey instantly. Were he to delay, he would risk losing the post which his friend Bragadino had procured for him in Venice, a post for which there were fully a hundred applicants. Threatening clouds gathered on the hostess' face, so Casanova was prompt to add that all he proposed was to make sure of the appointment and to receive his patent as secretary to the Supreme Council. As soon as he was installed in office, he would ask permission to return to Mantua, that he might arrange his affairs. Of course this request could not be refused. He was going to leave most of his effects here. When he returned, it would only depend upon his beloved and charming friend whether she would give up inn-keeping and accompany him to Venice as his wife. She threw her arms round his neck, and with brimming eyes asked him whether before starting he would not at least make a good breakfast, if she might bring it up to his room. He knew she had in mind to provide a farewell feast, and though he felt no appetite for it, he agreed to the suggestion simply to be rid of her.

As soon as she was gone, he packed his bag with such underclothing and books as he urgently needed. Then, making his way to the parlor, where the coachman was enjoying a generous meal, he asked the man whether, for a sum which was more than double the usual fare, he would with the same horse drive along the Venice road as far as the next posting station. The coachman agreed without demur, thus relieving Casanova of his principal anxiety for the time.

Now the hostess entered, flushed with annoyance, to ask whether he had forgotten that his breakfast was awaiting him in his room. Casanova nonchalantly replied that he had not forgotten for a moment, and begged her, since he was short of time, to take his draft to the bank, and to bring back the two hundred and fifty lire. While she was hastening to fetch the money, Casanova returned to his room, and began to eat with wolfish voracity. He continued his meal when the hostess came back; stopping merely for an instant to pocket the money she brought him.

When he had finished eating, he turned to the woman. Thinking that her hour had at length come, she had drawn near, and was pressing up against him in a manner which could not be misunderstood. He clasped her somewhat roughly, kissed her on both cheeks, and, although she was obviously ready to grant him the last favors then and there, exclaimed: "I must be off. Till our next meeting!" He tore himself away with such violence that she fell back on to the corner of the couch. Her expression, with its mingling of disappointment, rage, and impotence, was so irresistibly funny that Casanova, as he closed the door behind him, burst out laughing.

The coachman could not fail to realize that his fare was in a hurry, but it was not his business to ask questions. He sat ready oil the box when Casanova came out of the inn, and whipped up the horse the very moment the passenger was seated. On his own initiative he decided not to drive through the town, but to skirt it, and to rejoin the posting road upon the other side. The sun was not yet high, for it was only nine o'clock. Casanova reflected: "It is likely enough that Lorenzi's body has not been found yet." He hardly troubled to think that he himself had killed Lorenzi. All he knew was that he was glad to be leaving Mantua farther and farther behind, and glad to have rest at last.

He fell into a deep sleep, the deepest he had ever known. It lasted practically two days and two nights. The brief interruptions to his slumbers necessitated by the change of horses from time to time, and the interruptions that occurred when he was sitting in inns, or walking up and down in front of posting stations, or exchanging a few casual words with postmasters, innkeepers, customhouse officers, and travellers, did not linger in his memory as individual details. Thus it came to pass that the remembrance of these two days and nights merged as it were into the dream he had dreamed in Marcolina's bed. Even the duel between the two naked men upon the green turf in the early sunshine seemed somehow to belong to this dream, wherein often enough, in enigmatic fashion, he was not Casanova but Lorenzi; not the victor but the vanquished; not the fugitive, but the slain round whose pale young body the lonely wind of morning played. Neither he nor Lorenzi was any more real than were the senators in the purple robes who had knelt before him like beggars; nor any less real than such as that old fellow leaning against the parapet of a bridge, to whom at nightfall he had thrown alms from the carriage. Had not Casanova bent his powers of reason to the task of distinguishing between real experiences and dream experiences, he might well have imagined that in Marcolina's arms he had fallen into a mad dream from which he did not awaken until he caught sight of the Campanile of Venice.

CHAPTER TWELVE

IT WAS ON the third morning of his journey that Casanova, having reached Mestre, sighted once more the bell tower after over twenty years of longing — a pillar of grey stone looming distantly in the twilight. It was but two leagues now to the beloved city in which he had been young. He paid the driver without remembering whether this was the fifth or the sixth with whom he had had to settle since quitting Mantua, and, followed by a lad carrying his baggage, walked through the mean streets to the harbor from which to-day, just as five-and-twenty years earlier, the boat was to leave for Venice at six in the morning.

The vessel seemed to have been waiting for him; hardly had he seated himself upon a narrow bench, among petty traders, manual workers, and women bringing their wares to market, when she cast off. It was a cloudy morning; mist was rolling across the lagoons; there was a smell of bilge-water, damp wood, fish, and fruit. The Campanile grew ever higher; additional towers appeared; cupolas became visible. The light of the morning sun was reflected from one roof, from two, from many. Individual houses were distinguishable, growing larger by degrees. Boats, great and small, showed through the mist; greetings were shouted from vessel to vessel. The chatter around him grew louder. A little girl offered him some grapes for sale. Munching the purple berries, he spat the skins over the side after the manner of his countrymen. He entered into friendly talk with someone who expressed satisfaction that the weather seemed to be clearing at last.

"What, has it been raining here for three days? That is news to me. I come from the south, from Naples and Rome."

The boat had entered the canals of the suburbs. Sordid houses stared at him with dirty windows, as if with vacant, hostile eyes. Twice or thrice the vessel stopped at a quay, and passengers came aboard; young fellows, one of whom had a great portfolio under his arm; women with baskets.

Here, at last, was familiar ground. Was not that the church where Martina used to go to confession? Was not that the house in which, after his own fashion, he had restored the pallid and dying Agatha to ruddy health? Was not that the place in which he had dealt with the charming Sylvia's rascal of a brother, had beaten the fellow black and blue? Up that canal to the right, in the small yellow house upon whose splashed steps the fat, bare-footed woman was standing....

Before he had fully recaptured the distant memory attaching to the house in question, the boat had entered the Grand Canal, and was passing slowly up the broad waterway with palaces on either hand. To Casanova, in his dreamy reflections, it seemed as if but yesterday he had traversed the same route.

He disembarked at the Rialto Bridge, for, before visiting Signor Bragadino, he wished to make sure of a room in a modest hostelry nearby — he knew where it was, though he could not recall the name. The place seemed more decayed, or at least more neglected, than he remembered it of old. A sulky waiter, badly in need of a shave, showed him to an uninviting room looking upon the blind wall of a house opposite. Casanova had no time to lose. Moreover, since he had spent nearly all his cash on the journey, the cheapness of these quarters was a great attraction. He decided, therefore, to make his lodging there for the present. Having removed the stains of travel, he deliberated for a while whether to put on his finer suit; then decided it was better to wear the soberer raiment, and walked out of the inn.

It was but a hundred paces, along a narrow alley and across a bridge, to Bragadino's small but elegant palace. A young servingman with a rather impudent manner took in Casanova's name in a way which implied that its celebrity had no meaning for him. Returning from his master's apartments with a more civil demeanor, he bade the guest enter.

Bragadino was seated at breakfast beside the open window, and made as if to rise; but Casanova begged him not to disturb himself.

"My dear Casanova," exclaimed Bragadino, "How delighted I am to see you once more! Who would have thought we should ever meet again?" He extended both hands to the newcomer.

Casanova seized them as if to kiss them, but did not do so. He answered the cordial greeting with warm words of thanks in the grandiloquent manner usual to him on such occasions. Bragadino begged him to be seated, and asked him whether he had breakfasted. Told that his guest was still fasting, Bragadino rang for his servant and gave the necessary orders. As soon as the man had gone, Bragadino expressed his gratification that Casanova had so unreservedly accepted the Supreme Council's offer. He would certainly not suffer for having decided to devote himself to the service of his country. Casanova responded by saying that he would deem himself happy if he could but win the Council's approval.

Such were Casanova's words, while his thoughts ran on. He could no longer detect in himself any feeling of hatred towards Bragadino. Nay, he realized that he was rather sorry for this man advanced in years and grown a trifle foolish, who sat facing him with a sparse white beard and red-rimmed eyes, and whose skinny hand trembled as he held his cup. The last time Casanova had seen him, Bragadino had probably been about as old as Casanova was to-day; but even then, to Casanova, Bragadino had seemed an old man.

The servant brought in Casanova's breakfast. The guest needed little pressing to induce him to make a hearty meal, for on the road he had had no more than a few snacks.

"I have journeyed here from Mantua without pausing for a night's rest, so eager was I to show my readiness to serve the Council and to prove my undying gratitude to my benefactor." — This was his excuse for the almost unmannerly greed with which he gulped down the steaming chocolate.

Through the window, from the Grand Canal and the lesser canals, rose the manifold noises of Venetian life. All other sounds were dominated by the monotonous shouts of the gondoliers. Somewhere close at hand, perhaps in the opposite palace (was it not the Fogazzari palace?), a woman with a fine soprano voice was practising; the singer was young — someone who could not have been born at the time when Casanova escaped from The Leads.

He ate rolls and butter, eggs, cold meat, continually excusing himself for his outrageous hunger, while Bragadino looked on well pleased.

"I do like young people to have a healthy appetite," said the Senator. "As far as I can remember, my dear Casanova, you have always been a good trencherman!" He recalled to mind a meal which he and Casanova had enjoyed together in the early days of their acquaintance. "Or rather, as now, I sat looking on while you ate. I had not taken a long walk, as you had. It was shortly after you had kicked that physician out of the house, the man who had almost been the death of me with his perpetual bleedings."

They went on talking of old times — when life had been better in Venice than it was to-day.

"Not everywhere," said Casanova, with a smiling allusion to The Leads.

Bragadino waved away the suggestion, as if this were not a suitable time for a reference to such petty disagreeables. "Besides, you must know that I did everything I could to save you from punishment, though unfortunately my efforts proved unavailing. Of course, if in those days I had already been a member of the Council of Ten!"

This broached the topic of political affairs. Warming to his theme, the old man recovered much of the wit and liveliness of earlier days. He told Casanova many remarkable details concerning the unfortunate tendencies which had recently begun to affect some of the Venetian youth, and concerning the dangerous intrigues of which infallible signs were now becoming manifest.

Casanova was thus well posted for his work. He spent the day in the gloomy chamber at the inn; and, simply as a means to secure calm after the recent excitements, he passed the hours in arranging his papers, and in burning those of which he wished to be rid. When evening fell, he made his way to the Café Quadri in the Square of St. Mark, since this was supposed to be the chief haunt of the freethinkers and revolutionists. Here he was promptly recognized by an elderly musician who had at one time been conductor of the orchestra in the San Samueli Theatre, where Casanova had been a violinist thirty years before. By this old acquaintance, and without any advances on his own part, he was introduced to the company. Most of them were young men, and many of their names were those which Bragadino had mentioned in the morning as belonging to persons of suspicious character.

But the name of Casanova did not produce upon his new acquaintances the effect which he felt himself entitled to anticipate. It was plain that most of them knew nothing more of Casanova than that, a great many years ago, he had for one reason or another, and perhaps for no reason at all, been imprisoned in The Leads; and that, surmounting all possible dangers, he had made his escape. The booklet wherein, some years earlier, he had given so lively a description of his flight, had not indeed passed unnoticed; but no one seemed to have read it with sufficient attention. Casanova found it amusing to reflect that it lay within his power to help everyone of these young gentlemen to a speedy personal experience of the conditions of prison life in The Leads, and to a realization of the difficulties of escape. He was far, however, from betraying the slightest trace that he harbored so ill-natured an idea. On the contrary, he was able to play the innocent and to adopt an amiable rôle. After his usual fashion, he entertained the company by recounting all sorts of lively adventures, describing them as experiences he had had during his last journey from Rome to Venice. In substance these incidents were true enough, but they all dated from fifteen or twenty years earlier. He secured an eager and interested audience.

Another member of the company announced as a noteworthy item of news that an officer of Mantua on a visit to a friend, a neighboring landowner, had been murdered, and that the robbers had stripped him to the skin. The story attracted no particular attention, for in those days such occurrences were far from rare. Casanova resumed his narrative where it had been interrupted, resumed it as if this Mantua affair concerned him just as little as it concerned the rest of the company. In fact, being now freed from a disquiet whose existence he had hardly been willing to admit even to himself, his manner became brighter and bolder than ever.

It was past midnight when, after a light-hearted farewell, he walked alone across the wide, empty square. The heavens were veiled in luminous mist. He moved with the confident step of a sleep-walker. Without being really conscious that he was on a path which he had not traversed for five-and-twenty years, he found the way through tortuous alleys, between dark houses, and over narrow bridges. At length he reached the dilapidated inn, and had to knock repeatedly before the door was opened to him with a slow unfriendliness.

When, a few minutes later, having but half undressed, he threw himself upon his uneasy pallet, he was overwhelmed with a weariness amounting to pain, while upon his lips was a bitter after-taste which seemed to permeate his whole being. Thus, at the close of his long exile, did he first woo sleep in the city to which he had so eagerly desired to return. And here, when morning was about to break, the heavy and dreamless sleep of exhaustion came to console the aging adventurer.

THE END

POSTFACE

IT IS A historical fact that Casanova visited Voltaire at Ferney. There is, however, no historical warrant for the account of the matter given in the foregoing novel, and still less for the statement that Casanova wrote a polemic against Voltaire. It is a historical fact, likewise, that Casanova, when between fifty and sixty years of age, found it necessary to enter Venetian service as a spy. Of this, and of many other doings of the celebrated adventurer to which casual allusion is made in the course of the novel, fuller and more accurate accounts will be found in Casanova's Memoirs. Speaking generally, nevertheless, Casanova's Homecoming is to be regarded throughout as a work of fiction.

Original German Title: 'Traumnovelle'

Translated by Otto P. Schinnerer, 1927

This short novel deals with the thoughts and psychological transformations of Fridolin, a successful 35-year-old doctor, over a two-day period, after his wife Albertina confesses having had sexual fantasies involving another man. In this short time, he meets many strange characters populating an eerie world of seduction and secrets. This culminates in the masquerade ball, an event of masked identity, sex and unforeseen danger for Doctor Fridolin, the obvious outsider.

The novel was first published in instalments in the magazine Die Dame between December 1925 and March 1926. The first book edition was printed in 1926 by S. Fischer Verlag. Interestingly, the 1999 film Eyes Wide Shut by director-screenwriter Stanley Kubrick is loosely based on the novel. Prior to this film, Traumnovelle had been adapted for Austrian television in 1969, as an Italian film entitled Il cavaliere, la morte e il diavolo in 1983 and as a low-budget Italian film entitled Nightmare in Venice in 1989.

"TWENTY-FOUR BROWN-SKINNED SLAVES rowed the splendid galley which was to bring Prince Amgiad to the palace of the caliph. The Prince, wrapped in his purple cloak, lay alone on the deck under the dark-blue, starry sky, and his gaze—"

So far the little girl had read aloud. Then, suddenly, her eyelids drooped. Her parents looked at each other and smiled. Fridolin bent down, kissed her blond hair and closed the book which was lying on the untidy table. The child looked up as if caught at some mischief.

"It's nine o'clock," her father said, "and time you were in bed." Albertina also bent over her, and as her hand met her husband's on the beloved forehead, they looked at each other with a tender smile not meant for the child. The governess entered and asked the little girl to say good-night. She got up obediently, kissed her father and mother and walked out quietly hand in hand with the young woman. Fridolin and Albertina, left alone under the reddish glow of the hanging-lamp, continued the conversation they had begun before supper.

It dealt with their experiences the night before at the masquerade ball. They had decided to attend it just before the end of the carnival period, as their first one of the season. No sooner had Fridolin entered the ball-room than he was greeted, like a long lost friend, by two women in red dominoes. He had no idea who they were, although they were unusually well-informed about many affairs of his student days and internship. They had invited him into a box with great friendliness, but had left again with the promise that they would soon return without masks. When they did not appear, he became impatient and went down to the ball-room floor hoping to meet them again, but eagerly as he scanned the room, he could not see them anywhere. Instead, however, another woman unexpectedly took his arm. It was his wife. She had just freed herself from the company of a stranger whose blasé manner and apparently Polish accent had at first charmed her. Suddenly he had offended her — frightened her by a rather common and impertinent remark. Fridolin and Albertina were glad to have escaped from a disappointingly commonplace masquerade prank, and soon sat like two lovers, among the other couples, in the buffet, eating oysters and drinking champagne. They chatted gaily, as though they had just made each other's acquaintance, acting a comedy of courting, bashful resistance, seduction and surrender. After driving home quickly through the snowy winter night, they sank into each other's arms and were more blissful in their ardent love than they had been for a long time. The gray of morning awakened them only too soon. Fridolin's profession summoned him to his patients at an early hour, while Albertina would not stay in bed longer because of her duties as housewife and mother. So the ensuing hours passed, soberly and predetermined, in daily routine and work, and the events of the night before, both those at the beginning and at the end, had faded.

But now that the day's work was done — the child had gone to bed and no disturbance was likely — the shadowy forms of the masquerade, the melancholy stranger and the red dominoes, rose again into reality. And all at once those insignificant events were imbued, magically and painfully, with the deceptive glow of neglected opportunities. Harmless but probing questions, and sly, ambiguous answers were exchanged. Neither failed to notice that the other was not absolutely honest, and so they became slightly vindictive. They exaggerated the degree of attraction that their unknown partners at the ball had exerted upon them while each made fun of the other's tendencies to jealousy and denied his own. Soon, their light conversation about the trifling matters of the night before changed into a more serious discussion of those hidden, scarcely suspected wishes, which can produce dangerous whirlpools even in the serenest and purest soul. They spoke of those mysterious regions of which they were hardly conscious but toward which the incomprehensible wind of fate might some day drive them, even if only in their dreams. For though they were united in thought and feeling, they knew that the preceding day had not been the first time that the spirit of adventure, freedom and danger had beckoned them. Uneasy, and tormenting themselves, each sought with disingenuous curiosity to draw out confessions from the other. Anxiously, they searched within themselves for some indifferent fact, or trifling experience, which might express the inexpressible, and the honest confession of which might relieve them of the strain and the suspicion which were becoming unbearable.

Whether Albertina was more impatient, more honest or more kind-hearted of the two, it was she who first summoned the courage for a frank confession. She asked Fridolin in a rather uncertain voice whether he remembered the young man who — last summer at the seashore in Denmark — had been sitting one evening with two other officers at an adjoining table. He had received a telegram during dinner, whereupon he had hastily said "good-bye" to his friends.

Fridolin nodded. "What about him?" he asked.

"I'd already seen him in the morning," she replied, "as he was hurrying up the stairs in the hotel with his yellow hand-bag. He looked at me as he passed, but didn't stop until he had gone a few more steps. Then he turned and our eyes met. He didn't smile; in fact, it seemed to me that he scowled. I suppose I did the same, for I was very much stirred. That whole day I lay on the beach, lost in dreams. Had he called me — I thought — I could not have resisted. I thought I was ready for anything. I had practically resolved to give up you, the child, my future, and at the same time — if you can understand it? — you were dearer to me than ever. That same afternoon — surely you remember — we discussed many things very intimately, among others our common future, and our child. At sunset you and I were sitting on the balcony, when, down below on the beach, he passed without looking up. I was extremely thrilled to see him, but I stroked your forehead and kissed your hair, and my love for you was both sorrowful and compassionate. That evening at dinner I wore a white rose and you yourself said I was very beautiful. Perhaps it wasn't mere chance that the stranger and his friends sat near us. He didn't look at me, but I considered getting up, walking over to him and saying: Here I am, my beloved for whom I have waited — take me. At that moment the telegram was handed to him. He read it, turned pale, whispered a few words to the younger of the two officers — and glancing at me mysteriously he left the room."

"And then?" Fridolin asked dryly when she stopped.

"That is all. I remember that I woke the next morning with a restless anxiety. I don't know whether I was afraid that he had left or that he might still be there. But when he didn't appear at noon, I breathed a sigh of relief. Don't ask any more, Fridolin. I've told you the whole truth. And you, too, had some sort of experience at the seashore — I know it."

Fridolin rose, walked up and down the room several times and then said: "You're right." He was standing at the window, his face in shadow and in a hoarse and slightly hostile voice he began: "In the morning, sometimes very early before you got up, I used to stroll along the beach, out beyond the town. Even at that hour the sun was always shining over the sea, bright and strong. Out there on the beach, as you know, were cottages, each one standing like a world in itself. Some had fenced-in gardens, others were surrounded only by the woods. The bathing-huts were separated from the cottages by the road and part of the beach. I hardly ever met people at such an early hour, and bathers were never out. One morning, quite suddenly, I noticed the figure of a woman. She had suddenly appeared on the narrow ledge of a bathing-hut, which rested on piles driven into the sand. She was cautiously advancing, placing one foot before the other, her arms extended backward against the wooden boards. She was quite a young girl, possibly fifteen years old, with loose blond hair hanging over her shoulders and on one side over her delicate breast. She was looking down into the water and was slowly moving along the wall, her gaze lowered in the direction of the far corner. All at once she stopped opposite me and reached far back with her arms as though trying to secure a firmer hold. Looking up, she suddenly saw me. A tremor passed through her body, as though she wished to drop into the water or run. But as she could move only very slowly on the narrow ledge, she had to stay where she was. She stood there with a face expressing at first fright, then anger, and finally embarrassment. All at once, however, she smiled, smiled marvellously. Her eyes welcomed me, beckoned to me, and at the same time slightly mocked me, as she glanced at the strip of water between us. Then she stretched her young and slender body, glad of her beauty, and proudly and sweetly stirred by my obvious admiration. We stood facing each other for perhaps ten seconds, with half-open lips and dazzled eyes. Involuntarily I stretched out my arms to her; her eyes expressed surrender and joy. Then she shook her head vigorously, took one arm from the wall and commanded me with a gesture to go away. When I didn't at once obey, her childlike eyes turned on me such a beseeching look that there was nothing for me to do but to go, and I went as quickly as possible. I did not look back once — not because I felt considerate, obedient or chivalrous, but because in her last glance I sensed an emotion so intense, so far beyond anything I had ever experienced, that I was not far from fainting." And he stopped.

With her eyes cast down and in a monotonous voice, Albertina asked: "And how often did you see her after that?"

"What I have told you," Fridolin answered, "happened on the last day of our stay in Denmark. Otherwise I don't know what might have taken place. You, too, mustn't ask any more, Albertina."

He was still standing at the window, motionless as Albertina arose and walked over to him. There were tears in her eyes and a slight frown on her face. "In the future let's always tell each other such things at once," she said.

He nodded in silence.

"Will you promise me?"

He took her into his arms. "Don't you know that?" he asked. But his voice was still harsh.

She took his hands and looked up at him with misty eyes, in the depths of which he could read her thoughts. She was thinking of his other and more real experiences, those of his young manhood, many of which she knew about. When they were first married he had yielded, all too readily, to her jealous curiosity and had told her (indeed it often seemed to him) had surrendered to her many secrets which he should rather have kept to himself. He knew that she was inevitably reminded of these affairs and he was hardly surprised when she murmured the half-forgotten name of one of his early sweethearts. It sounded to him a little like a reproach, or was it a covert threat?

He raised her hands to his lips.

"You may believe me, even though it sounds trite, that in every woman I thought I loved it was always you I was looking for — I know that better than you can understand it, Albertina."

A dispirited smile passed over her face.

"And suppose before meeting you, I, too, had gone on a search for a mate?" she asked. The look in her eyes changed, becoming cool and impenetrable, and he allowed her hands to slip from his, as though he had caught her lying or committing a breach of faith. She, however, continued:

"Oh, if you men knew!" and again was silent.

"If we knew —? What do you mean by that?"

In a strangely harsh voice she replied:

“About what you imagine, my dear.”

“Albertina! — then there is something that you’ve kept from me?”

She nodded, and looked down with a strange smile. Incomprehensible, monstrous doubts crossed his mind.

“I don’t quite understand,” he said. “You were barely seventeen when we became engaged.”

“Past sixteen, yes, Fridolin. But it wasn’t my fault that I was a virgin when I became your wife.” She looked at him brightly.

“Albertina —!”

“It was a beautiful summer evening at Lake Wörther, just before our engagement, and a very handsome young man stood before my window that overlooked a large and spacious meadow. As we talked I thought to myself — just listen to this — what a charming young man that is — he would only have to say the word — it would have to be the right one, certainly — and I would go out with him into the meadow or the woods — or it would be even more beautiful in a boat on the lake — and I would grant him this night anything he might desire. That is what I thought to myself. — But he didn’t say a word, that charming young man. He only kissed my hand tenderly — and next morning he asked me — if I would be his wife. And I said yes.”

Fridolin was annoyed and dropped her hand. “And if,” he said, “someone else had stood by your window that night and the right word had occurred to him, if it had been, for instance—” He was considering, but she raised her hand protestingly.

“Any other man — no matter who — could have said anything he liked — it would have been useless. And if it hadn’t been you standing by the window, then very likely the summer evening wouldn’t have been so beautiful.” And she smiled at him.

There was a scornful expression about his mouth. “Yes, that’s what you say now. Perhaps you even believe it at this moment. But—”

There was a knock on the door. The maid entered and said that the housekeeper from Schreyvogel Strasse had come to fetch the doctor, as the Privy Councilor was very low again. Fridolin went out into the hall, and when the woman told him that the Councilor had had a very serious heart attack, he promised to come at once.

As he was leaving, Albertina asked: “You’re going away?” She said it with as much annoyance as if he were deliberately doing her an injustice.

Fridolin replied, with astonishment: “I suppose I’ve got to.”

She sighed regretfully.

“I hope it won’t be very serious,” said Fridolin. “Up to now three centigrams of morphine have always pulled him through.”

The maid brought his fur coat, and absent-mindedly kissing Albertina on her forehead and mouth, as if everything during the last hour had been completely forgotten, he hurried away.

WHEN FRIDOLIN REACHED the street, he unbuttoned his coat. It had suddenly begun to thaw; the snow on the sidewalk was almost gone, and there was a touch of spring in the air. It was less than a quarter of an hour's walk to Schreyvogel Strasse from his home near the General Hospital, and he soon reached the old house. He walked up the dimly lighted winding staircase to the second floor and pulled the bell-rope. But before the old-fashioned bell was heard, he noticed that the door was ajar, and entering through the unlighted foyer into the living room he saw at once that he had come too late. The green-shaded kerosene lamp which was hanging from the low ceiling cast a dim light on the bedspread under which a lean body lay motionless. Fridolin knew the old man so well that he seemed to see the face plainly, although it was outside the circle of light — the high forehead, the thin and lined cheeks, the snow-white beard and also the strikingly ugly ears with coarse, white hairs. At the foot of the bed sat Marianne, the Councilor's daughter, completely exhausted, her arms hanging limply from her shoulders. An odor of old furniture, medicine, petroleum and cooking pervaded the room, and in addition to that there was a trace of eau de Cologne and scented soap. Fridolin also noticed the indefinite, sweetish scent of this pale girl who was still young and who had been slowly fading for months and years under the stress of severe household duties, nursing and night watches.

When the doctor entered she looked up, but because of the dim light he could not see whether she had blushed, as usual, when he appeared. She started to rise, but he stopped her with a movement of his hand, and so she merely greeted him with a nod, her eyes large and sad. He stepped to the head of the bed and mechanically placed his hands on the forehead of the dead man and on the arms which were lying on the bed-spread in loose and open shirt sleeves. His shoulders drooped with a slight expression of regret. He stuck his hands into the pockets of his coat and his eyes wandered about the room until they finally rested on Marianne. Her hair was blond and thick, but dry; her neck well-formed and slender, although a little wrinkled and rather yellow; and her lips were thin and firmly pressed together.

"Well, my dear Marianne," he said in a slightly embarrassed whisper, "you weren't entirely unprepared for this."

She held out her hand to him. He took it sympathetically and inquired about the particulars of the final, fatal attack. She reported briefly and to the point, and then spoke of her father's last comparatively easy days, during which Fridolin had not seen him. Drawing up a chair, he sat down opposite her, and tried to console her by saying that her father must have suffered very little at the last. He then asked if any of her relatives had been notified. Yes, she said, the housekeeper had already gone to tell her uncle, and very likely Doctor Roediger would soon appear. "My fiancé," she added, and did not look him straight in the eye.

Fridolin simply nodded. During the year he had met Doctor Roediger two or three times in the Councilor's house. The pale young man — an instructor in History at the University of Vienna — was of an unusually slender build with a short, blond beard and spectacles, and had made quite a good impression upon him, without, however, arousing his interest beyond that. Marianne would certainly look better, he thought to himself, if she were his mistress. Her hair would be less dry, her lips would be fuller and redder. I wonder how old she is, he reflected. The first time I attended the Councilor, three or four years ago, she was twenty-three. At that time her mother was still living and she was more cheerful than now. She even took singing lessons for a while. So she is going to marry this instructor! I wonder why? She surely isn't in love with him, and he isn't likely to have much money either. What kind of a marriage will it turn out to be? Probably like a thousand others. But it's none of my business. It's quite possible that I shall never see her again, since there's nothing more for me to do here. Well, many others that I cared for have gone the same way.

As these thoughts passed through his mind, Marianne began to speak of her father — with fervor — as if his death had suddenly made him a more remarkable person. Then he was really only fifty-four years old? Well, of course, he had had so many worries and disappointments — his wife always ill — and his son such a grief! What, she had a brother? Certainly, she had once told the doctor about him. Her brother was now living somewhere abroad. A picture that he had painted when he was fifteen was hanging over there in Marianne's room. It represented an officer galloping down a hill. Her father had always pretended not to see it although it wasn't bad. Oh yes, if he'd had a chance her brother might have made something of himself.

How excitedly she speaks, Fridolin thought, and how bright her eyes are! Is it fever? Quite possibly. She's grown much thinner. Probably has tuberculosis.

She kept up her stream of talk, but it seemed to him that she didn't quite know what she was saying. It was twelve years since her brother had left home. In fact, she had been a child when he disappeared. They had last heard from him four or five years ago, at Christmas, from a small city in Italy. Strange to say, she had forgotten the name. She continued like this for a while, almost incoherently. Suddenly she stopped and sat there silently, her head resting in her hands. Fridolin was tired and even more bored. He was anxiously waiting for some one to come, tier relatives, or her fiancé. The silence in the room was oppressive. It seemed to him that the dead man joined in the silence, deliberately and with malicious joy.

With a side glance at the corpse, he said: "At any rate, Fräulein Marianne, as things are now, it is fortunate that you won't have to stay in this house very much longer." And when she raised her head a little, without, however, looking at Fridolin, he continued: "I suppose your fiancé will soon get a professorship. The chances for promotion are more favorable in the Faculty of Philosophy than with us in Medicine." He was thinking that, years ago, he also had aspired to an academic career, but because he wanted a comfortable income, he had finally decided to practice medicine. Suddenly he felt that compared with this noble Doctor Roediger, he was the inferior.

"We shall move soon," said Marianne listlessly, "he has a post at the University of Göttingen."

"Oh," said Fridolin, and was about to congratulate her but it seemed rather out of place at the moment. He glanced at the closed window, and without asking for permission but availing himself of his privilege as a doctor, he opened both casements and let some air in. It had become even warmer and more spring-like, and the breeze seemed to bring with it a slight fragrance of the distant awakening woods. When he turned back into the room, he saw Marianne's eyes fixed upon him with a questioning look. He moved nearer to her and said: "I hope the fresh air will be good for you. It has become quite warm, and last night" — he was about to say: we drove home from the masquerade in a snowstorm, but he quickly changed the sentence and continued: "Last night the snow was still lying on the streets a foot and a half deep."

She hardly heard what he said. Her eyes became moist, large tears streamed down her cheeks and again she buried her face in her hands. In spite of himself, he placed his hand on her head, caressing it. He could feel her body beginning to tremble, and her sobs which were at first very quiet, gradually became louder and finally quite unrestrained. All at once she slipped down from her chair and lay at Fridolin's feet, clasping his knees with her arms and pressing her face against them. Then she looked up to him with large eyes, wild with grief, and whispered ardently: "I don't want to leave here. Even if you never return, if I am never to see you again, I want, at least, to live near you."

He was touched rather than surprised, for he had always known that she either was, or imagined herself to be, in love with him.

“Please — get up, Marianne,” he said softly and bending down he gently raised her. Of course, she is hysterical, he remarked to himself and he glanced at her dead father. I wonder if he hears everything, he thought. Perhaps he isn’t really dead. Perhaps everyone in the first hours after passing away, is only in a coma. He put his arms about her in a very hesitating embrace, and almost against his will he kissed her on the forehead, an act that somehow seemed rather ridiculous. He had a fleeting recollection of reading a novel years ago in which a young man, still almost a boy, had been seduced, in fact, practically raped, by the friend of his mother at the latter’s deathbed. At the same time he thought of his wife, without knowing why, and he was conscious of some bitterness and a vague animosity against the man with the yellow hand-bag on the hotel stairs in Denmark. He held Marianne closer, but without the slightest emotion. The sight of her lustreless, dry hair, the indefinite, sweetish scent of her unaired dress gave him a slight feeling of revulsion. The bell outside rang again, and feeling he was released, he hastily kissed Marianne’s hand, as if in gratitude, and went to open the door. Doctor Roediger stood there, in a dark gray top-coat, an umbrella in his hand and a serious face, appropriate to the occasion. The two men greeted each other much more cordially than was called for by their actual state of acquaintance. Then they stepped into the room. After an embarrassed look at the deceased, Roediger expressed his sympathy to Marianne, while Fridolin went into the adjoining room to write out the official death-certificate. He turned up the gas-light over the desk and his eyes fell upon the picture of the white-uniformed officer, galloping down hill, with drawn sabre, to meet an invisible enemy. It hung in a narrow frame of dull gold and rather resembled a modest chromo-lithograph.

With his death-certificate filled out, Fridolin returned to the room where the engaged couple sat, hand in hand, by the bed of the dead Councilor.

Again the door-bell rang and Doctor Roediger rose to answer it. While he was gone, Marianne, with her eyes on the floor, said, almost inaudibly: “I love you,” and Fridolin answered by pronouncing her name tenderly. Then Roediger came back with an elderly couple, Marianne’s uncle and aunt, and a few words, appropriate to the occasion, were exchanged, with the usual embarrassment in the presence of one who has just died. The little room suddenly seemed crowded with mourners. Fridolin felt superfluous, took his leave and was escorted to the door by Roediger who said a few words of gratitude and expressed the hope of seeing him soon again.

WHEN FRIDOLIN STOOD on the street in front of the house, he looked up at the window which he himself had opened a little while before. The casements were swaying slightly in the wind of early spring, and the people who remained behind them up there, the living as well as the dead, all seemed unreal and phantom like. He felt as if he had escaped from something, not so much from an adventure, but rather from a melancholy spell the power of which he was trying to break. He felt strangely disinclined to go home. The snow in the streets had melted, except where little heaps of dirty white had been piled up on either side of the curb. The gas-flame in the street lamps flickered and a nearby church bell struck eleven. Fridolin decided that before going to bed, he would spend a half hour in a quiet nook of a café near his residence. As he walked through Rathaus Park he noticed here and there on benches standing in the shadow, that couples were sitting, clasped together, just as if Spring had actually arrived and no danger were lurking in the deceptive, warm air. A tramp in tattered clothes was lying full length on a bench with his hat over his face. Suppose I wake him and give him some money for a night's lodging, Fridolin thought. But what good would that do? Then I would have to provide for the next night, too, or there'd be no sense in it, and in the end I might be suspected of having criminal relations with him. He quickened his steps to escape as rapidly as possible from all responsibility and temptation. And why only this one? he asked himself. There are thousands of such poor devils in Vienna alone. It's manifestly impossible to help all of them or to worry about all the poor wretches! He was reminded of the dead man he had just left, and shuddered; in fact, he felt slightly nauseated at the thought that decay and decomposition, according to eternal laws, had already begun their work in the lean body under the brown flannel blanket. He was glad that he was still alive, and in all probability these ugly things were still far removed from him. He was, in fact, still in the prime of youth, he had a charming and lovable wife and could have several women in addition, if he happened to want them, although, to be sure, such affairs required more leisure than was his. He then remembered that he would have to be in his ward at the hospital at eight in the morning, visit his private patients from eleven to one, keep office hours from three to five, and that even in the evening he had several appointments to visit patients. Well, he hoped that it would be some time before he would again be called out so late at night. As he crossed Rathaus Square, which had a dull gleam like a brownish pond, and turned homeward, he heard the muffled sound of marching steps in the distance. Then he saw, still quite far away, a small group of fraternity students, six or eight in number, turning a corner and coming towards him. When the light of a street lamp fell upon them he thought he recognized them, with their blue caps, as members of the Alemannia, for although he had never belonged to a fraternity, he had fought a few sabre duels in his time. In thinking of his student days he was reminded again of the red dominoes who had lured him into a box at the ball the night before and then had so shamefully deserted him. The students were quite near now; they were laughing and talking loudly. Perhaps one or two of them were from the hospital? But it was impossible to see their faces plainly because of the dim light, and he had to stay quite close to the houses so as not to collide with them. Now they had passed. Only the one in the rear, a tall fellow with open overcoat and a bandage over his left eye, seemed to lag behind, and deliberately bumped into him with his raised elbow. It couldn't have been mere chance. What's got into that fellow? Fridolin thought, and involuntarily he stopped. The other took two more steps and turned. They looked at each other for a moment with only a short distance separating them. Suddenly Fridolin turned around again and went on. He heard a short laugh behind him and he longed to challenge the fellow, but he felt his heart beating strangely, just as it had on a previous occasion, twelve or fourteen years before. There had been an unusually loud knock on his door while he had had with him a certain charming young creature who was never tired of prattling about her jealous fiancé. As a matter of fact, it was only the postman who had knocked in such a threatening manner. And now he felt his heart beating just as it had at that time. What's the meaning of this? he asked himself, and he noticed that his knees were shaking a little. Am I a coward? Oh! nonsense, he reassured himself. Why should I go and face a drunken student, I, a man of thirty-five, a practising physician, a married man and father of a child? Formal challenge! Seconds! A duel! And perhaps because of such a silly encounter receive a cut in my arm and be unable to perform my professional duties? — Or lose an eye? — Or even get blood-poisoning? — And in a week perhaps be in the same position as the man in Schreyvogel Strasse under the brown flannel blanket? Coward —? He had fought three sabre duels, and had even been ready to fight a duel with pistols, and it wasn't at his request that the matter had been called off. And what about his profession! There were dangers lurking everywhere and at all times — except that one usually forgets about them. Why, how long ago was it that that child with diphtheria had coughed in his face? Only three or four days, that's all. After all, that was much more dangerous than a little fencing match with sabres, and he hadn't given it a second thought. Well, if he ever met that fellow again, the affair could still be straightened out. He was by no means bound by the code of honor to take a silly encounter with a student seriously when on an errand of mercy, to or from a patient. But if, for instance, he should meet the young Dane with whom Albertina — oh, nonsense, what was he thinking of? Well, after all, it was just as bad as if she had been his mistress. Even worse. Yes, just let that fellow cross his path! What a joy it would be to face him somewhere in a clearing in the woods and aim a pistol at his forehead with its smoothly combed blond hair.

He suddenly discovered that he had passed his destination. He was in a narrow street in which only a few doubtful-looking women were strolling about in a pitiful attempt to bag their game. It's phantom like, he thought. And in retrospect the students, too, with their blue caps, suddenly seemed unreal. The same was true of Marianne, her fiancé, her uncle and aunt, all of whom he pictured standing hand in hand around the deathbed of the old Councilor. Albertina, too, whom he could see in his mind's eye soundly sleeping, her arms folded under her head — even his child lying in the narrow white brass bed, rolled up in a heap, and the red-cheeked governess with the mole on her left temple — all of them seemed to belong to another world. Although this idea made him shudder a bit, it also reassured him, for it seemed to free him from all responsibility, and to loosen all the bonds of human relationship.

One of the girls wandering about stopped him. She was still a young and pretty little thing, very pale with red-painted lips. She also might lead to a fatal end, only not as quickly, he thought. Is this cowardice too? I suppose really it is. He heard her steps and then her voice behind him. "Won't you come with me, doctor?"

He turned around involuntarily. "How do you know who I am?" he asked.

"Why, I don't know you," she said, "but here in this part of town they're all doctors, aren't they?"

He had had no relations with a woman of this sort since he had been a student at the Gymnasium. Was the attraction this girl had for him a sign that he was suddenly reverting to adolescence? He recalled a casual acquaintance, a smart young man, who was supposed to be extremely successful with women. Once while Fridolin was a student he had been sitting with him in an all-night café, after a ball. When the young man proposed to leave with one of the regular girls of the place, Fridolin looked at him in surprise. Thereupon he answered: "After all, it's the most convenient way — and they aren't by any means the worst."

"What's your name?" Fridolin asked the girl.

"Well, what do you think? Mizzi, of course." She unlocked the house-door, stepped into the hallway and waited for Fridolin to follow her.

"Come on," she said when he hesitated. He stepped in beside her, the door closed behind him, she locked it, lit a wax candle and went ahead, lighting the way. — Am I mad? he asked himself. Of course I shall have nothing to do with her.

An oil-lamp was burning in her room, and she turned it up. It was a fairly pleasant place and neatly kept. At any rate, it smelled fresher than Marianne's home, for instance. But then, of course, no old man had been lying ill there for months. The girl smiled, and without forwardness approached Fridolin who gently kept her at a distance. She pointed to a rocking-chair into which he was glad to drop.

"You must be very tired," she remarked. He nodded. Undressing without haste, she continued: "Well, no wonder, with all the things a man like you has to do in the course of a day. We have an easier time of it."

He noticed that her lips were not painted, as he had thought, but were a natural red, and he complimented her on that.

"But why should I rouge?" she inquired. "How old do you think I am?"

"Twenty?" Fridolin ventured.

"Seventeen," she said, and sat on his lap, putting her arms around his neck like a child.

Who in the world would suspect that I'm here in this room at this moment? Fridolin thought. I'd never have thought it possible an hour or even ten minutes ago. And — why? Why am I here? Her lips were seeking his, but he drew back his head. She looked at him with sad surprise and slipped down from his lap. He was sorry, for he had felt much comforting tenderness in her embrace.

She took a red dressing-gown which was hanging over the foot of the open bed, slipped into it and folded her arms over her breast so that her entire body was concealed.

"Does this suit you better?" she asked without mockery, almost timidly, as though making an effort to understand him. He hardly knew what to answer.

"You're right," he said. "I am really tired, and I find it very pleasant sitting here in the rocking-chair and simply listening to you. You have such a nice gentle voice. Just talk to me."

She sat down on the couch and shook her head.

"You're simply afraid," she said softly — and then to herself in a barely audible voice: "It's too bad."

These last words made the blood race through his veins. He walked over to her, longing to touch her, and declared that he trusted her implicitly and saying so he spoke the truth. He put his arms around her and wooed her like a sweetheart, like a beloved woman, but she resisted, until he felt ashamed and finally gave it up.

She explained: "You never can tell, some time or other it's bound to get out. It's quite right of you to be afraid. If something should happen, you would curse me." She was so positive in refusing the banknotes which he offered her that he did not insist. She put a little blue woollen shawl about her shoulders, lit a candle to light him downstairs, went down with him and unlocked the door. "I'm not going out any more tonight," she said. He took her hand and involuntarily kissed it. She looked up to him astonished, almost frightened. Then she laughed, embarrassed and happy. "Just as if I were a young lady," she said.

The door closed behind Fridolin and he quickly made a mental note of the street number, so as to be able to send the poor little thing some wine and cakes the following day.

MEANWHILE IT HAD become even milder outside. A fragrance from dewy meadows and distant mountains drifted with the gentle breezes into the narrow street. Where shall I go now? Fridolin asked himself, as though it weren't the obvious thing to go home to bed. But he couldn't persuade himself to do so. He felt homeless, an outcast, since his annoying meeting with the students... or was it since Marianne's confession? No, it was longer than that — ever since this evening's conversation with Albertina he was moving farther and farther away from his everyday existence into some strange and distant world.

He wandered about aimlessly through the dark streets, letting the breeze blow through his hair. Finally, he turned resolutely into a third-rate coffee-house. The place was dimly lighted and not especially large, but it had an old-fashioned, cozy air about it, and was almost empty at this late hour.

Three men were playing cards in a corner. The waiter who had been watching them helped Fridolin take off his fur coat, took his order and placed illustrated journals and evening papers on his table. Fridolin felt slightly more secure and began to look through the papers. His eyes were arrested here and there by some news item. In some Bohemian city, street signs with German names had been torn down. There was a conference in Constantinople in which Lord Cranford took part about constructing a railway in Asia Minor. The firm Benies & Weingruber had gone into bankruptcy. The prostitute Anna Tiger, in a fit of jealousy, had attempted to throw vitriol on her friend, Hermine Drobizky. An Ash Wednesday fish-dinner was being given that evening in Sophia Hall. Marie B. a young girl residing at No. 28 Schönbrunn Strasse, had poisoned herself with mercuric chloride. — Prosaically commonplace as they were, all these facts, the insignificant as well as the sad, had a sobering and reassuring effect on Fridolin. He felt sorry for the young girl, Marie B. How stupid to take mercuric chloride! At this very moment, while he was sitting snugly in the café, while Albertina was calmly sleeping, and the Councilor had passed beyond all human suffering, Marie B. No. 28 Schönbrunn Strasse, was writhing in incredible pain.

He looked up from his paper and encountered the gaze of a man seated opposite. Was it possible? Nachtigall —? The latter had already recognized him, threw up his hands in pleased surprise and joined him at his table. He was still a young man, tall, rather broad, and none too thin. His long, blond, slightly curly hair had a touch of gray in it, and his moustache drooped in Polish fashion. He was wearing an open gray top-coat, underneath which were visible a greasy dress-suit, a crumpled shirt with three false diamond studs, a crinkled collar and a dangling, white silk tie. His eyelids were inflamed, as if from many sleepless nights, but his blue eyes gleamed brightly.

"You here in Vienna, Nachtigall?" exclaimed Fridolin.

"Didn't you know?" said Nachtigall with a soft, Polish accent and a slightly Jewish twang. "How could you miss it, and me so famous?" He laughed loudly and good-naturedly, and sat down opposite Fridolin.

"What," asked Fridolin, "have you been appointed Professor of Surgery without my hearing of it?"'

Nachtigall laughed still louder. "Didn't you hear me just now, just a minute ago?"

"What do you mean — hear you? — Why, of course." Suddenly it occurred to him that someone had been playing the piano when he entered; in fact, he had heard music coming from some basement as he approached the café. "So that was you playing?" he exclaimed.

"It was," Nachtigall said, laughing.

Fridolin nodded. Why, of course — the strangely vigorous touch, the peculiar, but euphonious bass chords had at once seemed familiar to him. “Are you devoting yourself entirely to it?” he asked. He remembered that Nachtigall had definitely given up the study of medicine after his second preliminary examination in zoology, which he had passed although he was seven years late in taking it. Since then he had been hanging around the hospital, the dissecting room, the laboratories and classrooms for some time afterwards. With his blond artist’s head, his crinkled collar, his dangling tie that had once been white, he had been a striking and, in the humorous sense, popular figure. He had been much liked, not only by his fellow-students, but also by many professors. The son of a Jewish ginshop owner in a small Polish town, he had left home early and had come to Vienna to study medicine. The trifling sums he received from his parents had from the very beginning been scarcely worth mention and were soon discontinued. However, this didn’t prevent his appearing in the Riedhof Hotel at the table reserved for medical students where Fridolin was a regular guest. At intervals, one after another of his more well-to-do fellow-students would pay his bill. He sometimes, also, was given clothes, which he accepted gladly and without false pride. He had already learned to play in his home town from a pianist stranded there, and while he was a medical student in Vienna he had studied at the Conservatory where he was considered a talented musician of great promise. But here, too, he was neither serious nor diligent enough to develop his art systematically. He soon became entirely content with the impression he made on his acquaintances, or, rather with the pleasure he gave them by his playing. For a while he had a position as pianist in a suburban dancing-school.

Fellow-students and table-companions tried to introduce him into fashionable houses in the same capacity, but on such occasions he would play only what suited him and as long as he chose. His conversations with the young girls present were not always harmless, and he drank more than he could carry. Once, playing for a dance in the house of a wealthy banker, he embarrassed several couples with flattering but improper remarks, and ended up by playing a wild cancan and singing a risqué song with his powerful, bass voice. The host gave him a severe calling down, but Nachtigall, blissfully hilarious, got up and embraced him. The latter was furious and, although himself a Jew, hurled a common insult at him. Nachtigall at once retaliated with a powerful box on his ears, and this definitely concluded his career in the fashionable houses of the city. He behaved better, on the whole, in more intimate circles, although sometimes when the hour was late, he had to be put out of the place by force. But the following morning all was forgiven and forgotten. One day, long after his friends had graduated, he disappeared from the city without a word. For a few months he sent post cards from various Russian and Polish cities, and once Fridolin, who was one of Nachtigall’s favorites, was reminded of his existence not only by a card, but by a request for a moderate sum of money, without explanation. Fridolin sent it at once, but never received a word of thanks or any other sign of life from Nachtigall.

At this moment, however, eight years later, at a quarter to one in the morning, Nachtigall insisted on paying his debt, and took the exact amount in bank-notes from a rather shabby pocket-book. As the latter was fairly well filled, Fridolin accepted the repayment with a good conscience.

“Are you getting along well,” he asked with a smile, in order to make sure.

“I can’t complain,” replied Nachtigall. Placing his hand on Fridolin’s arm, he continued: “But tell me, why are you here so late at night?”

Fridolin explained that he had needed a cup of coffee after visiting a patient, although he didn’t say, without quite knowing why, that he hadn’t found his patient alive. Then he talked in very general terms of his duties at the hospital and his private practice, and mentioned that he was happily married, and the father of a six-year old girl.

Nachtigall in his turn, explained that he had spent the time as a pianist in every possible sort of Polish,

Roumanian, Serbian and Bulgarian city and town, just as Fridolin had surmised. He had a wife and four children living in Lemberg, and he laughed heartily, as though it were unusually jolly to have four children, all of them living in Lemberg, and all by one and the same woman. He had been back in Vienna since the preceding fall. The vaudeville company he had been with had suddenly gone to pieces. He was now playing anywhere and everywhere, anything that happened to come along, sometimes in two or three different houses the same night. For example, down there in that basement — not at all a fashionable place, as he remarked, really a sort of bowling alley, and with very doubtful patrons.... "But if you have to provide for four children and a wife in Lemberg" — he laughed again, though not quite as gaily as before, and added: "But sometimes I am privately engaged." Noticing a reminiscent smile on Fridolin's face, he continued: "Not just in the houses of bankers and such, but in all kinds of circles, even larger ones, both public and secret."

"Secret?" Fridolin asked.

Nachtigall looked straight before him with a gloomy and crafty air, and said: "They will be calling for me again in a minute."

"What, are you playing somewhere else tonight?"

"Yes, they only begin there at two."

"It must be an unusually smart place."

"Yes and no," said Nachtigall, laughing, but he became serious again at once.

"Yes and no?" queried Fridolin, curiously.

Nachtigall bent across the table.

"I'm playing tonight in a private house, but I don't know whose it is."

"Then you're playing there for the first time?" Fridolin asked with increasing interest.

"No, it's the third time, but it will probably be a different house again."

"I don't understand."

"Neither do I," said Nachtigall, laughing, "but you'd better not ask any more."

"Oh, I see," remarked Fridolin.

"No, you're wrong. It's not what you think. I've seen a great deal in my time. It's unbelievable what one sees in such small towns, especially in Roumania, but here..." He drew back the yellow curtain from the window, looked out on the street and said as if to himself: "Not here yet." Then he turned to Fridolin and explained: "I mean the carriage. There's always a carriage to call for me, a different one each time."

"You're making me very curious, Nachtigall," Fridolin assured him.

"Listen to me," said Nachtigall after a slight pause. "I'd like to be able to arrange it — but how can I do it —" Suddenly he burst out: "Have you got plenty of nerve?"

"That's a strange question," said Fridolin in the tone of an offended fraternity student.

"I don't mean that."

"Well, what do you mean? — Why does one need so much courage for this affair? What can possibly happen?" He gave a short and contemptuous laugh.

"Nothing can happen to me. At best this would be the last time — but perhaps that may he the case anyhow." He stopped and looked out again through the crevice in the curtain.

"Well, then where's the difficulty?"

"What did you say?" asked Nachtigall, as if coming out of a dream.

"Tell me the rest of the story, now that you've started. A secret party? Closed affair? Nothing but invited guests?"

"I don't know. The last time there were thirty people, and the first time only sixteen."

“A ball?”

“Of course, a ball.” He seemed to be sorry he had spoken of the matter at all.

“And you’re furnishing the music for the occasion?”

“What do you mean — for the occasion? I don’t know for what occasion. I simply play — with bandaged eyes.”

“Nachtigall, what do you mean?” Nachtigall sighed a little and continued: “Unfortunately my eyes are not completely bandaged, so that I can occasionally see something. I can see through the black silk handkerchief over my eyes in the mirror opposite....” And he stopped. “In other words,” said Fridolin impatiently and contemptuously, but feeling strangely excited, “naked females.”

“Don’t say females,” replied Nachtigall in an offended tone, “you never saw such women.”

Fridolin hemmed and hawed a little. “And what’s the price of admission?” he asked casually.

“Do you mean tickets and such? There are none.”

“Well, how does one gain admittance?” asked Fridolin with compressed lips and tapping on the table with his fingers.

“You have to know the password, and it’s a new one each time.”

“And what’s the one for tonight?”

“I don’t know yet. I’ll only find out from the coachman.”

“Take me along, Nachtigall.”

“Impossible. It’s too dangerous.”

“But a minute ago you yourself spoke... of being willing to... I think you can manage all right.”

Nachtigall looked at him critically and said: “It would be absolutely impossible in your street clothes, for everyone is masked, men and women. As you haven’t a masquerade outfit with you, it’s out of the question. Perhaps the next time. I’ll try to figure out some way.” He listened attentively, peered again through the opening in the curtain and said with a sigh of relief: “There’s my carriage, good-bye.”

Fridolin hung on to his arm and said: “You can’t get away that way. You’ve got to take me along.”

“But my dear man...”

“Leave it to me. I know that it’s dangerous. Perhaps that’s the very thing that tempts me.”

“But I’ve already told you — without costume and mask—”

“There are places to rent costumes.”

“At one o’clock in the morning?”

“Listen here, Nachtigall. There’s just such a place at the corner of Wickenburg Strasse. I walk past it several times a day.” And he added, with growing excitement:

“You stay here for another quarter of an hour, Nachtigall. In the meantime I’ll see what luck I have. The proprietor of the costume shop probably lives in the same building. If he doesn’t — well, then I’ll simply give it up for tonight. Let fate decide the question. There’s a café in the same building. I think it’s called Café Vindobona. You tell the coachman that you’ve forgotten something in the café, walk in, and I’ll he waiting near the door. Then you can give me the password and get back into your carriage. If I manage to get a costume I’ll take a cab and immediately follow you. The rest will take care of itself. I give you my word of honor, Nachtigall, that if you run any risk, I’ll assume complete responsibility.”

Nachtigall had tried several times to interrupt Fridolin, but it was useless —

The former threw some money on the table to pay his bill, including a generous tip which seemed appropriate for the style of the night, and left. A closed carriage was standing outside. A coachman dressed entirely in black with a tall silk hat, sat on the box, motionless. It looks like a mourning-coach, Fridolin thought. He ran down the street and reached the corner-house he was looking for a few minutes later. He rang the bell, inquired from the care-taker whether the costumer Gibiser lived in the house, and hoped in the bottom of his heart that he would receive a negative answer. But Gibiser actually lived there, on the floor below that of the costume shop. The care-taker did not seem especially surprised at having such a late caller. Made affable by Fridolin's liberal tip, he stated that it was not unusual during the carnival for people to come at such a late hour to hire costumes. He lighted the way from below with a candle until Fridolin had rung the bell on the second floor. Herr Gibiser himself opened the door for him, as if he had been waiting there. He was a bald-headed, haggard man and wore an old-fashioned, flowered dressing-gown and a tasselled, Turkish cap which made him look like a foolish old man on the stage. Fridolin asked for a costume and said that the price did not matter, whereupon Herr Gibiser remarked, almost disdainfully: "I ask a fair price, no more." He led the way up a winding staircase into the store. There was an odor of silk, velvet, perfume, dust and withered flowers, and a glitter of silver and red out of the indistinct darkness. A number of little electric bulbs suddenly shone between the open cabinets of a long, narrow passage, the end of which was enveloped in darkness. There were all kinds of costumes hanging to the right and to the left. On one side knights, squires, peasants, hunters, scholars, Orientals and clowns; on the other, ladies-at-court, baronesses, peasant women, lady's maids, queens of the night. The corresponding head-dresses were on a shelf above the costumes. Fridolin felt as though he were walking through a gallery of hanged people who were on the point of asking each other to dance. Herr Gibiser followed him. Finally he asked: "Is there anything special you want? Louis Quatorze, Directoire, or Old-German?"

"I need a dark cassock and a black mask, that's all."

At this moment the clink of glasses rang out from the end of the passage. Fridolin was startled and looked at the costumer, as though he felt an explanation were due. Gibiser, however, merely groped for a switch which was concealed somewhere. A blinding light was diffused over the entire passage down to the end where a little table, covered with plates, glasses and bottles, could be seen. Two men, dressed in the red robes of vehmic judges, sprang up from two chairs beside the table and a graceful little girl disappeared at the same moment. Gibiser rushed forward with long strides, reached across the table and grabbed a white wig in his hand. Simultaneously a young and charming girl, still almost a child, wearing a Pierrette costume, wriggled out from under the table and ran along the passage to Fridolin who caught her in his arms. Gibiser dropped the white wig and grabbed the two vehmic judges by their robes. At the same time he called out to Fridolin: "Hold on to that girl for me." The child pressed against Fridolin as though sure of protection. Her little oval face was covered with powder and several beauty spots, and a fragrance of roses and powder arose from her delicate breasts. There was a smile of impish desire in her eyes.

"Gentlemen," cried Gibiser, "you will stay here while I call the police."

"What's got into you?" they exclaimed, and continued as if with one voice: "We were invited by the young lady."

Gibiser released his hold and Fridolin heard him saying: "You will have to explain this. Couldn't you see that the girl was deranged? Then turning to Fridolin, he said: "Sorry to keep you waiting."

"Oh, it doesn't matter," said Fridolin.

He would have liked to stay, or, better still, to take the girl with him, no matter where — and whatever the consequences. She looked up at him with alluring and childlike eyes, as if spellbound. The men at the end of the passage were arguing excitedly. Gibiser turned to Fridolin and asked in a matter-of-fact way: "You wanted a cassock, a pilgrim's hat and a mask?"

"No," said Pierrette with gleaming eyes, "you must give this gentleman a cloak lined with ermine and a doublet of red silk."

"Don't you budge from my side," answered Gibiser. Then he pointed to a dark frock hanging between a medieval soldier and a Venetian Senator, and said: "That's about your size and here's the hat. Take it quick."

The two strange men protested again: "You'll have to let us out at once, Herr Chibisier." Fridolin noticed with surprise the French pronunciation of the name Gibiser.

"That's out of the question," replied the costumer scornfully. "You'll kindly wait here until I return."

Meanwhile Fridolin slipped into the cassock and tied the white cords. Gibiser, who was standing on a narrow ladder, handed him the black, broad-rimmed pilgrim's hat, and he put it on. But he did all this unwillingly, being more and more convinced that danger was threatening Pierrette and that it was his duty to remain and help her. The mask which Gibiser gave him and which he at once tried on, smelt strange and rather disagreeable.

"You walk down ahead of me," Gibiser commanded the girl, pointing to the stairs. Pierrette turned and waved a gay, yet wistful farewell. Fridolin's eyes followed the direction of her gaze. The two men were no longer in costume but wore evening clothes and white ties, though their faces were still covered by their red masks. Pierrette went down the winding staircase with a light step, Gibiser behind her and Fridolin following in the rear. In the anteroom below Gibiser opened a door leading to the inner rooms and said to Pierrette: "Go to bed at once, you depraved creature. I'll talk to you as soon as I've settled with those two upstairs."

She stood in the doorway, white and delicate, and with a glance at Fridolin, sadly shook her head. He noticed with surprise, in a large wall-mirror to the right, a haggard pilgrim who seemed to be himself. At the same time he knew very well that it could be no other.

The girl disappeared and the old costumer locked the door behind her. Then he opened the entrance door and hurried Fridolin out into the hallway.

"Well," said Fridolin, "how much do I owe you?"

"Never mind, sir, you can pay when you return the things. I'll trust you."

Fridolin, however, refused to move. "Swear that you won't hurt that poor child," he said.

"What business is it of yours?"

"I heard you, a minute ago, say that the girl was insane — and just now you called her a depraved creature. That sounds pretty contradictory."

"Well," replied Gibiser theatrically, "aren't insanity and depravity the same in the eyes of God?"

Fridolin shuddered with disgust. "Whatever it is," he remarked, "there are ways and means of attending to it. I am a doctor. We'll have another talk about this tomorrow."

Gibiser laughed mockingly without uttering a sound. A light flared up in the hallway, and the door between them was closed and immediately bolted. Fridolin took off the hat, cassock and mask while going downstairs, carrying the bundle under his arm. The care-taker opened the outer door and Fridolin saw the mourning-coach standing opposite with the motionless driver on the box. Nachtigall was just on the point of leaving the café, and seemed somewhat taken aback at seeing Fridolin at hand so promptly.

"Then you did manage to get a costume?"

"You can see for yourself. What's the password?"

"You insist on knowing it?"

"Absolutely."

"Well then — it's Denmark."

"Are you mad, Nachtigall?"

"Why mad?"

"Oh, never mind — I was at the seashore in Denmark this summer. Get back into your carriage — but not too fast, so that I'll have time to take a cab over on the other side."

Nachtigall nodded and leisurely lighted a cigarette. Fridolin quickly crossed the street, hailed a cab in an offhand way, as though he were playing a joke, and told the driver to follow the mourning-coach which was just starting in front of them.

They crossed Alser Strasse, and drove on through dim, deserted side-streets under a railroad viaduct toward the suburbs.

Fridolin was afraid that the driver might lose sight of the carriage, but whenever he put his head out of the open window, into the abnormally warm air, he always saw it. It was a moderate distance ahead of them, and the coachman with his high, black silk hat sat motionless on the box. This business may end badly, thought Fridolin. At the same time he remembered the fragrance of roses and powder that had arisen from Pierrette's breasts. What strange story is behind all that? he wondered. I shouldn't have left — perhaps it was even a great mistake — I wonder where I am now.

The road wound slowly up-hill between modest villas. Fridolin thought that he now had his bearings. He had sometimes come this way on walks, years ago. It must be the Galitzinberg that he was going up. Down to his left he could see the city indistinct in the mist, but glimmering with a thousand lights. He heard the rumbling of wheels behind him and looked out of the window back of him. There were two carriages following his. He was glad of that, for now the driver of the mourning-coach would certainly not be suspicious of him.

With a violent jolt, the cab turned into a side street and went down into something like a ravine, between iron fences, stone walls and terraces. Fridolin realized that it was high time to put on his costume. He took off his fur coat and slipped into the cassock, just as he slipped into the sleeves of his white linen coat every morning in his ward at the hospital. He was relieved to think that, if everything went well, it would be only a few hours before he would be back again by the beds of his patients, ready to give aid.

His cab stopped. What if I don't get out at all, Fridolin thought, and go back at once? But go where? To little Pierrette? To the girl in Buchfeld Strasse? Or to Marianne, the daughter of the deceased? Or perhaps home? He shuddered slightly and decided he'd rather go anywhere than home. Was it because it was farthest to go? No, I can't turn back, he thought. I must go through with this, even if it means death. And he laughed at himself, using such a big word but without feeling very cheerful about it.

A garden gate stood wide open. The mourning-coach drove on deeper into the ravine, or into the darkness that seemed like one. Nachtigall must, therefore, have got out. Fridolin quickly sprang out of the cab and told the driver to wait for him up at the turn, no matter how late he might be. To make sure of him, he paid him well in advance and promised him a large sum for the return trip. The other carriages drove up and Fridolin saw the veiled figure of a woman step out of the first. Then he turned into the garden and put on his mask. A narrow path, lighted up by a lamp from the house, led to the entrance. Doors opened before him, and he found himself in a narrow, white vestibule. He could hear an organ playing, and two servants in dark livery, their faces covered by gray masks, stood on each side of him.

Two voices whispered in unison: "Password?" He replied: "Denmark." One of them took his fur coat and disappeared with it into an adjoining room, while the other opened a door. Fridolin entered a dimly lighted room with high ceilings, hung on all sides with black silk. Sixteen to twenty people masked and dressed as monks and nuns were walking up and down. The gently swelling strains of Italian church music came from above. A small group, composed of three nuns and two monks, stood in a corner of the room. They watched him for a second, but turned away again at once, almost deliberately. Fridolin, noticing that he was the only one who wore a hat, took his off and walked up and down as nonchalantly as possible. A monk brushed against him and nodded a greeting, but from behind the mask Fridolin encountered a searching and penetrating glance. A strange, heavy perfume, as of Southern gardens, scented the room. Again an arm brushed against him, but this time it was that of a nun. Like all the others she had a black veil over her face, head and neck, a blood-red mouth glowed under the black laces of the mask. Where am I? thought Fridolin. Among lunatics? Or conspirators? Is this a meeting of some religious sect? Can it be that Nachtigall was ordered or paid to bring along some stranger to be the target of their jokes? But everything seemed too serious, too intense, too uncanny for a masquerade prank. A woman's voice joined the strains of the organ and an Old-Italian sacred aria resounded through the room. They all stood still and listened and Fridolin surrendered himself for a moment to the wondrously swelling melody. A soft voice suddenly whispered from behind: "Don't turn around. There's still a chance for you to get away. You don't belong here. If it's discovered it will go hard with you."

Fridolin gave a frightened start. For a second he thought of leaving, but his curiosity, the allurement and, above all, his pride, were stronger than any of his misgivings. Now that I've gone this far, he thought, I don't care what happens. And he shook his head negatively without turning around.

The voice behind him whispered: "I should feel very sorry for you." He turned and looked at her. He saw the blood-red mouth glimmering under the lace. Dark eyes were fixed on him. "I shall stay," he said in a heroic voice which he hardly recognized as his own, and he looked away again. The song was now ringing through the room; the organ had a new sound which was anything but sacred. It was worldly, voluptuous, and pealing. Looking around Fridolin saw that all the nuns had disappeared and that only the monks were left. The voice had meanwhile also changed. It rose by way of an artistically executed trill from its low and serious pitch to a high and jubilant tone. In place of the organ a piano had suddenly chimed in with its worldly and brazen tunes. Fridolin at once recognized Nachtigall's wild and inflammatory touch. The woman's voice which had been so reverent a moment before had vanished with a last wild, voluptuous outburst through the ceiling, as it were, into infinity. Doors opened to the right and left. On one side Fridolin recognized the indistinct outlines of Nachtigall's figure; the room opposite was radiant with a blaze of light. All the women were standing there motionless. They wore dark veils over their heads, faces and necks and black masks over their eyes, but otherwise they were completely naked. Fridolin's eyes wandered eagerly from voluptuous to slender bodies, from delicate figures to those luxuriously developed. He realized that each of these women would forever be a mystery, and that the enigma of their, large eyes peering at him from beneath the black masks would remain unsolved. The delight of beholding was changed to an almost unbearable agony of desire. And the others seemed to experience a similar sensation. The first gasps of rapture had changed to sighs that held a note very near anguish. A cry broke out somewhere. Suddenly all of them, as though pursued, rushed from the darkened room to the women, who received them with wild and wicked laughter. The men were no longer in cassocks, but dressed as cavaliers, in white, yellow, blue and red. Fridolin was the only one in monk's dress. Somewhat nervously he slunk into the farthest corner, where he was near Nachtigall whose back was turned to him. Nachtigall had a bandage over his eyes, but Fridolin thought he could see him peering underneath the bandage into the tall mirror opposite. In it the cavaliers with their gay-colored costumes were reflected, dancing with their naked partners.

A woman came up suddenly behind Fridolin and whispered — for no one spoke aloud, as if the voices, too, were to remain a secret —: "What is the matter? Why don't you dance?"

Fridolin, seeing two noblemen watch fixedly from another corner, suspected that this woman with the boyish and slender figure, was sent to put him to the test. In spite of it he meant to dance with her, but at that moment another woman left her partner and walked quickly up to him. He knew at once that it was the same one who had already warned him. She pretended that she had just seen him and whispered, in a voice loud enough to be heard in the other corner: “Returned at last!” Laughingly, she continued: “All your efforts are useless. I know you.” Then turning to the woman with the boyish figure, she said: “Let me have him for just two minutes, then he shall be yours again until morning, if you wish.” In a softer voice she added: “It is really he.” The other replied in astonishment: “Really?”- and with a light step went to join the cavaliers in the corner.

Alone with Fridolin, the woman cautioned him, “Don’t ask questions, and don’t be surprised at anything. I tried to lead them astray, but you can’t continue to deceive them for long. Go, before it is too late — and it may be too late at almost any moment — and be careful that no one follows you. No one must know who you are. There would be no more peace and quiet for you. Go!”

“Will I see you again?”

“Then I shall stay.”

“My life, at most, is at stake,” he said, “and I’m ready at this moment to give it for you.” He took her hands and tried to draw her to him.

She whispered again, almost despairingly: “Go!”

He laughed, and he heard himself laughing as in a dream. “But I know what I’m doing. You are not all here just to make us mad by looking at you. You are doing this to unnerve me still more.”

“It will soon be too late. You must go!”

But he wouldn’t listen to her. “Do you mean to say that there are no rooms here for the convenience of congenial couples? Will all these people leave with just a courteous ‘good-bye’? They don’t look like it.”

He pointed to the dancers, glowing white bodies closely pressed against the blue, red and yellow silk of their partners, circling, in the brilliant, mirrored room adjoining, to the wild tunes of the piano. It seemed to him that no longer was any attention paid to him and the woman beside him. They stood alone in the semi-dark middle room.

“You are hoping in vain,” she whispered. “There are no such rooms here. This is your last opportunity to leave.”

“Come with me!”

She shook her head violently, despairingly.

He laughed again, ‘not recognizing his laughter. “You’re making game of me. Did all these men and women come here merely to fan the flames of their desire and then depart? Who can forbid you to come away with me if you choose?”

She took a deep breath and drooped her head.

“Oh, now I understand,” he said. “That’s the punishment you impose on those who come here uninvited. You couldn’t have invented a more cruel one. Please let me off and forgive me. Impose some other penalty, anything but that I must leave you.”

“You are mad. I can’t go with you, let alone anyone else. Whomever I went with would forfeit his life and mine.”

Fridolin felt intoxicated, not only with her, her fragrant body and her red-glowing mouth — not only with the atmosphere of this room and the voluptuous mysteries that surrounded him — he was intoxicated, his thirst unsatisfied, with all the experiences of the night, none of which had come to a satisfactory conclusion. He was intoxicated with himself, with his boldness, the change he felt in himself, and he touched the veil which was wound about her head, as though he intended to remove it.

She seized his hands. “One night during the dance here one of the men took it into his head to tear the veil from one of us. They ripped the mask from his face and drove him out with whips.”

“And — she?”

“Did you read of a beautiful young girl, only a few weeks ago, who took poison the day before her wedding?”

He remembered the incident, even the name, and mentioned it. “Wasn’t it a girl of the nobility who was engaged to marry an Italian Prince?”

She nodded.

One of the cavaliers, the most distinguished looking of them all and the only one dressed in white, suddenly stopped before them. With a slight bow, courteous but imperative, he asked the woman with whom Fridolin was talking to dance with him. She seemed to hesitate a moment, but he put his arm around her waist and they drifted away to join the other couples in the adjoining room.

A sudden feeling of solitude made Fridolin shiver as if with cold. He looked about him. Nobody seemed to be paying any attention to him. This was perhaps his last chance to leave with impunity. He didn’t know, however, why it was that he remained spell-bound in his corner where he now felt sure that he was not observed. It might be his aversion to an inglorious and perhaps ridiculous retreat, or the excruciating ungratified desire for the beautiful woman whose fragrance was still in his nostrils. Or he may have stayed because he vaguely hoped that all that had happened so far was intended as a test of his courage and that this magnificent woman would be his reward. It was clear at any rate that the strain was too great to be endured, and that, no matter what the danger, he would have to end it. It could hardly cost him his life, no matter what he decided. He might be among fools, or libertines, but certainly not among rascals or criminals. The thought occurred to him to acknowledge himself as an intruder and to place himself at their disposal in chivalrous fashion. This night could only conclude in such a manner, — with a harmonious finale, as it were — if it were to mean more than a wild, shadow-like succession of gloomy and lascivious adventures, all without an end. So, taking a deep breath, he prepared to carry out his plan.

At this moment, however, a voice whispered beside him: “Password!” A cavalier in black had stepped up to him unseen. As Fridolin didn’t reply, he repeated his question. “Denmark,” said Fridolin.

“That’s right, sir, that’s the password for admittance, but what’s the password of the house, may I ask?”

Fridolin was silent.

“Won’t you be kind’ enough to tell me the password of the house?” It sounded like a sharp threat.

Fridolin shrugged his shoulders. The other walked to the middle of the room and raised his hand. The piano ceased playing and the dance stopped. Two other cavaliers, one in yellow, the other in red, stepped up. “The password, sir,” they said simultaneously.

“I have forgotten it,” replied Fridolin with a vacant smile but feeling quite calm.

“That’s unfortunate,” said the gentleman in yellow, “for here it doesn’t matter whether you have forgotten it or if you never knew it.”

The other men flocked in and the doors on both sides were closed. Fridolin stood alone in the garb of a monk in the midst of the gay-colored cavaliers.

“Take off your mask!” several of them demanded. Fridolin held out his arm to protect himself. It seemed a thousand times worse to be the only one unmasked amongst so many that were, than to stand suddenly naked amongst people who were dressed. He replied firmly: “If my appearance here has offended any of the gentlemen present, I am ready to give satisfaction in the usual manner, but I shall take off my mask only if all of you will do the same."

"It's not a question of satisfaction," said the cavalier in red, who until now had not spoken, "but one of expiation."

"Take off your mask!" commanded another in a high-pitched, insolent voice which reminded Fridolin of an officer giving orders, "and we'll tell you to your face what's in store for you."

"I shall not take it off," said Fridolin in an even sharper tone, "and woe to him who dares to touch me."

A hand suddenly reached out, as if to tear off the mask, when a door suddenly opened and one of the women — Fridolin did not doubt which one it was — stood there, dressed as a nun, as he had first seen her. The others could be seen behind her in the brilliantly lighted room, naked, with veiled faces, crowding together in a terrified group. The door at once closed again.

"Leave him alone," said the nun. "I am ready to redeem him."

There was a short, deep silence, as though something monstrous had happened. The cavalier in black who had first demanded the password from Fridolin turned to the nun, saying: "You know what you are taking upon yourself in doing this."

"I know."

There was a general sigh of relief from those present.

"You are free," said the cavalier to Fridolin. "Leave this house at once and be careful not to inquire further into what you have seen here. If you attempt to put anyone on our trail, whether you succeed or not — you will be doomed."

Fridolin stood motionless. "How is this woman — to redeem me?" he asked.

There was no answer. Hands pointed to the door indicated that he must go.

Fridolin shook his head. "Impose what punishment you wish, gentlemen, I won't let this woman pay for me."

"You would be unable, in any case, to change her lot," the cavalier in black said very gently. "When a promise has been made here there is no turning back."

The nun slowly nodded, as if to confirm the statement. "Go!" she said to Fridolin.

"No," replied the latter, elevating his voice. "Life means nothing to me if I must leave here without you. I shall not ask who you are or where you come from. What difference can it make to you, gentlemen, whether or not you keep up this carnival comedy, though it may aim at a serious conclusion. Whoever you may be, you surely lead other lives. I won't play a part, here or elsewhere, and if I have been forced to do so up to now, I shall give it up. I feel that a fate has overtaken me which has nothing to do with this foolery. I will tell you my name, take off my mask and be responsible for the consequences."

"Don't do it," exclaimed the nun, "you would only ruin yourself without saving me. Go!" Then she turned to the others, saying: "Here I am, take me — all of you!" The dark costume dropped from her, as if by magic. She stood there in the radiance of her white body; reached for the veil which was wrapped about her head, face and neck and unwound it with a wonderful circular motion. It sank to the floor, dark hair fell in great profusion over her shoulders, breasts and hips — but before Fridolin could even glance at her face, he was seized by irresistible arms, and pushed to the door. A moment later he found himself in the anteroom, the door closed behind him. A masked servant brought him his fur coat and helped him put it on. The main door opened automatically, and as if driven by some invisible force, he hurried out. As he stood on the street the light behind disappeared. The house stood there in silence with closed windows from which not a glimmer issued. I must remember everything clearly, was his main thought; I must find the house again — the rest will follow as a matter of course.

Darkness surrounded him. The dull reddish glow of a street lamp was visible a slight distance above where the cab was to wait for him. The mourning-coach drove up from the street below, as though he had called it. A servant opened the door.

"I have my own cab," said Fridolin. When the servant shook his head, Fridolin continued: "If it has already gone, I'll walk back to the city."

The man replied with a wave of his hand which was anything but servant-like, so that objection was out of the question. The ridiculously high silk hat of the coachman towered up into the night. The wind was blowing a gale; violet clouds raced across the sky. Fridolin felt that, after his previous experience, there was nothing for him to do but to get into the carriage. It started the moment he was inside.

He resolved, as soon as possible, to clear up the mystery of his adventure, no matter how dangerous it might be. His life, it seemed, would not have the slightest meaning any more, if he did not succeed in finding the incomprehensible woman who at this very moment was paying for his safety. It was only too easy to guess the price. But why should she sacrifice herself for him? To sacrifice —? Was she the kind of woman to whom the things that were facing her, that she was now submitting to, could mean a sacrifice? If she attended these affairs — and since she seemed to understand the rules so well it could not be her first time — what difference could it make to her if she belonged to one of the cavaliers, or to all? Indeed, could she possibly be anything but a woman of easy virtue? Were any of them anything else? That's what they were, without a doubt, even if all of them led another, more normal life, so to speak, besides this one of promiscuity. Perhaps everything he had just gone through had been only an outrageous joke. A joke planned, prepared and even rehearsed for such an occasion when some bold outsider should be caught intruding?

And yet, as he thought of the woman who had warned him from the very beginning, who was now ready to pay for him — he remembered something in her voice, her bearing, in the royal nobility of her nude body which could not possibly have been false. Or was it possible that only his sudden appearance had caused her to change? After everything that had happened, such a supposition did not seem impossible. There was no conceit in this idea. There may be hours or nights, he thought, in which some strange, irresistible charm emanates from men who under normal circumstances have no special power over the other sex.

The carriage continued up-hill. If all were well, he should have turned into the main street long ago. What were they going to do with him? Where was the carriage taking him? Was the comedy to be continued elsewhere? And what would the continuation be? A solution of the mystery and a happy reunion at some other place. Would he be rewarded for passing the test so creditably and made a member of the secret society? Was he to have unchallenged possession of the lovely nun? The windows of the carriage were closed and Fridolin tried to look out — but they were opaque. He attempted to open them, first on one side, then on the other, but it was impossible. The glass partition between him and the coachman's box was just as thick and just as firmly closed. He knocked on the glass, he called, he shouted, but the carriage went on. He tried to open both the doors, but they wouldn't budge. His renewed calling was drowned by the rattling of the wheels and the roaring of the wind. The carriage began to jolt, going down-hill, faster and faster. Fridolin, uneasy and alarmed, was on the point of smashing one of the blind windows, when the carriage suddenly stopped. Both doors opened together, as if by some mechanism, and as though Fridolin had been ironically given the choice between one side or the other. He jumped out, the doors closed with a bang — and without the coachman paying the slightest attention to him, the carriage drove away across the open field into the darkness of the night.

The sky was overcast, clouds raced across it, and the wind whistled. Fridolin stood in the snow which shed a faint light round about. He was alone, his open fur coat over his monk's costume, the pilgrim's hat on his head; and an uncanny feeling overcame him. The main street was a slight distance away, where a row of dimly-flickering street lamps indicated the direction of the city. However, he ran straight down across the sloping, snow-covered field, which shortened the way, so as to get among people as quickly as possible. His feet soaked, he came into a narrow, almost unlighted street, and at first walked along between high board fences which groaned in the wind. Turning the next corner, he reached a somewhat wider street, where scattered little houses alternated with empty building lots. Somewhere a tower clock struck three.

Someone was coming towards him. The person wore a short jacket, he had his hands in his trouser pockets, his head was down between his shoulders, and his hat was pulled over his forehead. Fridolin got ready for an attack, but the tramp unexpectedly turned and ran. What does that mean? he asked himself. Then he decided that he must present a very uncanny appearance, took off the pilgrim's hat and buttoned his coat, underneath which the monk's gown was flapping around his ankles. Again he turned a corner into a suburban main street. A man in peasant's dress walked past and spoke to him, thinking him a priest. The light of a street lamp fell upon a sign on a corner house. Liebhartstal — then he wasn't very far from the house which he had left less than an hour before. For a second he felt tempted to retrace his steps and to wait in the vicinity for further developments. But he gave up the idea when he realized that he would only expose himself to grave danger without solving the mystery. As he imagined what was probably taking place in the villa at this very moment he was filled with wrath, despair, shame and fear. This state of mind was so unbearable that it almost made him sorry the tramp had not attacked him; in fact, he almost regretted that he wasn't lying against the fence in the deserted street with a knife-gash in his side. That, at least, might have given some significance to this senseless night with its childish adventures, all of which had been so ruthlessly cut short. It seemed positively ridiculous to return home, as he now intended doing. But nothing was lost as yet. There was another day ahead, and he swore that he would not rest until he had found again the beautiful woman whose dazzling nakedness had so intoxicated him. It was only now that he thought of Albertina, but with a feeling that she, too, would first have to be won. He could not, must not, be reunited with her until he had deceived her with all the other women of the night. With the naked woman, with Pierrette, with Marianne, with Mizzi in the narrow street. And shouldn't he also try to find the insolent student who had bumped into him, so that he might challenge him to a duel with sabres or, better still, with pistols? What did someone else's life, what did his own, matter to him? Is one always to stake one's life just from a sense of duty or self-sacrifice, and never because of a whim or a passion, or simply to match oneself against Fate?

Again the thought came to him that even now the germ of a fatal disease might be in his body. Wouldn't it be silly to die just because a child with diphtheria had coughed in his face? Perhaps he was already ill. Wasn't he feverish? Perhaps at this moment he was lying at home in bed — and everything he thought he had experienced was merely delirium?

Fridolin opened his eyes as wide as possible, passed his hand over his forehead and cheeks and felt his pulse. It scarcely beat faster. Everything was all right. He was completely awake.

He continued along the street, towards the city. A few market-wagons rumbled by, and now and then he met poorly dressed people whose day was just beginning. Behind the window of a coffee-house, at a table over which a gas-flame flickered, sat a fat man with a scarf around his neck, his head on his hands, fast asleep. The houses were still enveloped in darkness, though here and there a few windows were lighted and Fridolin thought he could feel the people gradually awaking. It seemed that he could see them stretching themselves in their beds and preparing for their pitiful and strenuous day. A new day faced him, too, but for him it wasn't pitiful and dull. And with a strange, happy beating of his heart, he realized that in a few hours he would be walking around between the beds of his patients in his white hospital coat. A one-horse cab stood at the next corner, the coachman asleep on the box. Fridolin awakened him, gave his address and got in.

IT WAS FOUR o'clock in the morning when Fridolin walked up the steps of his home. Before doing anything else he went into his office and carefully locked the masquerade costume in a closet. As he wished not to wake Albertina, he took off his shoes and clothes before going into the bedroom, and very cautiously turned on the light on the little table beside his bed. Albertina was lying there quietly, with her arms folded under her head. Her lips were half-open, and painful shadows surrounded them. It was a face that Fridolin did not know. He bent down over her, and at once her forehead became lined with furrows, as though someone had touched it, and her features seemed strangely distorted. Suddenly, still in her sleep, she laughed so shrilly that he became frightened. Involuntarily he called her name. She laughed again, as if in answer, in a strange, almost uncanny manner. Fridolin called her in a louder voice, and she opened her eyes, slowly and with difficulty. She stared at him, as though she did not recognize him.

"Albertina!" he cried for the third time. As she gained consciousness, an expression of fear, even of terror came into her eyes. Half awake, and seemingly in despair, she raised her arms.

"What's the matter?" asked Fridolin with bated breath. As she still stared at him, terrified, he added, to reassure her: "It is I, Albertina." She breathed deeply, tried to smile, dropped her arms on the bed cover and said, in a far away voice: "Is it morning yet?"

"It will be very soon," replied Fridolin, "it's past four o'clock. I've just come home." She was silent and he continued: "The Councilor is dead. He was dying when I arrived, and naturally I couldn't — leave immediately."

She nodded, but hardly seemed to have heard or understood him. She stared into space, as though she could see through him. He felt that she must know of his recent experiences — and at the same time the idea seemed ridiculous. He bent down and touched her forehead. She shuddered slightly.

"What's the matter?" he asked again.

She shook her head slowly and he passed his hand gently over her hair. "Albertina, what's the matter?"

"I've been dreaming," she said distantly.

"What have you been dreaming?" he asked mildly.

"Oh, so much, I can't quite remember."

"Perhaps if you try?"

"It was all so confused — and I'm tired. You must be tired, too."

"Not in the least. I don't think I shall go to bed at all. You know, when I come home so late — it would really be best to sit right down to my desk — it's just in such morning hours—" He interrupted himself. "Wouldn't it be better if you told me your dream?" He smiled a little unnaturally.

She replied: "You really ought to lie down and take a little rest."

He hesitated a moment, then he did as she suggested and stretched himself beside her, though he was careful not to touch her. There shall be a sword between us, he thought, remembering a remark he had once made, half joking, on a similar occasion. They lay there silently with open eyes, and they felt both their proximity and the distance that separated them. After a while he raised his head on his arm and looked at her for a long time, as though he could see much more than just the outlines of her face.

"Your dream!" he hinted, once more. She must just have been waiting for him to speak. She held out her hand to him, he took it and, more absent-mindedly than tenderly, clasped his hand about her slender fingers, as he had often done before. She began: “Do you still remember the room in the little villa on Lake Wörther, where I lived with Mother and Father the summer we became engaged?”

He nodded.

“Well, it was there the dream began. I was entering this house, like an actress stepping onto the stage — I don’t know where I came from. My parents seemed to have gone on a journey and left me alone. That surprised me, for our wedding was the next day. But my wedding-dress hadn’t yet arrived. I thought I might be mistaken, and I opened the wardrobe to look. Instead of the wedding dress a great many other clothes, like fancy dress costumes, were hanging there, opera-like, gorgeous, Oriental. Which shall I wear for the wedding? I thought. Then the wardrobe was suddenly closed again, or it disappeared, I don’t remember. The room was brightly lighted, but outside the window it was pitch black... Suddenly you were standing out there. Galley slaves had rowed you to the house. I had just seen them disappearing in the darkness. You were dressed in marvellous gold and silver clothes, and had a dagger in a silver sheath hanging by your side. You lifted me down from the window. I, too, was gorgeously dressed, like a princess. We stood outside in the twilight, and a fine gray mist reached up to our ankles. The country-side was perfectly familiar to us: there was the lake, the mountain rose above us, and I could even see the villas which stood there like little toy houses. We were floating, no, flying, along above the mist, and I thought: so this is our honeymoon trip. Soon, however, we stopped flying and were walking along a forest path, the one leading to Elizabeth Heights. Suddenly, we came into a sort of clearing in the mountains enclosed on three sides by the forest, while a steep wall of rock towered up in the back. The sky was blue and starry, with an expanse far greater than it ever has in reality; it was the ceiling of our bridal-chamber. You took me into your arms and loved me very much.”

“I hope you loved me, too,” remarked Fridolin with an invisible, malicious smile.

“Even more than you did me,” replied Albertina seriously, “but, how can I explain it — in spite of the intensity of our happiness our love was also sad, as if filled with some presentiment of sorrow. Suddenly, it was morning. The meadow was light and covered with flowers, the forest glistened with dew, and over the rocky wall the sun sent down quivering rays of light. It was now time to return to the world and go among people. But something terrible happened: our clothes were gone. I was seized with unheard of terror and a shame so burning that it almost consumed me. At the same time I was angry with you, as though you were to blame for the misfortune. This sensation of terror, shame and anger was much more intense than anything I had ever felt when awake. Conscious of your guilt, you rushed away naked, to go and get clothes for us. When you had gone I was very gay. I neither felt sorry for you, nor worried about you. Delighted to be alone, I ran happily about in the meadow singing a tune we had heard at some dance. My voice had a wonderful ring and I wished that they could hear me down in the city, which I couldn’t see but which nevertheless existed. It was far below me and was surrounded by a high wall, a very fantastic city which I can’t describe. It was not Oriental and not exactly Old-German, and yet it seemed to be first one, and then the other. At any rate, it was a city buried a long time ago and forever. Suddenly I was lying in the meadow, stretched out in the sunlight — far more beautiful than I ever was in reality, and while I lay there, a young man wearing a light-colored fashionable suit of clothes walked out of the woods. I now realize that he looked like the Dane whom I mentioned yesterday. He walked up and spoke to me courteously as he passed, but otherwise paid no particular attention to me. He went straight to the wall of rock and looked it over carefully, as though considering how to master it. At the same time I could see you hurrying from house to house, from shop to shop in the buried city, now walking underneath arbors, then passing through a sort of Turkish bazaar. You were buying the most beautiful things you could find for me: clothes, linen, shoes, and jewellery. And then you put these things into a little hand-bag of yellow leather that held them all. You were being followed by a crowd of people whom I could not see, but I heard the sound of their threatening shouts. The Dane, who had stopped before the wall of rock a little while before, now reappeared from the woods — and apparently in the meantime he had encircled the whole globe. He looked different, but he was the same, nevertheless. He stopped before the wall of rock, vanished and came out of the woods again, appearing and disappearing two, or three, or a hundred times. It was always the same man and yet always different. He spoke to me every time he passed, and finally stopped in front of me and looked at me searchingly. I laughed seductively as I have never laughed in my life, and he held out his arms to me. I wished to escape but it was useless — and he sank down beside me on the meadow."

She was silent. Fridolin's throat was parched. In the darkness of the room he could see she had concealed her face in her hands.

"A strange dream," he said, "but surely that isn't the end?" When she said "no," he asked: "Then why don't you continue?"

"It's not easy," she began again. "Such things are difficult to express in words. Well, to go on — I seemed to live through countless days and nights; there was neither time nor space. I was no longer in the clearing, enclosed by the woods and rock. I was on a flower-covered plain, that stretched into infinite distance and, finally, into the horizon in all directions. And for a long time I had not been alone with this one man on the meadow. Whether there were three, or ten, or a thousand other couples I don't know. Whether I noticed them or not, whether I was united only with that particular man or also with others, I can't say. Just as that earlier feeling of terror and shame went beyond anything I have ever felt in the waking state, so nothing in our conscious existence can be compared with the feeling of release, of freedom, of happiness, which I now experienced. Yet I didn't for one moment forget you. In fact, I saw that you had been seized — by soldiers, I think — and there were also priests among them. Somebody, a gigantic person, tied your hands, and I knew that you were to be executed. I knew it, without feeling any sympathy for you, and without shuddering. I felt it, but as though I were far removed from you. They led you into a yard, a sort of castle-yard, and you stood there, naked, with your hands tied behind your back. Just as I saw you, though I was far away, you could also see me and the man who was holding me in his arms. All the other couples, too, were visible in this infinite sea of nakedness which foamed about me, and of which my companion and I were only a wave, so to speak. Then, while you were standing in the castle-yard, a young woman, with a diadem on her head and wearing a purple cloak, appeared at a high arched window between red curtains. It was the queen of the country, and she looked down at you with a stern, questioning look. You were standing alone. All the others stood aside, pressed against the wall, and I heard them whispering and muttering in a malicious and threatening manner. Then the queen bent down over the railing. Silence reigned, and she signaled to you, commanding you to come up to her, and I knew that she had decided to pardon you. But you either didn't notice her, or else you didn't want to. Suddenly you were standing opposite her, with your hands still tied. You were wrapped in a black cloak, and you were not in a room, but in the open, somehow, floating, as it were. She held a piece of parchment in her hand, your death-sentence, which stated your crime and the reasons for your conviction. She asked you — I couldn't hear the words, but I knew it was so — whether you were willing to be her lover, for in that case the death-penalty would be remitted. You shook your head, refusing. I wasn't surprised, for it seemed natural and inevitable that you should be faithful to me, under all circumstances. The queen shrugged her shoulders, waved her hand, and suddenly you were in a subterranean cellar, and whips were whizzing down upon you, although I couldn't see the people who were swinging them. Blood flowed down you in streams. I saw it without feeling cruel, or even surprised. The queen now moved towards you, her loose hair flowing about her naked body, and held out her diadem to you with both hands. I realized that she was the girl at the seashore in Denmark, the one you had once seen nude, in the morning, on the ledge of a bathing-hut. She didn't say a word, but she was clearly there to learn if you would be her husband and the ruler of the land. When you refused again, she suddenly disappeared. At the same time I saw them erecting a cross for you — not down in the castle-yard, but on the meadow, where I was resting with my lover among all the other couples. I saw you walking alone through ancient streets without a guard, but I knew that your course was marked out for you and that it was impossible for you to turn aside. Next, you were coming up the forest path, where I anxiously awaited you, but I did not feel any sympathy for you, though your body was covered with the weals which had stopped bleeding. You went higher and higher, the path widened, the forest receded on both sides, and you stood at the edge of the meadow at an enormous, incomprehensible distance. Your eyes smiled at me as if to show that you had fulfilled my wish and had brought me everything I needed: clothing and shoes and jewels. But I thought your actions senseless beyond description and I wanted to make fun of you, to laugh in your face — because you had refused the queen's hand out of faithfulness to me. And because you had been tortured and now came tottering up here to a horrible death. As I ran to meet you, you came near more and more quickly. We were floating in the air, and then I lost sight of you; and I realized we had flown past each other. I hoped that you would, at least, hear my laughter when they were nailing you to the cross. — And so I laughed, as shrill and loud as I could — that was the laugh, Fridolin, that you heard — when I awoke." Neither of them spoke or moved. Any remark at this moment would have seemed futile. The further her story progressed, the more ridiculous and insignificant did his own experiences become, at least up to date. He swore to himself that he would resume and conclude all of them. He would then faithfully report them and so take vengeance on this woman who had revealed herself as faithless, cruel and treacherous, and whom he now believed he hated more than he had ever loved her.

He realized that he was still clasping her fingers. Ready as he was to hate her, his feeling of tenderness for these slender, cool fingers was unchanged except that it was more acute. Involuntarily, in fact against his will, he gently pressed his lips on this familiar hand before he let it go.

Albertina still kept her eyes closed and Fridolin thought he could see a happy, innocent smile playing about her mouth. He felt an incomprehensible desire to bend over her and kiss her pale forehead. But he checked himself. He realized that it was only the natural fatigue of the last few hours which disguised itself as tenderness in the familiarity of their mutual room.

But whatever his present state of mind — whatever decisions he might reach in the next few hours, the urgent demand of the moment was for sleep and forgetfulness. He had been able to sleep long and dreamlessly the night following the death of his mother, so why not now? He stretched himself out beside his wife who seemed already asleep. A sword between us, he thought, we are lying here like mortal enemies. But it was only an illusion.

AT SEVEN O'CLOCK Fridolin was awakened by the maid gently knocking on the door, and he cast a quick glance at Albertina. Sometimes this knocking awakened her too. But today she was sleeping soundly; too soundly Fridolin thought. He dressed himself quickly, intending to see his little daughter before leaving. The child lay quietly in her white bed, her hands clenched into little fists, as children do in sleep, and he kissed her on her forehead. Tip-toeing to the door of the bedroom he found Albertina still sleeping soundly; then he went out. The cassock and pilgrim's hat were safely concealed in his black doctor's bag. He had drawn up a program for the day with great care, indeed, even a bit pedantically. First of all he had to see a young attorney in the neighborhood who was seriously ill. Fridolin made a careful examination and found his condition somewhat improved. He expressed his satisfaction with sincere joy and ordered an old prescription to be refilled. Then he went to the house in the basement of which Nachtigall had played the piano the night before. The place was still closed, but the girl at the counter in the café above said that Nachtigall lived in a small hotel in Leopoldstadt. He took a cab and arrived there a quarter of an hour later. It was a very shabby place, smelling of unaired beds, rancid lard and chicory. A tough looking concierge, with sly, inflamed eyes, wishing to keep on good terms with the police, willingly gave information. Herr Nachtigall had arrived in a cab at five o'clock in the morning, accompanied by two men who had disguised their faces, perhaps intentionally so, with scarfs which they wore wrapped about their heads and necks. While Nachtigall was in his room, the two men had paid his bill for the last four weeks. When he didn't appear after half an hour, one of them had gone up to fetch him, whereupon they all three took a cab to North Station. Nachtigall had seemed highly excited, in fact — well, why not tell the whole truth to a man who gave one so much confidence — he had tried to slip a letter to the concierge, but the two men stopped that. Any letters for Herr Nachtigall — so the men had explained — would be called for by a person properly authorized to do so. Fridolin took his leave. He was glad that he had his doctor's bag with him when he stepped out of the door, for anyone seeing him would not think that he was staying at the hotel, but would take him for some official person. There was nothing to be done about Nachtigall for the time being. They had been extremely cautious, probably with good reason.

At the costume shop, Herr Gibiser himself opened the door. "I'm bringing back the costume I hired," said Fridolin, "and would like to pay my bill." The proprietor mentioned a moderate sum, took the money and made an entry in a large ledger. He looked up, evidently surprised, when Fridolin made no move to leave.

"I would also like," said Fridolin in the tone of a police magistrate, "to have a word with you about your daughter."

There was a peculiar expression about the nostrils of Herr Gibiser — it was difficult to say whether it was displeasure, scorn or annoyance.

"What did you say?" he asked in a perfectly indefinite voice.

"Yesterday you said," remarked Fridolin, one hand with outstretched fingers resting on the desk, "that your daughter was not quite normal mentally. The situation in which we discovered her actually indicates some such thing. And since I took part in it, or was at least a spectator, I would very much like to advise you to consult a doctor."

Gibiser surveyed Fridolin insolently, twirling an unnaturally long pen-holder in his hand.

"And I suppose the doctor himself would like to take charge of the treatment?"

“Please don’t misunderstand me,” replied Fridolin in a sharp voice.

At this moment the door which led to the inner rooms was opened, and a young man with an open top-coat over his evening clothes stepped out. Fridolin decided it could be none other than one of the vehmic judges of the night before. He undoubtedly came from Pierrette’s room. He seemed taken aback when he caught sight of Fridolin, but he regained his composure at once. He waved his hand to Gibiser, lighted a cigarette with a match from the desk, and left the apartment.

“Oh, that’s how it is,” remarked Fridolin with a contemptuous twitch of his mouth and a bitter taste on his tongue.

“What did you say?” asked Gibiser with perfect equanimity.

“So you have changed your mind about notifying the police,” said Fridolin as his eyes wandered significantly from the entrance door to that of Pierrette.

“We have come to another agreement,” remarked Gibiser coldly, and got up as though this were the end of an interview. He obligingly opened the door as Fridolin turned to go and said, without changing his expression: “If the doctor should want anything again... it needn’t necessarily be a monk’s costume.”

Fridolin slammed the door behind him. So that is settled, he thought, as he hurried down the stairs with a feeling of annoyance which, even to him, seemed exaggerated. The first thing he did on arriving at the Polyclinic was to telephone home to inquire whether any patients had sent for him, if there was any mail, or any other news. The maid had scarcely answered him when Albertina herself came to the phone to answer Fridolin’s call. She repeated everything the maid had already told him, and then said casually that she had just got up and was going to have breakfast with the child. “Give her a kiss for me,” said Fridolin, “and I hope you enjoy your breakfast.”

It had been pleasant to hear her voice but he quickly hung up the receiver. Although he had really wanted to know what she planned to do during the forenoon, what business was it of his? Down in the bottom of his heart he was through with her, no matter how their surface life continued. The blond nurse helped him to take off his coat and handed him his white linen one, smiling at him just as they all did, whether one paid attention to them or not.

A few minutes later he was in the ward. The physician in charge had suddenly sent word that he had to leave the city for a conference, and that the assistants should make the rounds without him. Fridolin felt almost happy as he walked from bed to bed, followed by the students, making examinations, writing prescriptions, and having professional conversations with the assistants and nurses. Various changes had taken place. The journeyman-locksmith, Karl Rödel, had died during the night and the autopsy was to take place at half past four in the afternoon. A bed had become vacant in the woman’s ward, but was again occupied. The woman in bed seventeen had had to be transferred to the surgical division. Besides this, there was a lot of personal gossip. The appointment of a man for the ophthalmology division would be decided day after tomorrow. Hügelmann, at present professor at the University of Marburg, had the best chances, although four years ago he had been merely a second assistant to Stellwag. That’s quick promotion, thought Fridolin. I’ll never be considered for the headship of a department, if for no other reason than that I’ve never been a Dozent. It’s too late. But why should it be? I really ought to begin again to do scientific work or take up more seriously some of the things that I have already started. My private practice would leave me ample time for it. He asked Doctor Fuchstaler if he would please take charge of the dispensary. He confessed to himself that he would rather have stayed there than drive out to Galitzinberg. And yet, he must. He felt obliged, not only for his own sake, to investigate this matter further, but there were all sorts of other things to be settled that day. He decided to ask Doctor Fuchstaler to take charge of the afternoon rounds, too, so as to be prepared for all emergencies. The young girl, over there, with suspected tuberculosis was smiling at him. It was the same one who had recently pressed her breasts so confidingly against his cheek when he examined her. Fridolin gave her a cold look and turned away with a frown. They are all alike, he thought bitterly, and Albertina is like the rest of them — if not the worst. I won't live with her any longer. Things can never be the same again.

On the stairs he spoke to a colleague from the surgical division. Well, how was the woman who had been transferred during the night getting along? As far as he was concerned, he didn't really think it was necessary to operate. They would, of course, tell him the result of the histological examination?

"Why certainly, doctor."

He took a cab at the corner, consulting his notebook and pretending to the cabman that he was making up his mind where to go. "To Ottakring," he then said, "take the street going out to Galitzinberg. I'll tell you where to stop."

When he was in the cab he suddenly became terribly restless. In fact, he almost had a guilty conscience, because, during the last few hours, he had nearly forgotten the beautiful woman who had saved him. Would he now find the house? Well, that shouldn't be particularly difficult. The only question was what to do when he had found it. Notify the police? That might have disastrous consequences for the woman who had sacrificed herself for him, or had, at least, been ready to do so. Should he go to a private detective agency? He thought that would be in rather bad taste and not particularly dignified. But what else could he possibly do? He hadn't the time or the skill to make the necessary investigations. A secret club? Well, yes, it certainly was secret, though they seemed to know each other. Were they aristocrats, or perhaps even members of the court? He thought of certain archdukes who might easily be capable of such behavior. And what about the women? Probably they were recruited from brothels. Well, that was not by any means certain, but at any rate, they seemed very attractive. But how about the woman who had sacrificed herself for him? Sacrificed? Why did he try, again and again, to make himself believe that it really was a sacrifice? It had been a joke, of course; the whole thing had been a joke and he ought to be grateful to have gotten out of the scrape so easily. Well, why not? He had preserved his dignity, and the cavaliers probably realized that he was nobody's fool. And she must have realized it also. Very likely she had cared more for him than for all those archdukes or whatever they were.

He got out at the end of Liebhartstal, where the road led sharply up-hill, and took the precaution of sending the cab away. There were white clouds in the pale-blue sky and the sun shone with the warmth of spring. He looked back — there was nothing suspicious in sight, no cab, no pedestrian. He walked slowly up the road. His coat became heavy. He took it off and threw it over his shoulder just as he came to the spot where he thought the side-street, in which the mysterious house stood, branched off to the right. He could not go wrong. The street went down-hill but not nearly so steeply as it had seemed during the night. It was a quiet little street. There were rosebushes carefully covered with straw in a front garden, and in the next yard stood a baby carriage. A boy in a blue jersey suit was romping about and a laughing young woman watched him from a ground-floor window. Next came an empty lot, then an uncultivated fenced-in garden, then a little villa, next a lawn, and finally — there was no doubt about it — the house he was looking for. It certainly did not seem large or magnificent. It was a one-story villa in modest Empire style and obviously renovated a comparatively short time before. The green blinds were down and there was nothing to show that anyone lived there. Fridolin looked around. There was no one in the street, except farther down where two boys with books under their arms were going in the opposite direction. He stopped in front of the garden gate. And what was he to do now? Simply walk back again? That would be too ridiculous, he thought, looking for the bell-button. Supposing someone answered it, what was he to say? Well, he would simply ask if the pretty country house was to let for the summer. But the house-door had already opened and an old servant in plain morning livery came out and slowly walked down the narrow path to the gate. He held a letter in his hand and silently pushed it through the iron bars to Fridolin whose heart was beating wildly.

"For me?" he asked, hesitantly. The servant nodded, went back to the house, and the door closed behind him. What does that mean? Fridolin asked himself. Can it possibly be from her? Does she, herself, own the house? He walked back up the street quickly and it was only then that he noticed his name on the envelope in large, dignified letters. He opened it, unfolded a sheet and read the following:

Give up your inquiries which are perfectly useless, and consider these words a second warning. We hope, for your own good, that this will he sufficient.

This message disappointed him in every respect, but at any rate it was different from what he had foolishly expected. Nevertheless, the tone of it was strangely reserved, even kindly, and seemed to show that the people who had sent it by no means felt secure.

Second warning —? How was that? Oh yes, he had received the first one during the night. But why second warning — and not the last? Did they want to try his courage once more? Was he to pass a test? And how did they know his name? Well, that wasn't difficult. They had probably forced Nachtigall to tell. And besides — he smiled at his absent-mindedness — his monogram and his full address were sewn into the lining of his fur coat.

But, though he had made no progress, the letter on the whole reassured him, just why he couldn't say. At any rate he was convinced that the woman he was so uneasy about was still alive, and that it would be possible to find her if he went about it cautiously and cleverly.

He went home, feeling rather tired but with a strange sense of security which somehow seemed deceptive. Albertina and the child had finished their dinner, but they kept him company while he ate his meal. There she sat opposite him, the woman who had calmly allowed him to be crucified the preceding night. She was sitting there with an angelic look, like a good housewife and mother, and to his surprise he did not hate her. He enjoyed his meal, being in an excited, cheerful mood, and, as he usually did, gave a very lively account of the little professional incidents of the day. He mentioned especially the gossip about the doctors, about whom he always kept Albertina well informed. He told her that the appointment of Hügelmann was as good as settled, and then spoke of his own determination to take up scientific work again with greater energy. Albertina knew this mood. She also knew that it usually didn't last very long and betrayed her doubts by a slight smile. When Fridolin became quite warm on the subject, she gently smoothed his hair to calm him. He started slightly and turned to the child, so as to remove his forehead from the embarrassing touch. He took the little girl on his lap and was just beginning to dance her up and down, when the maid announced that several patients were waiting. Fridolin rose with a sigh of relief, suggesting to Albertina that she and the child ought to go for a walk on such a beautiful, sunny afternoon, and went to his consulting room.

During the next two hours he had to see six old patients and two new ones. In every single case he had his whole mind on the subject. He made examinations, jotted down notes and wrote prescriptions — and he was glad that he felt so unusually fresh and clear in mind after spending the last two nights almost without sleep.

At the end of his consultation period, he stopped to see his wife and little daughter once more. He noted with satisfaction that Albertina's mother was with her, and that the child was having a French lesson with her governess. It was only when he reached the front steps that he realized that all this order, this regularity, all the security of his existence, was nothing but deception and delusion.

Although he had excused himself from his afternoon duties at the hospital, he felt irresistibly drawn to his ward. There were two cases there of special importance to the piece of research he was planning. He was busy for some time making a more detailed study of them than he had yet done, and following that he still had to visit a patient in the heart of the city. It was already seven o'clock in the evening when he stood before the old house in Schreyvogel Strasse. As he looked up at Marianne's window, her image, which had completely faded from his mind, was revived — more clearly than that of all the others. Well — there was no chance of failure here. He could begin his work of vengeance without any special exertion and with little difficulty or danger. What might have deterred others, the betrayal of her fiancé, only made him keener. Yes, to betray, to deceive, to lie, to play a part, before Marianne, before Albertina, before the good Doctor Roediger, before the whole world. To lead a sort of double life, to be the capable, reliable physician with a future before him, the upright husband and head of a family. And at the same time a libertine, a seducer, a cynic who played with people, with men and women, just as the spirit moved him — that seemed to him, at the time, very delightful. And the most delightful part was that at some future time, long after Albertina fancied herself secure in the peacefulness of marriage and of — family life — he would confess to her, with a superior smile, all of his sins, in retribution for the bitter and shameful things she had committed against him in a dream.

On the steps he met Doctor Roediger who held out his hand cordially.

"How is Fräulein Marianne?" asked Fridolin, "is she a little more composed?"

Doctor Roediger shrugged his shoulders, "She was prepared for the end long enough, doctor. — Only when they came this noon to call for the corpse—"

"So that's already been done?"

Doctor Roediger nodded. "The funeral will be at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon."

Fridolin looked down. "I suppose — Fräulein Marianne's relatives are with her?"

"No," replied Doctor Roediger, "she is alone now. She will be pleased to see you once more, for tomorrow my mother and I are taking her to Mödling." When Fridolin raised his eyes with a politely questioning look, Doctor Roediger continued: "My parents have a little house out there. Good-bye, doctor. I still have many things to attend to. It's unbelievable how much trouble is connected with such a — case. I hope I shall still find you upstairs when I return." And as he said this he reached the street.

Fridolin hesitated a moment, then slowly went up the stairs. He rang the bell and Marianne herself opened the door. She was dressed in black and had on a jet necklace which he had never seen before. Her face became slightly flushed.

"You made me wait a long time," she said, smiling feebly.

"Forgive me, Fräulein Marianne, this was a particularly busy day for me."

They passed through the death-chamber, in which the bed was now empty, into the adjoining room where, under the picture of the officer in a white uniform, he had, the day before written the death certificate of the Councilor. A little lamp was burning on the writing desk, and it was nearly dark. Marianne offered him a seat on the black leather divan and sat down opposite him.

"I have just met Doctor Roediger. So you are going to the country tomorrow?"

Marianne seemed little surprised at the cool tone of his question and her shoulders drooped when he continued almost harshly: "I think that's very sensible." And he explained in a matter-of-fact way what a favorable effect the good air and the new environment would have on her.

She sat motionless, and tears streamed down her cheeks. He saw them, feeling impatient rather than sympathetic. The thought that the next minute, perhaps, she might be lying at his feet, repeating her confession of the night before, filled him with fear. When she said nothing he got up suddenly. "Much as I regret it, Fräulein Marianne—" He looked at his watch.

Still crying, she raised her head and looked at Fridolin. He would gladly have said something kind to her, but found it difficult to do so.

"I suppose you will stay in the country for several days," he began rather awkwardly. "I hope you will write to me... By the way, Doctor Roediger says the wedding is to be soon. Let me offer you my best wishes."

She did not move, as though she had understood neither his congratulations nor his farewell. He held out his hand but she refused it, and he repeated almost reproachfully: "Well then, I sincerely hope that you will keep me posted about your health. Good-bye, Fräulein Marianne."

She sat there as if turned to stone and he left the room, stopping for a second in the doorway, as though to give her a last opportunity to call him back. But she turned her head away, and he closed the door behind him. When he was out in the hallway he felt rather remorseful and for a moment he thought of going back, but he felt that it would have been ridiculous to do so.

But what was he to do now? Go home? Where else could he go? Anyhow, there was nothing more he could do today. And what about tomorrow? What could he do and how should he go about it? He felt awkward and helpless. Everything he put his hands to turned out a failure. Everything seemed unreal: his home, his wife, his child, his profession, and even he himself, mechanically walking along through the nocturnal streets with his thoughts roaming through space.

The clock on the Rathaus tower struck half past seven. It didn't matter how late it was; he had more time on his hands than he needed. There was nothing and no one that interested him, and he pitied himself not a little. Then the idea occurred to him — not deliberately but as a flash across his mind — to drive to some station, take a train, no matter where, and to disappear, leaving everyone behind. He could then turn up again, somewhere abroad, and start a new life, as a different personality. He recalled certain strange pathological cases which he had read in books on psychiatry, so called double-lives. A man living in normal circumstances suddenly disappeared, was not heard from, returned months or years later and didn't remember where he had been during this time. Later, however, someone who had run across him, somewhere, in a foreign country, recognized him, but the man himself remembered nothing. Such things certainly didn't happen very often, but just the same they were authentic. Many others probably experienced the same things in a lesser degree. For instance, when one comes back out of dreams. Of course, one remembers some dreams, but there must he others one completely forgets, of which nothing remains but a mysterious mood, a curious numbness. Or one doesn't remember until very much later, and doesn't even then know whether it was real or only a dream. Only a dream!

While Fridolin wandered along, drifting aimlessly towards his home, he entered the neighborhood of the dark, rather questionable street, where he had accompanied the forlorn little girl to her humble room less than twenty-four hours before. Why was she "forlorn?" And why was just this street "questionable?" Isn't it strange how we are misled by words, how we give names to streets, events and people, and form judgments about them, just because we are too lazy to change our habits? Wasn't this young girl in reality the most charming, if not actually the purest of all those with whom he had come in contact during the past night? He felt rather touched when he thought of her, and remembering his plan of the night before, he turned into the nearest store and bought all kinds of delicacies. Walking along with his package, the consciousness of performing an act which was at least sensible, and perhaps actually laudable, made him feel glad. Nevertheless, he turned up his coat collar when he stepped into the hallway and went upstairs several steps at a time. The bell of the apartment rang with unwelcome shrillness and he felt relieved when a disreputable looking woman informed him that Fräulein Mizzi was not at home. But before the woman had an opportunity of taking charge of the package for Mizzi, another woman joined them. She was still young and not bad-looking, and had on a sort of bath-robe. "Whom are you looking for?" she said, "Fräulein Mizzi? Well, she won't be home again for some time."

The older woman made a sign to her to keep quiet, but Fridolin, anxious to confirm what he had already half guessed asked very simply: "She's in the hospital, isn't she?"

"Well, as long as you know it anyhow. But there's nothing wrong with me, thank heaven," she exclaimed vivaciously and stepped quite close to Fridolin. Her lips were half open, and as she boldly drew up her voluptuous body the bath-robe parted. Fridolin declined and said: "I was passing by and I stopped to bring something for Mizzi." He suddenly felt very young, but asked in a matter-of-fact voice: "In which ward is she?"

The younger woman mentioned the name of a professor in whose clinic Fridolin had been an assistant several years before, and added good-naturedly: "Just let me have those packages, I'll take them to her tomorrow. And I promise that I won't snitch any of it. I'll give her your regards too and tell her that you're still true to her."

She stepped closer to him and laughed invitingly but when he drew back a little she gave it up at once and said, as if to console him: "The doctor said she'd be home in six or, at most, eight weeks."

When Fridolin returned to the street he felt choked with tears. He knew that this was not because he was deeply affected, but because his nerves were gradually giving way, and he intentionally struck up a quicker and more lively pace than he was in the mood for. Was this another and final sign that everything was bound to turn out a failure for him? But why should it? The fact that he had escaped such a great danger might just as well be a good sign. Was it the all-important thing to escape danger? He could expect to face many others, as he was by no means ready to give up the search for the marvellous woman of the night before.

Of course, it was too late to do anything about it now. Besides, he had to consider carefully just how to continue the search.

If only there were someone he could consult in the matter! But he knew of no one to whom he was willing to confide his adventures of the preceding night. For years he had not exchanged confidences with anyone except his wife, and of course, he could hardly discuss this case with her. Neither this nor any other. For, no matter how one looked at it, she had permitted him to be crucified the night before.

And he suddenly realized why he was walking, not towards his house, but, unconsciously, farther and farther in the opposite direction. He would not, and could not, face Albertina now. The most sensible thing to do was to have supper away from home, then he could go to his ward and look after his two cases. But under no circumstances would he go home— "home?" — until he could be certain of finding Albertina asleep.

He entered a café, one of the more quiet and select ones near the Rathaus. He telephoned home not to expect him for supper, and hung up the receiver quickly so that Albertina wouldn't have a chance to come to the phone.

Then he sat down by a window and drew the curtain. A man had just taken a seat in a distant corner. He wore a dark overcoat and inconspicuous clothes and Fridolin thought he had seen his face before, during the day. It might, of course, be just a fancy. He picked up an evening paper, read a few lines here and there, just as he had done the night before in a different place. Reports on political events, articles on the theatre, art and literature, accounts of accidents and disasters. In some city that he had never heard of in the United States a theatre had burned down. Peter Korand, a chimney-sweep, had thrown himself out of a window. Somehow, it seemed strange to Fridolin that even chimney-sweeps occasionally commit suicide. Involuntarily he wondered whether the man had first washed himself properly or whether he had plunged into nothingness just as he was, black and dirty. A woman had taken poison that morning in a fashionable hotel in the heart of the city. She was an unusually good-looking woman and had registered there a few days before under the name of Baroness D. At once Fridolin felt a strange presentiment. The woman had returned to the hotel at four o'clock in the morning, accompanied by two men who had left her at the door. Four o'clock! That was exactly the time that he, too, had reached home. About noontime — the account continued — she had been found unconscious in her bed with every indication of serious poisoning.... An unusually good-looking woman.... Well, there were many unusually good-looking women.... There was no reason to believe that Baroness D. or rather the woman who had registered as such, and a certain other person, were one and the same. And yet — his heart throbbed and his hand trembled as it held the paper. In a fashionable hotel... which one —? Why so mysterious? — so discreet?...

He put the paper down and at the same time the man in the far corner raised his, a large, illustrated journal, and held it to shield his face. Fridolin at once picked up his paper again and decided that the Baroness D. must certainly be the woman he had seen the night before. In a fashionable hotel.... There were not many which would be considered — by a Baroness D.... Whatever happened now, this clue had to be followed up. He called for the waiter, paid his bill and left. At the door he turned to look for the suspicious character in the corner, but strange to say, he was already gone....

Serious poisoning.... But she was still living.... She was living when they found her. There was really no reason to suppose that she had not been saved. In any case, he would find her — whether she lived or not. And he would see her — dead or alive. He would see her; no one in the world could stop his seeing the woman who had died on his account; who had, in fact, died for him. He was the cause of her death — he alone — if it were she. Yes, it was she. Returned to the hotel at four o'clock in the morning, accompanied by two men! Very likely the same men who had taken Nachtigall to the station a few hours later. This did not seem to point to a very clear conscience.

He stood in the large Square before the Rathaus and looked around. There were only a few people in sight and the suspicious looking man from the café was not among them. But even if he were — the men had been afraid — Fridolin had the upper hand. He hurried on, took a cab when he reached the Ring, and driving first to the Hotel Bristol, asked the concierge, as though he were fully authorized to do so, whether the Baroness D. who had taken poison that morning, had stopped at this hotel. The concierge didn't seem at all surprised; perhaps he thought Fridolin was a police officer or some other official. At any rate, he replied courteously that the sad case had not occurred there, but in the Hotel Erzherzog Karl....

Fridolin at once went there and found that Baroness D. had been taken to the General Hospital immediately after they found her. He also inquired how they had discovered her attempt at suicide. Why had they disturbed at noon a lady who had not returned until four in the morning? Well, it was quite simple; two men (the two men again!) had asked for her at eleven o'clock in the morning. The lady had not answered her telephone, although they had rung several times, and when the maid knocked on her door, there was no answer. It was locked on the inside. Finally, they had had to break it open, and they found the Baroness in her bed, unconscious. They had at once called an ambulance and notified the police.

"And the two men?" asked Fridolin, rather sharply. He felt like a detective.

Yes, of course the two men looked rather suspicious. In the meantime they had completely disappeared. Anyhow, it was unlikely that she was really the Baroness Dubieski, the name under which she had registered. This was the first time she had stopped at the hotel. Besides, there wasn't a family by that name; at least none belonging to the nobility.

Fridolin thanked the concierge for the information and left quickly, for one of the hotel managers had just come up and looked him over with unpleasant curiosity. He got back into the cab and told the cabman to take him to the hospital. A few minutes later, in the outside office, he learned that the alleged Baroness Dubieski had been taken to the second clinic for internal medicine. In spite of all the efforts of the doctors, she had died at five in the afternoon — without having regained consciousness.

Fridolin breathed a sigh of relief that sounded now like a deep groan. The official on duty looked up, startled, and Fridolin pulled himself together and courteously took his leave. A minute later he stood again out-doors. The hospital park was empty except where a nurse, in her blue and white uniform and cap, was walking along a near-by path. "She is dead," Fridolin said to himself. — If it is she. And if it is not? If she still lives, how can I find her?

Only too easily could Fridolin answer the question as to where at that moment he could find the body of the unknown woman. As she had died so recently, she was undoubtedly lying in the hospital morgue, a few hundred paces away. As a doctor, there would, of course, be no difficulty in gaining admittance there, even at such a late hour. But — what did he want there? He had never seen her face, only her body. He had only snatched a hasty glance at the former when he had been driven out. Up to this moment he hadn't thought of that fact. During the time since he had read the account in the paper he had pictured the suicide, whose face he didn't know, as having the features of Albertina. In fact, he now shuddered to realize that his wife had constantly been in his mind's eye as the woman he was seeking. He asked himself 'again why he really wanted to go to the morgue. He was sure that if he had met her again alive — whether days or years later, whatever the circumstances — he would unquestionably have recognized her by her gait, her bearing, and above all by her voice. But now he was to see only the body again, the dead body of a woman, and a face of which he remembered only the eyes, now lifeless. Yes — he knew those eyes, and the hair which had suddenly become untied and had enveloped her naked body as they had driven him from the room. Would that be enough to tell him if it were unmistakably she?

With slow and hesitating steps he crossed the familiar courtyards to the Institute of Pathological Anatomy. Finding the door unlocked, it was unnecessary to ring the bell. The stone floor resounded under his footsteps as he walked through the dimly lighted hall. A familiar, and to a certain extent homelike, smell of all kinds of chemicals pervaded the place. He knocked on the door of the Histological Room where he expected to find some assistant still at work. A rather gruff voice called "Come in." Fridolin entered the high-ceilinged room which seemed almost festively illuminated. As he half expected, Doctor Adler, an assistant in the Institute and an old fellow-student of his, was in the center of the room. He raised his eyes from the microscope and arose from his chair.

"Oh, it's you," he said to Fridolin, a little annoyed, but also surprised, "to what do I owe the honor of your visit at such an unaccustomed hour?"

"Forgive me for disturbing you," said Fridolin. "I see you are just in the midst of some work."

"Yes, I am," replied Alder in the sharp voice which he retained from his student days. He added in a lighter tone: "What else could one be doing in these sacred halls at midnight? But, of course, you're not disturbing me in the least. What can I do for you?"

When Fridolin did not answer, he continued: "That Addison case you sent down to us today is still lying over there, lovely and inviolate. Dissection tomorrow morning at eight-thirty."

With a gesture Fridolin indicated that that was not the reason of his visit. Doctor Adler went on: "Oh, then it's the pleural tumor. Well, the histological examination has unmistakably shown sarcoma. So you needn't worry about that either."

Fridolin again shook his head. "My visit has nothing to do with — official matters."

"Well, so much the better," said Adler. "I was beginning to think that your bad conscience brought you down here when all good people should be sleeping."

"It has something to do with a bad conscience, or at least with conscience in general," Fridolin replied.

"Oh!"

"Briefly, and to the point," — he spoke in a dry, off-hand tone— "I should like to have some information about a woman who died of morphine poisoning in the second clinic this evening. She is likely to be down here now, a certain Baroness Dubieski." He continued more hurriedly: "I have a feeling that this so called Baroness is a person I knew casually years ago, and I am interested to know if I am right —."

"Suicidium?" asked Adler.

Fridolin nodded. "Yes, suicide," he translated, as though he wished to restore the matter to a personal plane.

Adler jokingly pointed his finger at him. "Was she unhappily in love with your Excellency?"

Fridolin was a little annoyed and answered, "The suicide of the Baroness Dubieski has nothing whatever to do with me personally."

"I beg your pardon, I didn't mean to be indiscreet. We can see for ourselves at once. As far as I know, no request from the coroner has come tonight. Very likely—"

Post-mortem examination — flashed across Fridolin's mind. That might easily be the case. Who knows whether her suicide was in any sense voluntary? He thought again of the two men who had so suddenly disappeared from the hotel after learning of her attempt at suicide. The affair might still develop into a criminal case of great importance. And mightn't he — Fridolin — perhaps be summoned as a witness? — In fact, wasn't it really his duty to report to the police?

He followed Doctor Adler across the hallway to the door opposite, which was ajar. The bare high room was dimly lighted by the low, unshaded flames of a two-armed gas-fixture. Less than half of the twelve or fourteen morgue tables were occupied by corpses. A few bodies were lying there naked. Others were covered with linen sheets. Fridolin stepped up to the first table by the door and carefully drew back the covering from the head of the corpse. A glare from Doctor Adler's flashlight suddenly fell upon it and Fridolin saw the yellow face of a gray-bearded man. He immediately covered it again with the shroud. On the next table was the naked, emaciated body of a young man, and Doctor Adler called out from farther down: "Here's a woman between sixty and seventy, so I suppose she isn't the one either."

Fridolin suddenly felt irresistibly drawn to the end of the room where the sallow body of a woman faintly glowed in the darkness. The head was hanging to one side and the long dark hair almost touched the floor. He instinctively stretched out his hand to put the head in its proper position, but feeling a certain dread which, as a doctor, was otherwise unknown to him he drew back his hand. Doctor Adler came up and, pointing to the corpses behind him, remarked: "All those are out of the question, so it's probably this one?" He pointed his flashlight at the woman's head. Overcoming his dread, Fridolin raised it a little with his hands. A white face with half-closed eyelids stared at him. The lower jaw hung down limply, the narrow upper lip was drawn up, revealing the bluish gums and a number of white teeth. Fridolin could not tell whether this face had ever been beautiful, even as lately as the day before. It was a face without any expression or character. It was dead. It could just as easily have been the face of a woman of eighteen, as of thirty-eight.

"Is it she?" asked Doctor Adler.

Fridolin bent lower, as though he could, with his piercing look, wrest an answer from the rigid features. Yet at the same time he knew that if it were her face, and her eyes, the eyes that had shone at him the day before with so much passion, he would not, could not — and in reality did not, want to know. He gently laid the head back on the table. His eyes followed the moving flashlight, passing along the dead body. Was it her body? — the wonderful alluring body for which, only yesterday, he had felt such agonizing desire? Fridolin touched the forehead, the cheeks, the shoulders and arms of the dead woman, doing so as if compelled and directed by an invisible power. He twined his fingers about those of the corpse, and rigid as they were, they seemed to him to make an effort to move, to seize his hand. Indeed, he almost felt that a vague and distant look from underneath her eyelids was searching his face. He bent over her, as if magically attracted.

Suddenly he heard a voice behind him whispering: "What on earth are you doing?"

Fridolin regained his senses instantly. He freed his fingers from those of the corpse, and taking her thin wrists, placed the ice-cold arms alongside of the body very carefully, even a little scrupulously. It seemed to him that she had just at that moment died. He turned away, directed his steps to the door and across the resounding hallway back into the room which they had left a little while before. Doctor Adler followed in silence and locked the door behind them.

Fridolin stepped up to the wash-basin. "With your permission," he said and carefully washed his hands with lysol and soap. Doctor Adler seemed anxious to continue his interrupted work without further ceremony. He switched on his microscope lamp, turned the micrometer screw and looked into the microscope. When Fridolin went up to him to say good-bye he was already completely absorbed.

"Would you like to have a look at this preparation?" he asked.

"Why?" asked Fridolin absent-mindedly.

"Well, to quiet your conscience," replied Doctor Adler — as if he assumed that, after all, the purpose of Fridolin's visit had been a medical-scientific one.

"Can you make it out?" he asked, as Fridolin looked into the microscope. "It's a fairly new staining method."

Fridolin nodded, without raising his eyes from the glass. "Perfectly ideal," he said, "a colorful picture, one might say."

And he inquired about various details of the new technique.

Doctor Adler gave him the desired explanations. Fridolin told him that the new method would most probably be very useful to him in some work he was planning for the next few months, and asked permission to come again to get more information.

"I'm always at your service," said Doctor Adler. He accompanied Fridolin over the resounding flag-stones to the locked outer door, and opened it with his own key.

"You're not going yet?" asked Fridolin.

"Of course not," replied Doctor Adler. "These are the very best hours for work — from about midnight until morning. Then one is at least fairly certain not to be disturbed."

"Well," — said Fridolin, smiling slightly, as if he had a guilty conscience.

Doctor Adler placed his hand on Fridolin's arm reassuringly, and then asked, with some reserve: "Well — was it she?"

Fridolin hesitated for a moment, and then nodded, without saying a word. He was hardly aware that by this action he might be guilty of untruthfulness. It did not matter to him whether the woman — now lying in the hospital morgue — was the same one he had held naked in his arms twenty-four hours before, to the wild tunes of Nachtigall's playing. It was immaterial whether this corpse was some other unknown woman, a perfect stranger whom he had never seen before. Even if the woman he had sought, desired and perhaps loved for an hour were still alive, he knew that the body lying in the arched room — in the light of flickering gas-flames, a shadow among shadows, dark, without meaning or mystery as the shadows themselves — could only be to him the pale corpse of the preceding night, doomed to irrevocable decay.

FRIDOLIN HURRIED HOME through the dark and empty streets. After undressing in the consultation room, as he had done twenty-four hours before, he entered the bedroom as silently as possible.

He heard Albertina breathing quietly and regularly and saw the outlines of her head on the soft pillow. Unexpectedly, his heart was filled with a feeling of tenderness and even of security. He decided to tell her the story of the preceding night very soon — perhaps even the next day — but to tell it as though everything he had experienced had been a dream. Then, when she had fully realized the utter futility of his adventures, he would confess to her that they had been real. Real? he asked himself — and at this moment he noticed something dark quite near Albertina's face. It had definite outlines like the shadowy features of a human face, and it was lying on his pillow. For a moment his heart stopped beating, but an instant later he saw what it was, and stretching out his hand, picked up the mask he had worn the night before. He must have lost it in the morning when making up his bundle, and the maid or Albertina herself had found it. Undoubtedly Albertina, after making this find, suspected something — presumably, more and worse things than had actually happened. And she intimated this, by placing the mask on the pillow beside her, as though it signified his face, the face of her husband who had become an enigma to her. This playful, almost joking action seemed to express both a gentle warning and her readiness to forgive. Fridolin confidently hoped that, remembering her own dream, she would not be inclined to take his too seriously, no matter what might have happened. All at once, however, he reached the end of his strength. He dropped the mask, uttered a loud and painful sob — quite unexpectedly — sank down beside the bed, buried his head in the pillows, and wept.

A few minutes later he felt a soft hand caressing his hair. He looked up and from the depths of his heart he cried: "I will tell you everything."

She raised her hand, as if to stop him, but he took it and held it, and looked at her both questioningly and beseechingly. She encouraged him with a nod and he began his story.

The gray dawn was creeping in through the curtains when Fridolin finished. Albertina hadn't once interrupted him with a curious or impatient question. She probably felt that he could not, and would not, keep anything from her. She lay there quietly, with her arms folded under her head, and remained silent long after Fridolin had finished. He was lying by her side and finally bent over her, and looking into her immobile face with the large, bright eyes in which morning seemed to have dawned, he asked, in a voice of both doubt and hope: "What shall we do now, Albertina?"

She smiled, and after a minute, replied: "I think we ought to be grateful that we have come unharmed out of all our adventures, whether they were real or only a dream."

"Are you quite sure of that?" he asked. "Just as sure as I am that the reality of one night, let alone that of a whole lifetime, is not the whole truth."

"And no dream," he said with a slight sigh, "is entirely a dream."

She took his head and pillowed it on her breast. "Now I suppose we are awake," she said, "for a long time to come."

He was on the point of saying, "Forever," but before he could speak, she laid her finger on his lips and whispered, as if to herself: "Never inquire into the future." So they lay silently, dozing a little, dreamlessly, close to one another — until, as on every morning at seven, there was a knock on the door; and, with the usual noises from the street, a victorious ray of light through the opening of the curtain, and the clear laughter of a child through the door, the new day began.

THE END

Theresa (1928)

THE CHRONICLE OF A WOMAN'S LIFE

Original German Title: 'Therese: Chronik eines Frauenlebens'

Translated William A. Drake, 1928

The final novel by Schnitzler, Therese: Chronik eines Frauenlebens was first published in 1928 by S. Fischer in Berlin. It deals with the harsh fate of Therese Fabiani, a single mother in the bourgeois world of fin-de-siècle Vienna, who experiences a slow and harrowing social decline. While she earns her meagre living as a governess in upper-middle-class homes, her illegitimate child grows up far away in the countryside.

After Theresa's father, a lieutenant colonel with Italian roots, is prematurely retired, the Fabiani family moves to the city of Salzburg. There, she meets Alfred Nüllheim, a school friend of her brother Karl, who becomes her first love. He soon moves to Vienna to study medicine, but before leaving, he asks Theresa to wait for him so they can marry after he graduates. Her father soon falls ill and is hospitalised in a psychiatric clinic, where he dies a short time later. Her mother, descended from old but impoverished Croatian nobility, then earns a living by writing sentimental serialised novels. To secure her livelihood, she wants to marry her daughter off to an old count, which Theresa refuses. When she falls in love with a young lieutenant and begins a romantic relationship with him, Alfred learns of it at his university. He insults her in letters. She is left devastated when the lieutenant reveals himself to be an unfaithful lover.

Disgusted by these experiences, Theresa leaves Salzburg to make her own way in Vienna. In the great metropolis, she takes on various positions as a governess. Although there are moments when she considers supplementing her meagre income by prostitution, she never actually does so. She becomes pregnant by a lover, Kasimir Tobisch, an impoverished flautist from German Bohemia. He abandons her, leaving the young, single mother no choice but to place her newborn in the care of farmers in the countryside, earning her living by looking after other people's children. From time to time, Therese flees her position after advances from the head of the household, and at other times due to conflicts with the women of the household. Meanwhile, her son Franz, whom Therese visits occasionally, grows up in the countryside. The young mother, now 27 years old, embarks on a series of love affairs in search of recognition and affection. When Therese becomes pregnant with her second child by an "affected" government official, she has an abortion, as she cannot afford to support another child…

Hugo von Hofmannsthal, a friend and noted Austrian critic, after reading the novel, wrote to Schnitzler on 10 July 1928:

> "The great life story Therese, however, has particularly captivated and occupied me… By telling this story — the life of a Viennese governess — you have already created an entire world… Your special talent for giving a subject the rhythm that transforms it into poetry is particularly evident here."

Stefan Zweig wrote to Schnitzler on 15 May 1928:

> "You have set yourself an immensely difficult problem, for nothing in art is more difficult and thankless to portray than the negative, a certain monotony of happiness and unhappiness, the tragedy of hopelessness. […] You certainly knew from the beginning that you were fundamentally counteracting a public tendency — people always want to see only wealth, affluent milieus, exotic characters, rare and curious experiences — but nothing honors you more than that, at the height of your creative powers, you have taken on the most difficult task that awaits the artist."

By offering insights into Austrian society before the First World War, the novel paints a picture of the downfall of an era, conjuring the unrelenting atmosphere of a true novel of disillusionment. Without condescension or embellishment, Schnitzler describes the misfortune of a young woman from her own perspective. The periodical Le Rider called Schnitzler "Freud's doppelganger", due to how the "unwelcome child" syndrome is examined psychoanalytically. Moreover, a social decline is depicted. Therese falls into bourgeois circles from which she remains excluded. Schnitzler reveals himself as a sociologist of Vienna's inner city. The reader encounters no sentimentality, for the author persistently exposes Theresa's weaknesses.

In spite of the novel's merits, Therese: Chronik eines Frauenlebens was not a success with the public, due to how hopelessness entirely dominates the narrative, as the post-war period had ultimately darkened Schnitzler's "worldview." During this gloomy period readers were, of course, more in favour of light-hearted and positive tales to uplift their spirits.

Schnitzler's friend and fellow author, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, 1910

I

THERESA WAS JUST sixteen years old, that spring, when Lieutenant Hubert Fabiani was retired on his pension and left Vienna, his last post, to settle down in Salzburg — not, like most of his companions, in Graz. When they sat down to breakfast and looked out of the windows of the house which they had rented, and saw across the roofs as far as the Bavarian mountains beyond, the lieutenant never failed to remind his wife and children how fortunate it was that he had been enabled to leave the smoke and dust of the great city while still a hale and hearty man, scarce sixty years of age, and retire to enjoy the delights of Nature, which he had longed for since his youth. He loved to take little walks with Theresa, and sometimes also with her brother Karl, who was three years older than his sister. Their mother remained at home, reading novels — always reading novels — just as she had done in Komorn, where they had first lived, and afterwards in Lemberg, and before that, in Vienna. She took no interest in her home, but, just as in the other cities, she soon surrounded herself with a group of women, the wives or widows of officers and officials, who would stop in for coffee two or three times each week and bring her all the gossip of the little town.

On these occasions, if he chanced to be at home, the Lieutenant would invariably retire to his room. And afterwards, at the evening meal, he did not fail to deliver himself of various malicious remarks concerning his wife's guests. His wife would respond with vague allusions to certain social diversions in which her husband had formerly indulged. Thereupon, it frequently happened that the Lieutenant would rise and leave the house, without saying a word. Late at night, the hollow sound of his footsteps could be heard reverberating through the hall as he slowly mounted the stairs.

When he had gone, his wife would caution her children against the disappointments of life, from which no one is exempt; and in particular, she would declaim against the martyr's lot which falls to women. She took her examples from the books which she had just read, and her narrative was frequently so badly confused that one was inclined to suspect that she had mingled the contents of several novels together. Sometimes, in jest, Theresa could not forbear to give voice to that suspicion. Then her mother would reprove her loudly and, turning to her son, she would caress his hair and stroke his cheeks, as if to reward him for his patient and credulous attention. But she did not observe how he would glance at his disgraced sister and slyly wink his eye at her. Then, presently, Theresa would return to her embroidery or, sitting down at the upright piano, which was always out of tune, continue her practice. She had begun to study piano in Lemberg and had continued in Vienna, under the guidance of a cheap instructress.

The walks with her father suddenly ceased, even before the beginning of autumn. For some time past, Theresa had observed that her father continued his walks only in order not to contradict his former inclinations. Whereas, formerly, he had greeted each new aspect of Nature with cries of delight, forcing his children to join in his pleasure, he now walked silently, without a word, intent upon arriving at the destination which he had set. Only when he had returned and faced his wife did he exhibit a certain belated excitement, and then he would endeavour to stimulate some enthusiasm within himself by recalling the various incidents of the trip. But even that soon ceased, and the tourist costume which the Lieutenant had worn since his retirement was definitely put aside and replaced by a dark business suit.

One morning, however, Fabiani appeared at the breakfast table in his uniform, and with such a stern and forbidding expression on his face that even his wife forbore to permit herself any comments upon this sudden change. Several days later, a shipment of books arrived from Vienna, and soon thereafter, another shipment was received from Leipzig, and a local second-hand dealer also sent a package. Thenceforth, the retired officer passed many hours at his desk, acquainting no one with the nature of his work, until, one evening, with elaborate mysteriousness, he summoned Theresa to his room and read her what he had written. For four successive evenings he read to her, in the brusque tones of a commanding officer, from his carefully written, almost calligraphically inscribed manuscript, which proved to be a treatise on comparative strategy, dealing with the most important battles of the modern era. Theresa had great difficulty in simulating attention, for it was impossible for her to follow with understanding this dull and fatiguing discourse. Still, of late, her father had aroused her more and more to sympathy and pity, so she successfully resisted the insistence of her sleepy, heavy eyelids, and even attempted to express an active interest in the subject which had absorbed him. When the reading was ended, she kissed her father, as if she were grateful for the honour which he had conferred upon her.

At the conclusion of the reading, the Lieutenant carefully carried his manuscript to the Post Office. Thenceforward, from that day, he passed his time in various restaurants and cafés, in the company of certain recent acquaintances. These were, for the most part, men like himself; that is, elderly retired persons, pensioned officers, former lawyers, and even a superannuated actor, who had become too old for the theatre of the town and now gave elocution lessons, when he was fortunate enough to find a pupil. The erstwhile so reserved Lieutenant bloomed forth as a talkative, in fact somewhat obstreperous fellow, who chattered of social and political opinions which came rather strangely from the lips of a former officer. But since he always ended by giving in, as if the whole discussion had only been in jest, no one interfered with him — not even an important police official, who sometimes took part in the discussions.

II

ON CHRISTMAS EVE, a well-wrapped package, inscribed to the Lieutenant, lay beneath the Christmas tree, along with the other modest gifts with which the members of the family remembered one another. Inside was the manuscript, accompanied by a rejection slip from the publisher of the military periodical to which the author had sent it. Fabiani was furious. The date of the postmark informed him that it had been received several days before, and he at once accused his wife of having withheld it and placed it among the Christmas gifts with the intention of taunting and ridiculing him. He hurled the cigar case which she had given him at her feet and strode out of the house, slamming the door behind him. Afterwards, it was learned that he had passed the night in a disreputable house near Saint Peter's Cemetery, in the company of one of those wretched women who sell the service of their bodies to boys and old men. After this, he remained shut up in his study for a few days, to reappear suddenly, in the splendour of his parade dress uniform, while his wife was entertaining her guests at coffee. He surprised every one by his amiability and wit; and he might have left the impression of a consummate man of the world, had he not annoyed some of the ladies in the dark vestibule.

In the days that followed, the Lieutenant spent most of his time away from home, but on his brief appearances there, he was always genial and inoffensive. Then, when at last the calm of relief had settled upon the little household, he astonished his family by asking them suddenly, one evening, how they would fancy the idea of leaving this tiresome town and returning to the capital. He also hinted at some marvelous change impending in their condition of life. Theresa's heart began to beat so excitedly at the prospect that she realized, all at once, how very much she had really been longing to return to the city where they had lived for three years. It was true that she had been able to enjoy none of the pleasures which the city offers to the rich, but she had had such wonderful times just wandering aimlessly through the streets, trying to get lost — a delicious happening which had actually occurred on two or three occasions, and each time had given her an exquisite spasm of terror. Her eyes were still glistening with these memories as she caught her brother's disapproving glance. He had greeted her with just such an expression a few days before, when she had entered his room as he was busy with his mathematics problems, in company with his schoolmate, Alfred Nuellheim. She realized that he always looked at her disapprovingly, whenever she was full of joy. He was doing so now. Her heart was crushed. It was only a few years ago that they were boy and girl together, and then they were boon companions, laughing and playing and happy all day long. What had occurred to change all this?

Even Mother, who, to be sure, was never very much of a companion, had not formerly looked so perpetually displeased. Unconsciously, Theresa glanced at her mother, and the anger which she saw in her parent's face frightened her. She seemed never to have forgiven her husband for having been pensioned off before his time. She gazed at him as he raised his voice and declared that their days of plenty were not far distant, and her eyes were full of hate — as though she were recalling her youth, on her father's estate in Slavonio, when she rode through the primitive forest of their park, mounted on her fiery pony.

Suddenly the father looked at his watch, arose, and excusing himself, left the house at once, on the plea of an important engagement.

He did not return home that night. At the café, he made incomprehensible speeches against the Minister of War and against the Emperor; and from there he was taken to the guard-room, and thence, after a medical examination, to an insane asylum. Subsequently, it developed that he had previously written a letter to the office of the Minister, applying for reinstatement, with advancement to a generalship. Thereupon, an order was received from Vienna to have him watched, but without arousing his suspicion; and his lamentable performance in the café that evening was all that was further necessary to justify his detention and commitment to an institution.

III

HIS WIFE VISITED him on eight successive days. After a few weeks, Theresa received permission to see him. In a large garden surrounded by high walls, down an avenue of tall chestnut trees, garbed in a shabby officer's coat, with a military cap on his head, an old man with a short, thick white beard came forward on the arm of an attendant whose pale face matched his filthy yellow uniform. "Father!" Theresa cried, stricken by a deep emotion, yet happy that at last she might see him once again. He passed on, apparently without having recognized her, mumbling some unintelligible words.

Theresa remained where she stood, disconcerted, unable to grasp this painful situation. Then she observed that the orderly was trying to explain something to her father. At first, the latter merely shook his head; then, he turned round and ran back to his daughter. As if she were still a little girl, he caught her up in his arms and held her in the air, staring at her. Then, suddenly, he released her, and began to weep bitterly. Presently, he covered his face with his hands, as if overcome with shame, and hastened off toward the dull gray building that was faintly visible through the trees. The orderly followed slowly. Theresa's mother had watched the entire proceedings with complete indifference. When Theresa returned to her side, she arose languidly, as if all the while she had merely been sitting there, waiting for her daughter.

The two left the park and emerged upon the broad highway, glittering and white in the blinding sun. Before them was the city, nestled in the side of the mountain and surmounted by the fortress of Hohensalzburg. It was only a fifteen minutes' walk to Salzburg, yet it seemed to Theresa that they would never reach their destination. The hills lifted themselves out of the hot mist of noon. A van went by noisily, the driver sleeping on the box. From a farmhouse across the fields, a dog barked mournfully at the silent world.

"Father!" Theresa whimpered.

Her mother glanced at her angrily.

"What do you want? It is his own fault!"

They walked in silence along the sunny road toward the city.

At table, that evening, Karl remarked:

"Alfred Nuellheim tells me that such sicknesses often last many years. Eight, ten, twelve..."

Theresa opened her eyes wide in horror. Karl compressed his lips and looked away from her at the wall.

IV

SINCE AUTUMN, THERESA had been attending the next to the last grade at the Lyceum. There she had soon been made to realize that diligence and attention were not in themselves enough. Her supervisor distrusted her. Although she was no more lax in her religious studies than her fellow students, and although she attended all the religious exercises which were obligatory, just like every one else, she was suspected of being lacking in piety. Her teacher once encountered her in the company of young Nuellheim, whom she had met by chance one evening on the street; and this the instructress turned to account as an opportune moment to deliver herself of various acrid comments upon certain customs of the big cities which were, as it would appear, gaining a foothold in the provinces. The look which she gave Theresa was hardly to be misunderstood. Theresa felt all the more wronged, since no such commotion was ever aroused by the behaviour of some of her schoolmates, who were, if the gossip were true, guilty of much more flagrant offenses.

Young Nuellheim, however, came to the Fabiani house more frequently than his studies with Karl would seem to have required. In fact, he even came on several occasions when Karl was not at home. At such times, he would sit near Theresa, admiring the cunning of her hands as they embroidered colourful flowers on a background of dull lilac canvas. Or he would listen as she somehow managed to get through one of Chopin's nocturnes on her out-of-tune piano. Once, remembering some earlier remark, he asked her if she still intended to become a teacher. She did not know exactly what to answer. One thing, at least, was certain. She did not propose to live much longer in these rooms and in this town. Soon — as soon as possible, in fact — she would find herself some kind of work, and preferably, that would be in some other city.

The situation at home was becoming worse and worse, as even Alfred could perceive. Theresa had ceased to speak, and had lapsed into an attitude of impassive retrospection. Her mother still received her friends, just as before — there were some strange men among them now, — and they frequently remained far into the night. This, in itself, did not greatly disturb Theresa, but it widened the breach between herself and her mother. Her brother not only carefully avoided his mother, but he likewise kept away from Theresa.

At meals, no more than the absolutely necessary words A were spoken. And sometimes it seemed to Theresa as though, in some incomprehensible manner, she were being held responsible for the downfall of the household. Somehow, although she could not grasp the cause or meaning of this sentiment, the fault was upon her head.

V

THERESA WAS ALMOST afraid to contemplate paying another visit to the asylum; but, curiously enough, it turned out very well, except for one disturbing incident. That incident, however, completely obliterated all the hopes which had of late arisen in her heart with regard to her father's condition. At first, her father had conversed with her in his old, gay manner; and then he had taken her about, showing her the extensive grounds of the institution, as though she were some distinguished visitor. He seemed perfectly rational. But when she took leave of him, he mentioned casually that, when she came the next time, he would receive her in his General's uniform, in anticipation of his approaching appointment.

The next day, she related the incidents of her visit to Alfred Nuellheim, who immediately asked to be allowed to accompany her on her next trip. It was his ambition, as Theresa knew, to study medicine and become a nerve specialist and psychiatrist. So, a few days later, they met, as if for a secret assignation, outside the boundaries of the town, and proceeded together to the asylum, where the former Lieutenant greeted Alfred as though he had been expecting him all the while. This time, he spoke of his youth, of the various garrisons which he had known, and of the Croatian estate where he had met his wife. He spoke of her as if she no longer existed, and he seemed to have completely forgotten his son.

Alfred was introduced to the officiating physician, who treated him with considerable deference; in fact, almost as though they were already colleagues. On their long walk home, Theresa was profoundly agitated at the thought of Alfred, walking beside her and talking with pleasant excitement of the episodes of their visit, but with no sorrow at all — just as if it were all merely a somewhat momentous occasion in his new career. He did not notice the tears streaming down her cheeks.

VI

IT WAS LIKEWISE at about this time that Theresa became conscious of a new attitude in the manner in which her schoolmates conducted themselves toward her. She became aware that they were whispering among themselves. Conversations suddenly ceased when she approached, and her teacher never spoke to her or questioned her any more at all. Never, nowadays, did she have a companion on the way home. Only in Clara Traunfurt's eyes did Theresa observe a sign of pity. It was this girl who, at last, took her aside and told her of the rumour that the company which gathered at her mother's house was not quite proper, and that the police had summoned Frau Fabiani to court and had warned her. Then, for the first time, it occurred to Theresa that, in fact, there had been no gatherings at the house in the past two or three weeks.

That evening, after Clara's explanations, she noticed that Karl did not speak a single word to his mother during the entire meal. Then she realized that, for at least a week, she had not seen him address her even once. When Karl had left the room and her mother followed shortly, she breathed more easily. She remained seated at the table, bathed in the rays of the descending spring sun. She sat there for a long time, gazing before her with fixed eyes, as if she were troubled by a nightmare.

That same night, she was awakened by a noise in the drawing room. She heard the front door being carefully opened and as carefully closed, and then she heard steps on the stairs. She arose from bed and looked out of the window. A few minutes later, the door below was opened, and she saw a man in uniform, his face hidden by the raised collar of his coat, accompanied by a woman, veiled and wrapped in a cloak, step out and quickly disappear round the corner.

Theresa determined to demand of her mother some explanation of these strange proceedings. But when an opportunity presented itself, her courage failed her. She felt, more now than ever before, how unapproachable her mother had become. They had become practically strangers. Lately, it seemed as if that aging, flighty woman wished to make herself appear a personage of mystery. She had cultivated a queer, shuffling gait, and upset things noisily, for no good reason, mumbling incoherent phrases; and no sooner had she finished her meal, than she left the table and locked herself for hours at a time in her room, where she remained writing with a scratching pen on long sheets of paper.

At first, Theresa suspected that she was preparing her defense against the police; but then she recollected that her mother had frequently declared her intention of compiling her memoirs. As it happened, however — Frau Fabiani mentioned it at table, very casually, as though it were a matter of common knowledge — she was writing a novel. Theresa glanced at her brother with involuntary surprise. But he was gazing beyond her at the Sonnenkringel.

VII

EARLY IN JULY, Karl Fabiani and Alfred Nuellheim stood for their final examinations. Alfred received the highest marks in his class, whereas Karl received merely a passing grade. Some days later, he set out on a walking trip, after having bidden his mother and sister farewell, hastily and coldly, quite as though he intended to return home that same evening. Alfred, who, according to their earlier plans, was to have accompanied him on this journey, seized upon a slight illness of his mother as a pretext to remain temporarily in the city. He came almost daily to the Fabiani household, at first, presumably to fetch books, and at other times to inquire for news of Karl. It so happened that these afternoon visits were followed, on fine summer evenings, by promenades with Theresa — promenades that were gradually extended into longer and more intimate walks.

One evening, as they were seated on a bench in the neighbourhood of Monchsburg, he again spoke of his intention of entering the University of Vienna in the fall, to study medicine. This, as well as most of the things which he told her, was not news to Theresa. In fact, when he confessed that he had foregone the pleasures of his vacation trip only to be enabled to pass these last few months in her company, she was not in the least surprised. She remained quite untouched, unmoved, and was even a little exasperated; it seemed to her almost as if this young creature, this shy boy, was presuming to present her with a promissory note which she had no desire to pay.

Two officers went by. One of them Theresa knew by sight, as she did almost all the men in the regiment stationed there. The other, however, was a stranger. He was a clean-shaven, dark-haired, slim young person, and — a peculiarity which attracted her attention — he carried his hat in his hand.

His eyes passed lightly over Theresa; and, as Nuellheim and the other officer greeted one another, he likewise greeted the pair; but, being bareheaded, contented himself with repeated nods of the head, at the same time fixing a vivacious, almost laughing glance upon Theresa. Nevertheless, he did not glance back to look at her, as she half expected he would, but turned a bend in the Allee and disappeared with his friend. After this interruption, Theresa and Alfred were unable to reëstablish the cordial tenor of their former conversation. They sat for a short interval in silence; then they arose, and walked slowly homeward in the twilight.

VIII

KARL WAS EXPECTED back around the beginning of August; but instead, a letter arrived, announcing his decision not to return to Salzburg at all, and expressing the wish that his monthly allowance should be forwarded to Vienna, where, through the aid of an advertisement, he had already secured a position as tutor to a young student. A casual inquiry as to his father's present condition and greetings to both his mother and his sister closed his letter, in which there was to be found not the remotest suggestion of regret at this apparently permanent separation. The content and tone of the letter made little impression upon the mother; but to Theresa, despite the coolness which had gradually arisen between herself and her brother, there persisted, to her own astonishment, a certain sense of injury, of having been forsaken. Her inveterate annoyance with Alfred deepened. He was not man enough to help her overcome this depressing loneliness, and his shyness began to irritate her and to appear somewhat ridiculous in her eyes. Once, while they were walking outside the city, he attempted to take her arm, and pressed it ever so gently; but she tore herself away from him with alarming violence, and for the remainder of the walk, and even while he was taking leave of her before her door, she continued to maintain a cold and unbending attitude toward him.

One day, Frau Fabiani accused her daughter of gross neglect of her duties to her mother, of paying absolutely no attention to her, and of seeming to have time for no one else but Alfred Nuellheim. In that very hour, Theresa accompanied her mother on a walk through the city; and during their promenade, she had occasion to note that two women, who had formerly frequented the Fabiani household, passed her mother without greeting her.

A few days later, a similar excursion led them to the outskirts of the city. On the far side of the stone boundary wall, an elderly gentleman with a gray mustache came toward them and was apparently about to walk by; but, instead, he suddenly turned and stopped, remarking, in a tone that sounded somewhat self-conscious, "Frau Fabiani, if I am not mistaken!" Frau Fabiani addressed him as "Count," and presented her daughter. He inquired as to the health of the former Lieutenant, and, quite unasked, told of his two sons, who, since the recent death of his wife, were being brought up in a French academy.

When he had taken his leave, Frau Fabiani remarked: "Count Benkheim, the former District Commissioner! Didn't you recognize him?" Theresa involuntarily looked back. She observed his extreme leanness, the elegant though somewhat too light suit which he wore, and the youthful, quick, and intentionally soft step with which he went away, somewhat more hastily than he had come forward.

IX

SOME DAYS AFTER this encounter, Theresa was at home, awaiting Alfred Nuellheim. He had promised to bring her some books and take her for a walk. As a matter of fact, the prospect itself bored her somewhat; she would have much preferred to go out alone, even though, of late, strange men had accosted her, and a few had even dared to follow her. At this time of the year, the city was usually overrun with strangers.

Ever since her childhood, Theresa had felt a strong curiosity and attraction toward everything that bore the marks of elegance and refinement. At the age of twelve, while in Lemberg, she had been smitten by the charms of a handsome dashing young Archduke, who was then serving in her father's regiment in the capacity of Lieutenant. How often she regretted that Alfred, whose parents were well-to-do and who had a good figure and fine features, never seemed to observe the changes in styles; that his clothes were persistently small-townish.

Entering the room, Frau Fabiani expressed surprise at finding that, on such an exquisite day, Theresa should have chosen to remain indoors. Quite casually, she began talking of Count Benkheim, whom she said she had met accidentally again that day. The Count was greatly interested in everything pertaining to the science of war. He intended, one day, to stop in and examine Father's library, with a view to purchasing it, should the books prove interesting to him.

"That is not true!" said Theresa, and without another word, left the room.

She took her hat and coat, ran down the stairs, and met Alfred at the door.

"At last!" she cried.

He apologized profusely — he had been unavoidably detained at home. It was already growing dark.

"What is wrong?" asked Alfred. "Why are you so hot and excited?"

"It is nothing," she replied.

At that moment, a novel thought occurred to her. Did not Alfred think it would be delightful to dine this evening in one of those big hotel gardens? He and she, alone, among all those strange people? He reddened. How happy he would have been to comply with her desire! But, alas! today it was quite impossible. He had very little money with him — certainly, not enough to cover the expense of dinner for two at a fashionable hotel. She looked at him and smiled.

He blushed an even deeper red, and she was a little touched.

"Another time!" he begged, shyly.

She merely nodded her assent.

They resumed their walk through the streets, and were soon outside the city. Then they directed their steps along their favourite path through the fields. The evening air was stifling. Over them stretched a starless sky. The city receded further and further into the background, as they wandered on through the fields of wheat. Alfred held Theresa's hand lightly in his own. He asked about Karl. She shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, he seldom writes!" she replied.

"I have not had a word from him since he went away," said Alfred.

Soon again the topic of conversation was his impending journey to Vienna. Theresa was silent. Her eyes looked beyond him. Would she at least write to him? She grew impatient.

"What shall I write to you? Nothing ever happens here. One day is just like another."

"Yes, but even now, one day is like the other," he answered, "and yet, we have so much to tell one another! Still, I shall be perfectly contented, even happy, with merely a word of greeting from you."

Emerging from the undulating fields, they entered the street. The forts of Nonnberg and the tall poplars were clearly outlined against the wall of darkness.

Suddenly, in a much milder spirit, Theresa asked if he thought he would be homesick.

"Only for you!" he replied, gravely.

This was the first time that Alfred, in speaking to her, had employed the more familiar "Du," and she was grateful.

"I can't understand why you and your mother continue to live in Salzburg. You have nothing to keep you here."

"Nor anything to attract us elsewhere!"

"It might even be possible to place your father in another asylum, in the vicinity of Vienna."

"No, no!" she objected, vehemently.

"But you had intended — that is, you spoke of a profession, of taking a position!"

"Do not anticipate! I still have another year of school, before I can take my normal examinations!" She shook her head decidedly. In some strange manner, she seemed rooted to the spot. Her agitation subsiding, she added:

"But you will doubtless come back for the Christmas holidays, if only for the sake of your family."

"But we are a long way from Christmas, Theresa!"

"You won't even have time to think of me, with your studies and all! You will meet new people — women and girls!" She smiled to herself, fully aware that, where he was concerned, she felt no jealousy — that, in fact, she was quite devoid of any emotion.

"In less than six years, I shall be a doctor!" The words shot out abruptly. "Will you wait for me that long?"

She gazed at him. At first, her mind did not grasp the situation. Then, a slight smile played upon her lips. She was touched. It seemed to her that she was so much older than he! In that very instant, she realized that all this was sheer childishness, and that nothing more would ever come of it. She took his hand and stroked it gently.

Later, in the darkness, in the secluded vestibule of her home, as she was bidding him good-night, she closed her eyes and returned his kiss almost passionately.

X

EVERY EVENING, THEY would wander outside the city, through the seldom frequented paths in the fields, talking without end of a future in which Theresa could not believe.

At home, during the day, she embroidered a little, studied her French, practiced the piano, or read for short intervals; but for the greater part of the time, she sat almost without a thought, gazing idly out of the window.

In spite of the impatience with which she daily awaited Alfred's coming, she would not be in his company more than a quarter of an hour when she was overcome by an inexpressible boredom. Then, when he spoke once again, in the course of their walk, of his impending departure, she would realize, with a little shock, how eagerly she was awaiting that day.

He was aware that she felt no painful revulsion at the thought of his absence, and he told her as much. She was exasperated, and answered evasively.

Their first quarrel ensued.

They continued on their way homeward in silence, and parted without a kiss. Afterwards, for a long time, she sat on her bed in the darkness, staring out of the open window into the hot, black night. Her heart was heavy. There, not far distant, under this selfsame heaven, was the bleak building in which her poor, insane father was slowly perishing. Who knew how long — how long! — he might have to wait for the end! In the next room, her mother, also wakeful, was writing without pause. She, too, seemed to have fallen under a spell. They had become more and more estranged as the days had multiplied.

No girl friend sought Theresa's company. Even Clara no longer came. Alfred meant nothing to her — less than nothing, for he did not understand her. He was noble, he was clean — and Theresa knew instinctively that she herself possessed neither of these virtues; furthermore, that she had no desire to cultivate them. Inwardly, she held them in contempt. Why could he not have been a little more imperative in his attentions? Yet, all the while, she knew that any untoward advances upon his part would have been instantly repulsed.

Thoughts of other young people entered her mind; people she knew but slightly, and some possibly only from having seen them several times, but for whom, as she admitted to herself, she was sensible of a more keen attraction, a warmer feeling of kinship, than she had ever experienced in Alfred's company. And so she realized that even a quick exchange of glances on the street between two certain persons of opposite sexes, might constitute a stronger bond than hours of close companionship between two others.

With a delicious little shiver, she recalled that lovely summer day, near Monchsberg, when a young officer, hat in hand, had walked by. His eyes had met hers and glowed; then he had gone on, without so much as a glance behind him. She felt certain that in that moment, he knew more, much more, about her than Alfred, who believed himself engaged to her; Alfred, who had kissed her so many times, and who clung to her with all the fervour of his soul. She felt that all this was not as it should be. But the fault, if fault there was, was not hers.

XI

THE NEXT DAY brought a letter from Alfred. He had not slept at all the night before. Would she please forgive him, if he had hurt her yesterday? For him, the slightest cloud upon her brow was sufficient to darken the brightest day. Through four long pages, he continued in this vein. She smiled, somewhat softened, and pressed the letter mechanically to her lips. Then, half purposely and half accidentally, she allowed the letter to fall on her sewing table. She was exceedingly glad that she did not have to answer it. After all, they would meet this evening at their accustomed trysting place.

About mid-day, her mother entered her room, smiling sweetly.

"Count Benkheim is here for the second time" — it quite escaped her that she had failed to mention a former visit— "so as to give Father's library a more thorough and careful examination. He is ready to pay a very tidy sum to secure it. The Count expressed a sincere interest in the condition of Father's health, — and, by the way, he also asked about you, Theresa."

As Theresa remained seated and continued her embroidering in complete silence, her lips pressed tightly together, her mother drew nearer and whispered: "Come, we owe him thanks! Yes, you, too! It would be tactless not to greet him. I demand it of you!"

Theresa arose and, with her mother, went into the next room, where the Count was in the act of turning the leaves of a large illustrated octavo volume that was lying on the table. He came forward immediately and expressed his happiness at being permitted to see Theresa once again.

In the course of the polite and entirely unconstrained conversation which ensued, he desired to know if the ladies cared to make use of his carriage when paying their visits to the former Lieutenant. Also, he suggested that they might use it for a little excursion to Hellbrun, or to go wherever they wished. He would be delighted to place the carriage at their disposal. He became somewhat more reticent, when he discovered only opposition and unfriendliness in Theresa's manner.

Soon he took his leave, with the promise to come back after his return from a short business trip, which he could no longer postpone. And then, he promised, he would settle the business transactions concerning the purchase of the library. As a parting token of esteem, he kissed the hands of both mother and daughter.

The door closed after him. There was a heavy silence. Theresa was about to leave the room, without speaking. Her mother's voice retained her.

"You certainly might have been a little more cordial!"

Theresa turned, but remained at the door.

"Indeed, I was too cordial!"

And she again turned to depart. At this, her mother, although entirely unprovoked, began to heap abuse on Theresa's head, using many harsh words to describe her displeasure at her daughter's impolite, yes, impudent behaviour. It almost seemed that she was now giving vent to a resentment which she had allowed to rankle within her for days and weeks.

Surely, the Count was as fine a gentleman as that young Nuellheim, with whom her daughter chose to be seen promenading the streets of the city and its environs at all times of the day and night! Was it not a hundred times more decent to display a certain degree of acquiescence toward a settled, well-established gentleman of refinement, rather than to throw herself away on a student who was, after all, merely playing his own little game with her?

As Frau Fabiani grew more and more unsparing in her choice of words, her daughter could no longer doubt the truth of certain suspicions which for some time past she had entertained. Without shame, her mother now spoke of what she expected of her; what in fact, she felt herself entitled to require of her daughter.

"Do you imagine for one moment that things can go on as they are? We are starving, Theresa! Are you so madly in love that you are unaware of this? And the Count would support you — all of us — even Father. No one need know of it, not even young Nuellheim!"

In her anxiety, she came closer and closer to her daughter. Theresa could feel her breath upon her cheek. Shrinking away, she rushed to the door. Her mother called after her:

"Don't go away! Dinner is ready!"

"I don't want any dinner! Aren't we starving, anyhow?" Theresa cried, almost hysterical with excitement and scorn, as she rushed from the house.

It was dinner time, and the streets were almost deserted. Should she go to Alfred, who lived with his parents? Oh, he was not man enough to take up her cause, to defend her against peril and shame. And yet her mother was deluded by the belief that he was her lover! It was really amusing! Well, then, where to? Had she possessed sufficient money, she would have simply gone straightway to the depot and taken a train, bound no matter where, though preferably straight to Vienna. There were opportunities in plenty there to support oneself and to live decently, even though one had not been graduated from the Normal School. For example, the sixteen-year-old sister of one of her schoolmates had recently gone to Vienna to accept a position as nurse-maid in the home of an attorney. She was evidently getting on famously. One had only to manage such things. Had not this long been her plan? Without more ado, she bought a Viennese newspaper and, finding a shaded bench in the gardens, seated herself and began perusing the advertisements. She found a few offers that seemed to suit her purpose. Some one was looking for a governess for a five-year-old girl; another desired one for two boys; and a third, a suitable companion to take care of a somewhat backward little girl. In one house, a slight knowledge of French was required; in another, skill in needlecraft was desired; in still another, the rudiments of a musical education. She could satisfy all of these requirements. Thank God, she was not completely lost! At the very first opportunity, she would pack up her belongings and depart.

Possibly, matters might be so arranged that she and Alfred could travel to Vienna together. She smiled to herself. She would not tell him anything before, but simply board the same train, the same compartment — wouldn't that be jolly?

Then, she found herself reflecting that, after all, she would prefer to travel alone, or with anybody else but Alfred. She would not mind undertaking the trip with some one wholly unknown to her; say, that elegant stranger who had stared her so shamefully out of countenance as she was crossing the Salzbach Bridge, only a short time ago. He must have been either Italian or French. She carelessly turned the pages of her paper and read of the display of fireworks at the Prater, of a train wreck, of an accident which had occurred in the mountains, when suddenly she was held by the following headline: "Attempt to Murder Lover."

The story was that of an unmarried mother, who had shot and severely wounded her faithless lover. Maria Meitner — that was the poor creature's name. Yes, such things were likely to happen to any one. But no, not to her! Never to those who were clever. One must not take a lover nor have a child. One must never lose one's head. Above all, one must never trust a man!

XII

THERESA WALKED HOME slowly, much quieter in spirit now. In her heart, she no longer felt any anger against her mother. The meagre meal had been kept warm. Her mother silently placed it before her. Then she reached for the paper which Theresa had dropped on the table. She searched for the most recent installment of a romance which she was following, and read with almost feverish excitement.

After eating, Theresa picked up her embroidery and seated herself near the window. She thought of poor Fraulein Maria Meitner, who was probably in prison by now. Did she have parents? Had she been shunned? Deep down in her heart, had she loved some other man more than she did her lover? And why did she have a child? There were many women who enjoyed life, yet suffered no such unfortunate consequences.

All sorts of things came to her mind; forbidden things, which she had learned within the last two or three years, through the confidences of her schoolmates. The subjects of several indecent conversations, as she was wont to term such talk, were again animated in her mind. Suddenly, a distaste arose within her for all the things touching sex. She remembered how, only a few years ago, while she was still a mere child, she and two of her little friends had solemnly pledged their word to one another to enter a convent. Now, at this moment, she again experienced that same yearning. Only, this time it was different, more sober, and tinged with unrest and fear, as if there could be no peace or security against the hazards which existence in this world entailed, save behind the walls of a cloister.

The heat of the day was gradually abating, and the evening sun cast shadows across the house fronts — long shadows, which reached almost as high as the fourth floor. Her fear and sadness disappeared. She found herself more happy than she had ever been before at the prospect of seeing Alfred.

As was their custom, they met on the outskirts of the city.

Alfred's eyes glowed mildly. Theresa noted the almost noble candour of his face.

She felt a queer pang at her heart, and became ill at ease at the thought of how much more she knew or surmised of the facts of life than he. At the same time, she felt so unworthy of him! He came from a cleaner, finer atmosphere than she. He resembled his father in figure and carriage. She frequently saw Doctor Nuellheim on the street, and he had invariably passed by her without the slightest sign of recognition. Alfred's mother, and his sisters, too, likewise knew her by sight. Could it be that they suspected anything? Recently, when she had encountered them by accident, they had turned sharply round and had stared at her strangely. Alfred's sisters were nineteen and twenty respectively. No doubt, they both would soon be married. The family was well-to-do, and respected in the community. How easy it was for them! How completely absent from their thoughts was the most remote possibility that Doctor Nuellheim, physician to the city's best families, might ever be placed in an asylum for the insane!

Alfred, perceiving that Theresa's mind was elsewhere, asked to know if anything was amiss. She merely shook her head, and pressed his hand fervently.

The days were growing shorter, and twilight came early. Alfred and Theresa were seated on a bench, in the midst of the greensward. The horizon stretched out before them, broken by the blue hills in the distance. Vague sounds came up from the city. The long, droning whistle of a locomotive could be heard. Now and again, carriages rolled by in the road, and the shadows of pedestrians flitted past in the dying light.

Alfred and Theresa were pressed in each other's arms. Theresa's heart was filled with tenderness. Later, when she remembered this first love, it was always this evening that the recollection evoked in her memory — she and he, sitting on a bench between the fields and the plains, with the night spreading itself over the hills and far-stretching horizon. Faint whistling sounds came to their ears. It was the croaking of the frogs in a lake, somewhere beyond the darkness.

XIII

SOMETIMES THEY SPOKE of the future.

Then, Alfred would call Theresa his dearest, his bride. She must wait for him! In six years' time, at the very most, he would have received his doctor's degree; and then, she would become his wife. And, as if she were now mysteriously protected, she was no longer obliged to suffer harsh words from her mother, but was treated almost lovingly by her.

One morning, Frau Fabiani came to Theresa's bed and, with gleaming eyes, handed her a newspaper. There, on the page reserved for fiction and general features, was the beginning of a romance, entitled: "The Magnate's Curse," by Julie Fabiani-Halmos. Frau Fabiani seated herself on the edge of the bed, while Theresa read. The story began precisely as did hundreds of others. Every sentence was familiar to Theresa, as if she had read it many times before. When she had finished, she nodded silently to her mother, with pretended amazement.

Frau Fabiani took the paper and proceeded to read the entire installment again aloud, her voice filled with emotion and importance. When she had finished, she said:

"The novel will run serially for three months. I have already received half of the money — almost as much as half a year's pension for a Lieutenant."

That evening, when Theresa met Alfred, she was greatly surprised to find him more carefully, yes, almost elegantly dressed. He might easily have been mistaken for one of the better class of travellers who frequented the city at this time of the year. Alfred was pleased to note the satisfaction in Theresa's eyes, and, with mock formality, begged the honour of her company, that night, at dinner in the Hotel Europe.

She accepted with delight.

Soon, they were sitting in the brightly-lighted, park-like garden, before a tastefully laid table, looking for all the world like a fashionable couple on their wedding trip.

The waiter received Alfred's order with some condescension. But they were served an excellent meal. By the unusual vigour of her appetite, Theresa was made conscious of the fact that her hunger had not actually been appeased this long while. The mild, sweet wine was quite delicious. At first, she was shy and constrained, hardly daring to lift her eyes from her plate. Then, gradually, she was liberated from her embarrassment, and glanced mischievously at those about her. On all sides, she saw eyes turned in her direction. Not only young and older men, but also women, as well seemed to look at her with pleasure and surprise.

Alfred became expansive, talking all manner of gallant nonsense, as he had never done before. Theresa laughed. from time to time, in a shrill and unnatural staccato. Alfred, apparently suffering from a poverty of amusing ideas, was asking in a whisper, for the third or fourth time, whether she fancied that they were being taken for an eloping pair of lovers, or perhaps for a young married couple, just returned from their honeymoon in France. At that moment, several officers passed by, and among them Theresa immediately recognized an officer with dark hair and yellow lapels as the person who had disturbed her thoughts more than once that week.

The officer knew her at once — she was sure of it — though he had the delicacy to turn his eyes away. He seated himself, not, as she had hoped, at a nearby table, but at one some distance from theirs. Alfred's good humour was suddenly gone. The gleam in Theresa's eyes had not escaped him. With the intuition of a jealous lover, he was aware that something of deep portent had just occurred.

As he was refilling her glass, she guiltily pressed his hand; then, realizing the clumsiness of her gesture, said quickly:

"Shall we go?"

There was an awkward silence.

"Mother will be anxious about me," she added, although certainly she had no need to be deterred in her pleasure by such a fear. "What did you tell them at home, Alfred?"

He blushed.

"You know that my parents are away," he replied.

"Oh, yes!" she said.

Now she understood why he had been so bold today.

How clumsily he arose, after paying the check! Instead of allowing her to precede him, as was customary, he passed in front of her; and then she perceived how much he resembled a schoolboy in his Sunday clothes. She, on the other hand, clad in a simple blue and white foulard dress, walked between the tables toward the exit like a young lady accustomed to dining in a big hotel every evening. After all, her mother was a Baroness, who had been raised in a castle and had ridden on a fiery pony! For the first time in her life, Theresa was proud of that.

They walked silently through the empty streets. Alfred pressed Theresa's arm in his own.

"What would you say," he remarked, in a frivolous tone that did not suit him at all, "what would you say if we were to go now to a coffee house?"

She refused. It was too late. Oh, yes, he was indeed a schoolboy! He might have suggested something better than a farewell hour in a coffee house! For example, why had he not hailed that cabby there, asleep at his post, so that he might ride her out into the beautiful, mild, summer night? How closely she would have nestled in his arms; how ardently she would have kissed him; how much she would have loved him, if he had! But she could not expect such clever ideas to be born in his stolid brain!

A short time afterwards, they were standing before Theresa's door. The street was quite dark. Alfred drew Theresa to him more passionately than he had ever done before. She gave him her lips eagerly and, with eyes tightly closed, she knew how noble and pure was his love.

As she ascended the stairs, she was filled with yearning and sadness. She unlocked the apartment door very softly, so as not to disturb her mother; and, after she had gone to bed, she remained awake far into the night, reflecting that, after all, the evening had not been entirely unsuccessful.

XIV

WHILE AT TABLE with her mother, the following day, Theresa received a beautiful bouquet of white roses, brought to her in a narrow cut-glass vase. Her first thought was of the officer; her second, of Alfred.

The card read:

"Count Benkheim begs that the sweet little Fraulein Theresa will be good enough to accept this modest offering."

Frau Fabiani gazed steadily before her, as though the entire matter were of no consequence at all. Theresa placed the vase on the sideboard and, forgetting to return to the table, picked up a book and sat down near the window in a rocking chair.

Her mother continued her meal alone. Then, not uttering a word, she left the room, her feet dragging after her.

On the way to the station, the rendezvous arranged for the evening — she and Alfred daily chose a different place — Theresa encountered the officer. He greeted her with elaborate politeness, never betraying, by the slightest revelatory smile, their mutual secret. Her nod thanked him. She quickened her pace until she was almost running. She was relieved that Alfred, whom she found waiting, failed to observe her excitement. He seemed moody and confused. They strolled along the dusty, monotonous road towards Maria Plain. Some effort was made at conversation, though each painstakingly avoided all reference to the preceding night. As a storm threatened, they were soon forced to retrace their steps. They parted earlier than usual.

For all their sadness, the ensuing evenings were still delightful. The moment of separation approached. Alfred was to leave for Vienna during the first week in September, to meet his father.

Theresa's heart was grieved. When Alfred discussed his impending departure, she vowed eternal faithfulness and promised to persuade her mother to move to Vienna as soon as such a change might be practicable. She told him that, for the moment, her mother would hear nothing of it. But things might alter, during the winter.

In all this, she knew that there was not a morsel of truth. Theresa was more determined than ever to leave home, but she would do so alone. In her scheme, Alfred played no part. And this was by no means her primary deception of him.

Several days after the meeting at the station, she again saw the young officer, who was preceding her on the Domplatz as she was leaving the church which she occasionally frequented at this hour, though not through piety so much as in the desire of securing peaceful communion with herself.

As though it were the most natural thing in the world, he stopped and greeted her. She knew only his Christian name, Max. He apologized for at last seizing the opportunity to meet her personally. The regiment to which he was attached was leaving for three weeks of manoeuvres, during which time he sincerely hoped that Fraulein Theresa...

Why, of course he knew her name! Fraulein Theresa Fabiani was not an unknown person in Salzburg! Besides, was not a novel by her mother at that very time running in the "Tageblatt"? He hoped that Fraulein Theresa would think of him while he was away, as she might of a friend — a quietly adoring, patiently aspiring friend.

He took her hand, kissed it, and was instantly gone.

She turned round to ascertain if any one had witnessed the encounter. The sun-flooded Domplatz was almost deserted. Only a few women remained on the other side. She knew them by sight. Whom does one not know in a small town? Alfred, all the same, would probably never learn from them that an officer had addressed her and kissed her hand.

He heard nothing. Nor did he know of Count Benkheim's visits to the house, or of the roses he had sent her, or of the second bouquet which had come that morning. He was in ignorance of her mother's changed attitude. She was consistently friendly and gentle, as though confident that she could calmly await further developments.

Theresa quietly permitted many purchases to be made for her — nothing costly; only necessities like underwear, several pairs of shoes, and English material for a street frock.

She also observed that the quality of the food served at home was improved. All this, surely, could not be coming from the money which her mother had received from the sale of the novel! Well, it was all equally inconsequential to her. It would not be long now. She was determined to leave home and, long before the Lieutenant returned, she would be far away.

Of all these facts, as well as problems, Alfred was happily ignorant. He still called her his dearest bride, and talked as though it were absolutely a foregone conclusion that, within six years, when he should become a doctor, he would lead Theresa to the altar.

When they sat on that same bench in the fields, as so often happened, and she listened to his protestation of love, she would sometimes respond. In those moments, she almost believed all that he told her, and part of what she herself replied.

XV

ONE MORNING, AFTER an evening that had been like so many others, a letter came from him. Only a few words. He wrote that, by the time she read these lines, he would already be on the train that was to take him to Vienna. He had not had the courage to tell her yesterday. Would she please try to understand and forgive him? He loved her inexpressibly, eternally!

She let the page slip from her hand. She was most unhappy, but she did not weep. It was all over. She knew that it was all over — and for ever. It was more uncanny than tragic that she should be aware of this, and he should not. Her mother came back from town. She had been shopping at the market.

"Imagine whom I saw this morning," she asked, gleefully, "rushing with bag and baggage toward the depot? Why, who but your Céladon! Yes, now he is gone. Didn't you bid him God-speed?" She was much inclined to use trite, old fashioned, bookish phrases in her ordinary speech.

Her mother's relief at this turn of affairs was only too manifest. At last, the sole obstacle to the successful culmination of her plans had been eliminated!

Meanwhile, Theresa's thoughts centered upon the prospect of immediate departure. She would leave today; she would follow him at once.

"I will borrow the few gulden I need for the trip. Perhaps Clara..."

She left the house, and was soon standing beneath the windows of her friend's home. Her courage forsook her; she did not dare to mount the steps. The shutters were closed. Perhaps the Braunfurts were still in the country! No, for there was Clara, coming out of the entrance. Pretty and well dressed, as usual, seemingly pure and innocent. She greeted Theresa effusively, then began almost at once on the themes that she loved best. Without actually expressing anything off-colour, she constantly toyed with double meanings. After casually mentioning her regret at the infrequency of these meetings, she presently alluded to the Nuellheim family in a tone the significance of which was unmistakable. It left Theresa in no doubt whatever as to her friend's attitude regarding her relation with Alfred.

Theresa was not offended, but, completely conscious of her innocence, she endeavoured to enlighten Clara. Whereupon that young lady replied, contemptuously:

"How can any one be so stupid!"

An acquaintance approached, and Clara took her departure with conspicuous haste.

XVI

TOWARD EVENING, AT the hour when Theresa was accustomed to meet Alfred, she attempted to write to him. She was surprised to find it so difficult, and contented herself with only a few lines. She was more unhappy than he, had no thoughts but of him, and hoped that God would arrange all things for the best.

She mailed the letter, knowing it to be stupid and insincere.

Returning home immediately, she found it difficult to keep her mind occupied. She picked up her embroidery, tried to read, practiced piano scales and exercises — to no avail. Finally, nervous and bored, she glanced at the paper that contained her mother's novel.

What a trite tale it was, and how pompous its language! It described the romance of a noble family. The father, according to the repetitious descriptions, was a hard and stern, though generous magnate; his wife, a sweet-natured, ailing creature; their son, a gambler, duelist, and seducer; their daughter, a blond person of angelic purity, a veritable fairy princess. A dark family secret was being unearthed. An ancient, worn-out, loyal servant knew that somewhere in the park a treasure was buried; that it had in fact remained there since the Turkish invasion. There was much talk about piety and virtue. No person in the world would have attributed to the author a desire to force an old Count on her own daughter.

Alfred's letters came almost daily. His father, he informed her, had awaited him at the station, and rented a room for him in the Alservorstadt. Together, they had visited the museums and theatres. The paternal attitude indicated an inkling of knowledge of their affair. While dining in a restaurant one evening, he had remarked that all young people cherish a host of impractical ideas which must of necessity be discarded. He, in his youth, had been obsessed by similar ideas, but had naturally overcome them. Before all else, Alfred must now think only of his studies, his career, and the serious business of life.

Theresa felt that Alfred might have spared her these details. Was he already trying to escape his responsibilities? She had demanded nothing of him. He could do as he liked. It was harder than ever to answer him now. Almost apologetically, she complained of the dearth of material for letter-writing in so small a town. Everything was pursuing its accustomed course.

She could not tell him of what was actually occurring — nothing about Count Benkheim's last visit, for example. He had been very entertaining, without making his real intentions too manifest. He spoke of his travels in the Orient. As a young man, he had been attached to the embassy in Persia; and at present, he was planning a trip round the world. With this last remark, he had gazed at her, intently and significantly. She pretended not to grasp his innuendos. Yes, a world tour would have been very much to her liking — but preferably, with some one other than the Count.

He likewise spoke of her father, not without sympathy and respect. He was certain that the shock to his pride, attendant upon his dismissal, had been the sole cause of his misfortune.

Theresa, in contrition over her neglect — it was now three weeks since she had given a thought to her poor, insane father — visited the asylum the next day. She found him seemingly in full possession of his faculties. He devoted particular attention to his dress. Not since the old days had she seen him so carefully and fastidiously garbed. But, alas! he did not recognize his daughter, and addressed her as though she were an utter stranger.

In a letter to Alfred, she alluded to the compassion and filial piety which she felt for the old man, but was incapable of revealing her true feelings in this matter, any more than in the expressions of tenderness and yearning which she addressed to her absent beloved. What could she do? It was impossible to tell him the truth — that she sought pitifully to bring his features to mind, that she could not remember the tone of his voice, and that hours went by in which she never even gave him a thought.

She thought more often of another, of whom she had no right to think at all. One evening, Count Benkheim made his appearance, just as she was struggling desperately with a letter to Alfred. He hoped that he was not disturbing her. She, relieved for the moment of the labour of writing, came forward in a more friendly manner than usual. He, misunderstanding this amiability, drew nearer and spoke to her in a manner which he had not dared to employ before.

Without circumlocution, as though some previous conversation had given him license to assume this attitude, he began:

"Well, what does the little Fraulein think of a trip round the world? After all, we need not go to India or Africa."

He took her hands and spoke of a delightful spot, situated on an Italian lake, where he had sojourned many years ago. It was such a beautiful little villa, surrounded by a glorious park! Marble steps led directly to the lake. As late as November, the weather was warm enough for bathing. In the next villa, he continued, there lived three young ladies. At noon, all three used to step from their terrace into the water, first dropping their cloaks, under which they wore absolutely nothing. Yes, they swam in the lake, entirely naked.

He drew still closer to Theresa, and became so importunate that she was seized with fear and disgust. In her efforts to elude his too robust tenderness, she sprang up, striking the table with such violence that the lamp upon it vacillated perilously.

The door opened, and there, in the flood of light that crossed the threshold, stood her mother, as though she had just returned home. Her hat was set at an angle on her unkempt hair, and she was covered by an old-fashioned black mantilla with a beaded fringe.

She greeted the Count, begging him to remain seated, and took no notice of her daughter's confusion nor of the sounds which the swaying table had made only a moment before.

A banal conversation ensued, and when the Count addressed a question directly to Theresa, nothing remained but to make a harmless reply, which she did without much effort.

When the Count took his leave, he had every reason to believe himself forgiven. He could not know that he had only strengthened Theresa in her determination instantly to complete her plans for departure.

In answer to advertisements in the newspapers, she wrote to Graz, Klagenfurt, Brunn, and Vienna, requesting in her letters that the replies be sent poste restante. She received none, however, except from several employment bureaus at Vienna and Graz, and each of these demanded a deposit.

She was considering the advisability of leaving at once and trusting to luck for the rest when, to her own astonishment, the situation at home suddenly became much more comfortable. Her mother behaved quite amiably. The household seemed to lack nothing for its complete comfort. And from Count Benkheim, she received a note of apology, written in a pleasantly humorous, almost touching style. At his next visit, the Count's behaviour was quite perfect, as though he were a guest in the house of a refined family of his social equals.

Nevertheless, Theresa answered a few more advertisements of people who desired either a nurse or a governess. But on the whole, she was no longer as eager to make her escape as she had been before.

What it really was that held her in Salzburg, she would not admit even to herself.

XVII

ONE RAINY EVENING, as Theresa was standing at the entrance of the post office, reading a reply to one of her letters, she heard some one say:

"Good evening, Fraulein."

She recognized the voice at once. A delicious little shiver raced through her body, and although she did not utter a syllable, her entire being seemed to exclaim: At last! She turned slowly and, with a smile, greeted the Lieutenant as though she had long awaited him. Somewhat later, she realized that it might have been better if she had not smiled so happily.

"Well, here I am," said the Lieutenant, grasping Theresa's hand and kissing it repeatedly. "I am in town one hour, and the first earthly creature I meet is Fraulein Theresa! Well, if that isn't fate!..."

He continued to hold her hand tightly in his own.

"Are the manoeuvres over so soon?" asked Theresa. "That surely was quick work!"

"I was gone an eternity," said the Lieutenant. "Is it possible that you didn't notice it? Twenty-one days and twenty-one nights — every night full of dreams of you. Yes, and the days, too. Shall I tell you something?"

"I am not curious."

"But I am — quite! and for that reason, I should like to know what may be in that letter which has to be taken from the post office so secretly!"

She was still holding the letter in her hands, but now she crushed it and hid it in the pocket of her raincoat, meanwhile looking amiably at the Lieutenant.

"This does not seem to be quite the place for a chat," said the officer. "Will not Fraulein Theresa take pity on a poor, dripping Lieutenant, and share her shelter with him?"

Without further ado, he took her umbrella and held it over them both. He slipped his arm under hers and, as they walked out into the pouring rain, he began to recount his experiences — of camping out in the open three thousand metres above sea-level, of a storm on a Dolomite peak, of capturing an enemy patrol — it goes without saying that he was invariably victorious.

Meanwhile, they continued on their promenade through the empty, ill-lit streets, until they reached a narrow street and came to a pause before an old house. There the Lieutenant suggested, quite casually, that she come in with him and have a cup of tea with rum. He was concerned lest the dampness make her ill.

Theresa returned to earth suddenly. For what did he take her? Was he stark mad? And as he placed his arm about her, as though to draw her with him, she glanced sharply at him, to determine, once and for all, whether he were making sport of her.

He released her and assured her that he was well aware — in fact, had immediately observed — that she was a creature quite apart from ordinary considerations, and unlike the other women whom he had known. Since first meeting her, he had not thought of another woman, much less looked at one. And, though the gesture might put him in danger of appearing ridiculous, he would stand here before his door, every evening, at seven o'clock sharp. Yes, he would wait here until at last she came, if he had to stand there every evening for ten years. He swore it on his honour, by all that he held sacred. And whenever he might chance to pass her on the street, he would greet her politely, but never presume to address her until she herself gave him permission. He would stand right here by the door. In any case, she must remember the house number — seventy-seven. Every evening, at seven! He had nothing else to do. His comrades — well, they were good enough fellows, but who the devil cared about them? He had no women friends — had not had any for a long time, he added, as he caught Theresa's doubting smile. If she was not there promptly at seven, he would simply remain in his room on the second floor. He lived alone. His landlady was an old woman, and quite deaf. He would sit in his cozy room, drink his tea, eat buttered rolls, smoke cigarettes and — hope for the next evening.

"Well, go on hoping, then, until Judgment Day," Theresa cried, as she turned and rushed away, without even extending her hand.

The next evening, at exactly seven, she slipped by his door. There he stood, smoking a cigarette, cap in hand, just as he had been that first time she met him. The yellow lapels of his uniform shone brightly, as though in all this world there was no lovelier colour. His eyes, his entire face, lit up.

Did he whisper her name? She hardly knew. At all events, she nodded smilingly and walked up to him in the doorway. Nestled closely in his arm, they mounted the stone stairs until they reached a dark brown wooden door that was slightly ajar. It closed mysteriously and silently after they had entered.

XVIII

THEY KEPT THEIR happiness secret. No one knew that, every evening, Theresa crept up the dimly lit stairs to the Lieutenant's apartment. No one saw her as a few hours later, she slipped out of the house. And had any one seen her, he never would have recognized Theresa in that heavily veiled figure.

Frau Fabiani had been commissioned by a famous illustrated periodical in Germany to write a novel. She imparted the news to Theresa with a great display of pride and conceit. Thenceforward, she remained behind locked doors, writing incessantly all through the day and half through the night. The household duties devolved entirely on Theresa. Though again reduced to very moderate circumstances, at this period mother and daughter laid less stress than ever on material comforts.

Meanwhile, Alfred's letters came daily. They were overflowing with tenderness and passion. For that matter, Theresa replied with more tenderness and passion than she had ever been capable of summoning before. She was not conscious of her falsehood, for she loved Alfred no less than before — nay, it sometimes seemed to her that she loved him more than when he had been very close to her. The letters that passed between them, and the sentiments that they expressed, had nothing whatever to do with the experiences that Theresa was undergoing at the same time. She was conscious of no feeling of guilt toward either of her lovers.

Theresa by no means allowed her days to pass idly. She had not forgotten her plans for the future. She pursued her French and English studies, and practiced at the piano regularly.

Max often presented her with theatre tickets. Usually, she would go with her mother, who did not trouble herself to inquire as to how she came by the tickets. On those evenings, Max generally sat in one of the first rows. True to his promise, he pretended not to notice Theresa and her mother, who had seats further back. Occasionally, he smiled through half-closed lids, and she knew that this smile signified a remembrance of the preceding night, or a fond hope for the ensuing evening.

While, for Theresa, these visits to the theatre were a welcome distraction, for her mother, they were a source of constant excitement. She saw, in the dramas, reflections of her own experience or the experience of those about her. She discovered allusions that the author, completely unknown to her or perhaps dead, had permitted to creep into his work, or which the local management had caused to be inserted out of consideration for the famous woman novelist. At such moments, she glanced meaningfully at Theresa, who never seemed aware of these strange occurrences.

Count Benkheim had ceased to visit the Fabiani household. Theresa hardly noticed it. She was reminded of him again only when she chanced to notice him sitting in a box with a lady whom she had seen in a French farce a few days before. She remembered that she had not been attracted to her by any exceptional ability as an actress, but by the extravagance of her gowns.

XIX

ONE EVENING, SOON after she had come into Max's apartment and was still occupied in removing her veil, there was a knock at the door. To her astonishment, Max, without surprise or question, called out: "Come in!" A tall, blond young man entered, accompanied by a young lady. Theresa remembered her as an actress in an operetta which she had recently seen.

"Oh, what a surprise!" exclaimed Max.

Theresa was not for a moment deceived. It was quite apparent that this surprise had been carefully planned.

The newcomer — likewise a Lieutenant — proved himself a very amiable and polite entertainer. The actress, contrary to Theresa's expectations, was reticent, and spoke only in monosyllables. She had evidently been cautioned on Theresa's account. She addressed her escort as "Herr Oberleutnant," using the more formal "Sie." Besides, she found occasion to mention the fact that her elder sister was married to a lawyer, and that her mother, the widow of a high official, intended moving from Vienna to Salzburg around Christmas time.

The conversation was then directed toward the theatre. When the company's various opinions and criticisms of histrionic art were exhausted, the general trend of the talk turned toward the love affairs of the directors, and especially that of one Count Benkheim with a very worldly lady.

The evening was brought to a close with a bottle of wine in a neighbouring restaurant. Here the conversation developed in a somewhat more entertaining, but, to Theresa, still unexciting fashion.

A few officers, seated at another table, greeted their comrades politely, and thereafter took no further notice of them.

Theresa excused herself at a rather early hour, but insisted that Max should remain with the others. She walked homeward, oppressed by sadness and feeling slightly ashamed at this turn of affairs.

The next meeting in Max's apartment was somewhat more lively. He had prepared cold cuts, cake, and wine.

It did not surprise Theresa to observe that Max and the actress were on more intimate terms than they had wished to betray. Although the latter still maintained a certain reserve, she spoke again of her mother, who would not be able to come at Christmas, but would fetch her daughter on Palm Sunday.

Later, in a coffee house, the comedian of the theatre, who was sitting on the other side of the room, winked humorously and called over to her: "Servus, Sintscherl." She thanked him curtly, and remarked: "The impudent thing! What does he imagine, anyway?"

Once, during an undisturbed hour, Theresa begged Max to refrain from arranging these "foursomes," as she really felt more at ease when alone with him.

He smiled, as though flattered; then, suddenly, he turned on her and chided her rather severely for her snobbishness. She cried a little, and the evening was sad and tiresome. At heart, Theresa was really happy when, a few days later, Max's friend and his fair companion again knocked at the door. And during their subsequent gatherings in the restaurants, and even in larger parties, Theresa was, if not the happiest, at least the gayest of the company.

XX

THE WINTER, THOUGH it came late, was ushered in with heavy snowstorms. The entire city was hidden beneath a soft, white mantle. The sudden thought of Alfred's possible coming disturbed the peaceful calm of Theresa's existence.

The snowfall ceased. Beautiful, sunny, wintry days followed. Theresa and Max went on sleighing parties in Berchtesgaden and Kônigsee. At first, they went alone; later, they were joined by officers and friends, almost all of whom were attached to the theatre. At the inns, Max frequently permitted his friends to exceed the bounds of good taste, and to take liberties with Theresa. He showed no displeasure or jealousy. Theresa spent Christmas Eve and night with Max at one of the hotels. As she was returning home, she could not overcome a slight anxiety as to her mother's attitude regarding her absence. The latter met her with a special delivery letter. Frau Fabiani said not a word. She merely looked at her daughter reproachfully.

Theresa felt a strange guilt when she observed, by the date on the envelope, that the letter had arrived the day before. She recognized Alfred's handwriting and, without opening the letter, was aware of its contents. The element of surprise was therefore lacking as she read.

Alfred wrote that he was deeply ashamed of having wasted his affections on her, and that he hoped sincerely that she would be happy with the Lieutenant. He had unfortunately, been unable to awaken in her such delightful sentiments.

The quiet tone in which the letter was written at first shamed Theresa. After a short period of contrition, she sighed with relief. She need no longer place any restrictions upon herself. From that time on, she was seen everywhere with her lover, even at the theatre. She also permitted — and this was a thing to which formerly she had emphatically objected — the offering of small gifts. Among others, there was a medallion and chain which she wore constantly about her neck, a half-dozen handkerchiefs, and a pair of mules, made of red leather and trimmed with swan's-down; the exact duplicate of a pair which the Lieutenant's actress friend had recently worn in a play.

It was shortly after the beginning of the New Year that Theresa met Clara in front of the Lieutenant's house. Her friend was just returning from a sleighing trip. Almost immediately, Clara began to berate Theresa — not on account of her manner of existence, but because of her indiscretion.

"Surely, it doesn't do you any good to have everybody talking about you," she said. "Now, take me, for instance. I am having my fourth affair, and no one has the slightest suspicion of it! Were you to spread the story, no one would believe you." Laughingly, she promised to visit Theresa soon and tell her all about her adventures. She confessed that she herself felt a veritable craving to do so.

Theresa watched her friend depart with somewhat mixed emotions. Uppermost in her mind was the desire to be alone. Confidences always seemed to induce this reaction in her.

Alfred's letter, though apparently a farewell note, was not the last. He maintained a complete silence for several weeks; then, suddenly, he began to send letters in an entirely different vein. They were filled with reproaches. He used words which brought blushes to Theresa's cheeks. She had never dreamed that a person like Alfred could ever bring himself to put such words on paper.

She was determined to burn unread any other letters which might come. Yet, when a few days passed without mail from him, she was seized with a strange unrest that was not quieted until a letter had arrived, although she herself had offered him no response. After a dozen such, Alfred's letters abruptly ceased. In one of the rare missives from her brother, he mentioned having met Alfred in the city. He had found him looking very well, in good spirits, and elegantly clothed. On this last remark he laid especial stress.

Thereafter, Alfred's angry letters seemed like so many ridiculous lies to Theresa. She threw a number of them in the stove and watched them as they were slowly reduced to ashes.

Some time elapsed before Clara redeemed her promise. She entered Theresa's room one day, late in February. The snow was beginning to melt and the first spring breezes were wafted in through the open window.

Instead of relating the chronicle of her adventures, as she had promised to do, she imparted the news of her engagement to an engineer. All that talk of a few weeks ago had been utter nonsense, she explained. She had been moved to it by exasperation over her fiancé's reticence. She felt that she could count on Theresa never to breathe a word to a soul of what she had said. Then she expatiated on her sweetheart and the prospect of her future peace and happiness in the little mountain village where her husband-to-be was directing the construction of a railroad.

She remained less than a quarter of an hour, embraced Theresa rather brusquely, and neglected to invite her to the wedding.

XXI

ON THESE DECEPTIVE early spring days, Theresa felt depressed, although not actually pained, at realizing that her affection for Max was spending itself. Day by day, she became increasingly aware of the utter emptiness and hopelessness of her existence.

It had been months since she had last visited the asylum where her father was confined. She now unwillingly placed the blame for this neglect upon a chance remark made by the assistant physician, that "her father did not derive any benefit from these visits, and that she herself merely carried away painful impressions that would torment her for the rest of her life."

But, one day, a letter from the institution arrived. As frequently occurs in such maladies, the old Lieutenant was surprisingly improved, and had expressed a desire to see his daughter. Theresa discovered in these words more significance than they were really intended to convey. She was already prepared to hear her father's voice uplifted in advice and comforting sympathy.

And so she wandered, one dreary day, down the main road toward the asylum. The snow was melting, and had filled the road with dirty little pools. Theresa was depressed. As she entered the little cell-like compartment, she saw her father sitting at a table covered with books and maps, just as he had loved to sit in former days. He looked up, and his eyes seemed filled with intelligence and the joy of living. But as soon as he perceived her presence (it was never clear to her whether he had recognized her or not) his features became distorted and his fingers contracted over a book as though he were about to hurl it at her. The attendant seized his hands. At the same moment, the doctor entered and took in the situation at a glance.

"This is your daughter," he said. "You wanted to see her. Now that she is here, you probably have something to say to her. — Calm yourself!" he added, as he noticed with what difficulty the attendant was restraining the raving man.

The old Lieutenant, freeing his right hand, pointed commandingly to the door. As Theresa made no move to obey his gesture, his eyes so forbiddingly darkened with rage that the doctor himself grasped her and almost thrust her from the room. The door was locked immediately afterwards.

"Strange," said the doctor, as they stood in the corridor. "Even we physicians are frequently deceived. When I spoke to him this morning of your intended visit, he seemed overjoyed. He should not have been given the maps and books."

As she hesitated at the door, he pressed her hand with a warmth that was not customary with him, and remarked:

"Perhaps the Fraulein will try again in a few days. I will speak to him, and personally see to it that the dangerous books are removed. Reading seems to induce all sorts of memories. Just drop me a line, Fraulein, to let me know when you are coming, and I will wait for you at the door."

He looked at her strangely, and pressed her hand still more firmly. She was convinced that it was not the visit to her father that most interested him. She nodded. But she knew that this was her last visit.

She returned slowly to the city.

"He knows everything," she told herself. "That is why he ordered me out. What is to become of me now?"

Suddenly, like a ray of light, the idea came to her that when Max received his discharge he might enter his uncle's factory, of which he had recently spoken. Then he could marry her. Yes, he must do so! One of his comrades had but shortly before left the service to marry a woman of questionable character, whereas she had been “a respectable, decent girl,” before Max had seduced her. At this phrase, she for the first time became conscious of what had transpired. Was she not the daughter of an officer? Though in poor circumstances, she belonged to a good family. Her mother had noble blood in her veins. Max owed it to her to make her his wife!

At their next meeting, without awaiting the right moment, she ventured on little innuendos. Either he would not or did not understand. She laughed and kissed away his ill-humour. When, later, she made her demands more clear, they provoked a quarrel. Though she had no real tenderness for him, she was still in love; and, accordingly, she abandoned her attempts as suddenly as she had begun them, allowing matters to go on as usual.

XXII

SPRING WAS COMING. The theatrical season was at an end.

Max was often detained and unable to receive Theresa. He even occasionally spent a day or two out of town. These circumstances would never have struck Theresa as unusual, were it not for the fact that, one evening in a restaurant, the name of a very popular actress was mentioned, and she intercepted a knowing wink directed towards Max by one of his comrades. Max seemed annoyed at this betrayal.

Theresa became suspicious and, at their next visit to the theatre, it did not escape her notice that the young lady in question, while taking her bow, glanced and nodded to Max, who was sitting in the first row. Under one pretext or another, Theresa allowed her mother to go home alone, while she waited for the Lieutenant. He was very much upset at this, and declined her offer to go with him to his apartment. He had made other arrangements for the night; he had promised to meet some friends.

His anger, however, suddenly evaporated, and in the next moment he became very pleasant, asked if he might escort her home, took her arm, and actually led her to her door. He cursed his inopportune promise, and simulated annoyance at his deprivation so well that Theresa's fears were allayed.

As Theresa opened the door to her room, to her amazement she beheld her mother, kneeling before Theresa's own dresser and rummaging through the lower drawer. Theresa's entrance frightened her mother, who stammered:

"I only wanted to set your things in order. You never seem to have the time!"

"You are setting my things in order, in the middle of the night! You don't say so!"

"Now, don't excite yourself so, child. I really meant no harm!" Still confused, she added: "Look for yourself, and you will see that nothing is missing."

She left, and Theresa immediately knelt before the open drawer. After Theresa had burned the majority of Alfred's letters, she had received several more at various times. These were in similar vein, yet a little more sentimental, like the gradual vanishing of a storm on the horizon. Several were missing, and some of the hastily scribbled notes that Max had occasionally written to her were not there.

What could her mother want with them? Did she have ideas of practicing extortion? Was it merely curiosity? Or did she feel the need of warming her aged heart with the love adventures of others?

She knew, in any case, that she could not longer live under the same roof with her mother. Why, she wondered, had she so quickly abandoned her plans of persuading Max to marry her? She decided to pursue this matter to a conclusion upon the following day. This decision, which must necessarily conduce to a clearer understanding between them, calmed her so much that she sank into a deep sleep. The rest so strengthened her that, the next day, she could appear amiable toward her mother and avoid all allusion to the happenings of the preceding night.

It may have been the beautiful March day that held the suggestion of spring within it, or the fact that the morrow was Palm Sunday and that the whole theatrical company would disband the day following; whatever the reason, she actually looked forward with pleasant expectation to her appointment with Max.

Max had not yet come home when, at an early hour, she entered his room. A strange thought flitted through her mind, as though induced by the occurrence of the night before: she thought of examining her lover's bureau drawers. To ward off temptation, she picked up a book lying on the table. Max was accustomed to reading whatever chanced to fall into his hands: novels, occasionally plays, invariably in well-worn copies, since they had already passed through many hands before they came to his. She glanced through this and that book, without paying particular attention to the contents. As she carelessly pushed one aside, she found the typewritten manuscript of the new play which she had witnessed only a few days before. It seemed almost as though it had been purposely hidden there. She turned the pages of the copy, and noticed that the name "Beate" was underlined throughout with a red pencil. Beate? Was that not the name of the heroine in the play? The part was played by the woman whom she suspected of intimate relations with Max! Beate — why, of course! The connection was clear.

After this discovery, she felt justified in making a further search. This she did, with such complete disregard of consequences that, when Max entered, he found her before his bureau drawers. The letters, veils, and suspicious underthings of lace which she had strewn about her on the floor, spared him the trouble of lying.

He rushed at her. She freed herself, screaming: "Cad!" Without awaiting a reply, any excuses, or attempted justifications, she rushed to the door.

He caught her by the shoulders.

"What a child you are!" he said.

She stared at him, wide-eyed.

"She isn't here any more!"

She continued to stare dazedly at him, and he added:

"Upon my word of honour!"

At last she understood, laughed harshly, and left. He hurried after her, and, on the dark stairs, grasped her by the arm.

"Be so good as to let me go!" she demanded, through tightly clenched teeth.

"I shall do nothing of the kind!" he replied. "You are a little fool. Now, listen to me. I couldn't help it. She ran after me. You can ask her, if you wish. I am certainly glad she is gone. I had every intention of telling you the whole story today — honestly!"

He held her close to him. She was weeping. Again and again, he repeated: "Child!" With one arm, he still held her fast, while with the other, he caressed her hair, cheeks, and arms.

"Anyway," he said, "you forgot your hat upstairs. For heaven's sake, calm yourself! Let me explain! Then you will still be at liberty to do whatever you choose."

She followed him to his room. He drew her upon his knee, and swore that she was the only one he had ever loved, and that "such a thing" should never happen again.

She did not believe a word he said. Yet, she remained. The instant she came home, she locked herself in her room.

Tired and disgusted, she packed her belongings, left a frigid little note for her mother, and boarded the noon train for Vienna.

XXIII

THERESA'S FIRST NIGHT in Vienna was spent in a very mediocre hotel near the railway station. The next morning, according to the schedule which she had planned for herself, she made her way through the town.

The day was warm and spring-like. Violets were being sold on the streets. Though women were wearing their new spring clothes, Theresa felt quite at ease in her simple and becoming winter costume. She was happy to have left Salzburg — to be alone at last.

She made a list of the names and addresses of those who required nursemaids or governesses, and wandered about the entire day, with only a pause for lunch at noon. Some found her too young; others would not consider her without recommendations; again, she did not feel sympathetically inclined towards those who might have engaged her. As evening was coming on and she was thoroughly exhausted, she decided to accept a position in a family with two children aged respectively three and seven years. In comparison with what she was to experience in this house, her life at home, even at its worst, was glorious.

The family was in poor circumstances. The children were always hungry, and brought noise, but no happiness, into the little circle. The parents were mean and discouraged.

Theresa had to supplement the meagre meals they gave her out of her own money. Soon, her little earnings were exhausted, and after a few weeks, unable to tolerate her employers any longer, she left. In her next position, as governess to a widow's two children, she was treated as a servant. A third engagement displeased her because of the uncleanliness which she found in the house. In still another place, the importunities of the male member of the household soon drove her away.

She changed her position many more times, not without a feeling that she herself was partly to blame for her misfortunes. She was impatient and haughty, and totally indifferent to the children entrusted to her care.

These were indeed bad times. Theresa had not a moment for introspection, though occasionally, when lying in her narrow bed against a cold wall, or awakened by the crying of one of her charges, or disturbed by the morning noises of servants, or possibly when she was in the park with the children and thus had an unexpected moment of leisure, then the utter poverty and dreariness of her situation would overcome her with sudden poignancy.

She was usually too weary to take advantage of the few free afternoons allotted to her. Once, she took a walk with a nursemaid of the neighbourhood. This person told of the innumerable and successfully evaded attempts made upon her by the fathers and sons of the families in which she had worked.

On this particular Sunday afternoon in the Prater, this nurse permitted the most offensive kind of addresses from all sorts of young men, and her answers were quite as unrestrained. Theresa was overcome with disgust. She managed to slip away unobserved, and returned home alone.

XXIV

DURING THIS TIME, news from Salzburg was very scant. Theresa's sudden departure had made it impossible for her to leave an address, and the first answer she received to her letters, after months of waiting, was as hastily written as her own parting note had been. In the beginning of her letter, Frau Fabiani's tone was that of a person who had been slighted, but toward the end, it changed completely, as if mother and daughter had parted on the most friendly terms.

In spite of the fact that Theresa's letters were written discreetly and with utmost reticence, a sympathetic soul would have been able to read her misery between the lines. Her mother seemed to notice nothing of the kind, and even went so far as to write her of her pleasure in Theresa's happiness — though that, which might otherwise have been construed as sarcasm, was in reality nothing more than lack of understanding. Often names were mentioned in these letters that were unknown or wholly uninteresting to Theresa. Of Theresa's father, Frau Fabiani only said that his condition was unimproved; of her brother, not a word, until one day came a card in which she reproached Theresa for her neglect, and expressed the wish that she should look up her brother. It was weeks since Frau Fabiani had heard from him, and she had waited for him in vain during the vacation period.

The address in her hands, Theresa visited her brother late one summer afternoon. She found him in a poor but neatly kept room, the window of which offered no better view than a bare wall with great cracks in it, through which one caught a glimpse of neighbouring fire-escapes.

Karl took it for granted that Theresa had arrived in Vienna a very short time ago, and thought it very wise that she had chosen to become independent. He expressed pity over his father's unimproved condition, which might continue for years. He never even mentioned his mother. He told her further that he was teaching the two sons of a clinical professor four times a week, and was receiving a substantial remuneration. This might, at some future date, prove advantageous to him.

He spoke heatedly of the injustices perpetrated by the University, such as the favoritism shown toward professors' sons by the scholarship committees. He was particularly incensed against the Jews, who were absolutely over-running the University, making life there unbearable.

After a little while, he excused himself, saying that he had an appointment in a coffee-house, where a few of his companions of similar tastes held their club meetings; he, being the secretary, would naturally have to be present.

He escorted Theresa down the stairs and left her with a hasty and casual farewell.

"Let me hear from you soon again," was all he said.

She looked after him as he walked quickly away. His clothes were neat, though carelessly worn; he seemed to have grown older; in fact, his appearance had altered so much that she felt a complete stranger to him.

Theresa had expected more of this visit. She made her way homeward, more dejected and lonely than she had ever been before.

XXV

FOR SOME WEEKS now, Theresa had had charge of the five-year-old son of a travelling man. She rarely saw the father, who was a soured, embittered little man, while his wife treated Theresa with a casual friendliness. The boy, a pretty, blond child, soon endeared himself to her. She hoped sincerely that she might find a certain degree of permanency in this house.

Arriving home, one Sunday evening, a little earlier than usual, she found her charge already in bed. From a neighbouring room came whispered voices. After a while, the mistress stepped out of the room, clad only in a dressing gown. She was confused and irritated. She requested Theresa to buy some cold cuts at a nearby store. When Theresa returned, the mistress, carefully dressed, was seated on the baby's bed, showing the child a picture book. She addressed Theresa gaily, appeared quite at ease, and talked about many matters pertaining to the household. The next day, she seized some trifling pretext to discharge her.

Again Theresa was homeless. For the first time, she thought of returning to Salzburg; but alas! she did not have enough money for the fare. She betook herself, as she always did in the interims between positions, to the suburban home of the widow Kausick. Here she slept in a dingy little room with Frau Kausick and her two children. The house reeked of petroleum and rancid fat. At three o'clock in the morning, the noises in the courtyard, of creaking wagon wheels, neighing horses, and loud, raucous male voices would awaken her out of her sleep. She thought of the hours of quiet, gradual awakening that she had been accustomed to at home, and was seized with panic at the depths of her descent. For the first time, she weighed the possibilities of taking advantage of her youth and beauty, as so many others were doing, and selling her body.

The other possibility, of being loved and happy again, had not entered her mind since her first great disappointment. The advances, within the last few months, of employers, clerks, and the like, had not been sufficiently alluring to betray her into another adventure.

And so her poor, tired, and disappointed soul hoped to find in prostitution the cleanest and most decent form of love. She decided to give herself another week. If, within that time, she still had no position, then nothing would be left — or so it seemed to her, in this dreary morning hour — but to walk the streets.

XXVI

THE WIDOW KAUSICK earned her meagre livelihood as a servant. Though often ill-humoured, she was withal a good-hearted person. She was wont to arise at five o'clock in the morning. A little later, the children began to disturb the dreary unrest which ushered in the day in this poor household. Then Theresa was forced out of bed.

She drank her coffee out of a cracked white cup. After breakfast, she escorted Frau Kausick's children, a boy of nine and a girl of eight, to school. The children were very much attached to Theresa.

An hour's walk through Stadtpark, blooming with early summer flowers, seemed somewhat to lift her spirits.

She entered an employment bureau, where she was treated with little friendliness, in consequence of her inability to remain in one position for any length of time. Despite this, she was given several addresses.

The first attempts were unsuccessful.

About midday, when her hopes were at low ebb, she mounted the stairs of a beautiful apartment house in the Ringstrasse, where a governess was needed for two girls, one thirteen and the other eleven years old.

The lady of the house, a pretty woman, although somewhat too heavily rouged, was about to leave the house, and therefore was at first inclined to be a little impatient at this delay. Nevertheless, she permitted Theresa to enter, and demanded her references. Theresa, following a sudden impulse, replied that she had none to offer, since this was the first time she had applied for employment.

The lady was a little hesitant, but, after talking to her for a short time, she found her appealing, and was particularly impressed by the fact that Theresa's father was an officer. Finally, she decided that it would be better if Theresa could come again on the morrow, when the girls were home from school. In the corridor, Theresa read the following sign, inscribed in gold lettering on a black background: "Dr. Gustav Eppich, Attorney at Law. Criminal Cases."

The next day, at one o'clock, Theresa entered the salon, where she found the lady of the house, in the company of her daughters. The friendly manner in which the two well-bred children greeted her led Theresa to suppose that their mother had influenced them favourably in her behalf. Soon afterwards, the head of the family came in. He remarked, in a lightly reproachful tone, that his wife's summons had obliged him to leave his office earlier than was his habit. He, too, seemed impressed with Theresa, especially since she came of an officer's family. This circumstance had not failed to have its effect upon both the heads of the house.

In answer to a question, Theresa replied that her father had died a few years before, through grief at having been pensioned off prematurely. Over the features of the entire Eppich family there played an expression of sympathy. Although the salary offered was less than she had expected, Theresa could hardly restrain her joy when informed that she was to report for duty on the following day.

At Frau Kausick's house she found a letter from her mother, informing her of her father's death. She had to repress a little shiver, almost a sentiment of guilt, before she became conscious of her grief.

Following the impulses of her sorrow, she made her way to her brother's house. He had not yet heard of their loss, and, when told, did not take it much to heart. He paced the room in silence, then stood still in front of Theresa, who was seated on the bed, since both chairs were littered with books. Suddenly he bent forward and kissed her on the brow, as though he were fulfilling a duty.

"Did you hear anything else from home?" he asked.

Theresa told him the little she knew; among other things, that their mother had sold all the furniture, and was now living in a furnished room.

“Sold the furniture!” exclaimed Karl, with a wry smile. “She might have consulted us first.”

Then, seeing the look of amazement in Theresa’s face, he added:

“After all, we are part owners, and justly entitled to our share!”

“Quite right,” said Theresa. “She mentioned something about that in her letter. We are to receive a certain percentage in a short time.”

“A certain... hmm! I shall have to look into this matter more carefully!”

He began to pace up and down again and, with a quick glance at Theresa remarked:

“Poor father gave up at last!”

Theresa did not know what to reply to this. Feeling very much more ill at ease than she was willing to admit to herself, she took leave of her brother, without telling him of her new position. Karl made no move to restrain her.

On her way home, she entered a church and spent some time there without praying, thinking piously of the departed one. He appeared in her mind’s eye as he was when she was a child, when she had loved him dearly. She recalled the boisterous gaiety with which he used to step into the room, lift her from the floor where she had been playing, press her close to him, and fondle her. To this image was added the image of her mother as she was then — bright, young, almost beaming. This was mere illusion, for, in reality, she had never seen her thus.

Again she felt a shudder pass through her. How could two people change so completely within such a short time?

It seemed to her as if they were both dead and long since buried, and that there was absolutely nothing in common between the late insane Lieutenant and the mean, weirdly aging authoress in Salzburg.

XXVII

THE NEXT DAY, Theresa took up her new duties. At their first dinner together, they made a polite effort to help Theresa to overcome her confusion. The son of the house was also present. His name was George. They pronounced it in the French manner. He was enrolled in the University as a law student.

A schedule for Theresa was arranged. Both girls attended school and were escorted there and back by Theresa. She helped them with their home-work. Frau Eppich was particularly anxious that the girls should take their daily walk. The attitude of both parents continued to be friendly, though Theresa could not long remain in ignorance of the complete indifference with which they regarded her.

They made it easy for her to join in the conversation at table. Often political subjects were discussed. Dr. Eppich held very liberal ideas, which no one but his son dared oppose. George accused his father of being entirely too idealistic. Dr. Eppich heard this with evident pleasure; in fact, he was obviously flattered by the rebuke.

As for Frau Eppich, there were days in which she showed not the slightest interest in her daughters or in any household matters. Then, without warning, she would appear at an unexpected moment and give scrupulous orders for the most insignificant details.

George found many more excuses to take him to his sisters' room than was absolutely necessary. His glances, at times shy, then again bold, betrayed to Theresa his desire to be near her. Perhaps he had hopes, but Theresa was very cold and reticent, and pretended to notice nothing.

The elder of the two girls was inclined to attach herself to Theresa. Sometimes she almost yielded to an impulse to confide in her; but whenever this occurred, she purposely became more reserved and distant during the following days. The younger one was of an even-tempered, still very childish disposition. Both daughters clung affectionately to their mother, although Theresa noticed that the latter was abstracted and often impatient in her responses.

Theresa had very little leisure. True, she had every alternate Sunday free, but she scarcely knew how to take advantage of these hours of liberty. She walked much, without deriving any pleasure from that recreation, and visited the theatre on exceedingly infrequent occasions.

Theresa had no complaints to make toward the family, as far as their behaviour to herself was concerned, though she was aware of a growing unrest, almost a feeling of uncertainty, which she could not account for, except by the strange change in the Eppich family's attitude and spirit toward each other. Unwittingly, she seemed drawn into this inexplicable conflict.

There was not a soul in whom she could — or, for that matter, wished to — confide. Only a French governess who did not strike Theresa as being so very young, though she was not yet thirty, was somewhat more sympathetic to her. Theresa had seized the opportunity of her acquaintance with this woman to practice French conversation.

Sylvia was amusing. She told Theresa little stories of her past — she was not altogether discreet — and tried to encourage Theresa to similar confidences. Being of a very reticent nature, Theresa related no more than she would have told an utter stranger, though it was clearly apparent all the while that Sylvia was not in the least convinced of her innocence.

Theresa wondered at times how it was possible that her heart — indeed, her very senses — scarcely remembered the delight she had experienced in the Lieutenant's arms. She no longer suffered over his betrayal. Yet she was certain that she could never again repose her trust in a man, and she was glad of it. She flattered herself that she enjoyed a good reputation; and Frau Eppich, whenever the occasion arose, boasted to her friends of Theresa's antecedents.

XXVIII

SPRING HAD COME. Early one afternoon, during the Easter holidays, Theresa was at the Stefansplatz, awaiting a governess employed by friends of the Eppich family — a good-hearted, somewhat faded creature, for whom Theresa felt more pity than friendliness. The Fraulein was late. Theresa amused herself by watching the passersby. They all seemed free of worries on this lovely, mild holiday, and all bent toward some happy goal. There was no dearth of lovers. Theresa, without envy, found it ridiculous that instead of a lover, she should be waiting for an old governess with whom she had nothing more in common than a similarity of profession. She was slightly irritated at the prospect of the tiresome afternoon which she would have to spend in her company.

Since it was a half-hour past the appointed time, she decided to proceed alone. Once more, through a feeling of conscientiousness, she looked round on all sides to see if the Fraulein might be coming; then, almost hastily, she left the place and mingled with the stream of walkers. She was glad to be free and alone, happy in the uncertainty of what the next hour would bring forth.

It happened that she was shoved along with the crowd towards the Prater, and soon found herself in the Hauptallee. The earth smelled of the spring, though the trees that lined both sides of the Allee were still in their winter bareness.

The driveway was alive with cabs and carriages. People were returning from the races at Freudeau. Like many others, Theresa stood on the curb for a while. Many glances rested on her, and many men turned to look at her again. One in particular was a young officer who resembled Max, though he appeared to her much more elegant than her seducer. She knew now that she had simply thrown herself away then, and she was determined to be more wise in the future.

She walked along the crowded Allee until she came to the bandstand, where music was played for the general public and not merely for the guests in the overflowing restaurant gardens. Thousands passed by, paused, pressed forward. Theresa was happy. She enjoyed the way the different instruments took up the theme — the quiet start, the sudden swelling of the drums, the tinkling tones of the bells — all this delighted her. The tramp of horses, the whistle of locomotives, the chatter and laughter of the throng — everything seemed to join in this spring festival concert.

Her dark, unpretentious clothes and habitually grave mien were not conducive to advances. Only when she stood for a while near the fence of the restaurant garden did a young man press close to her. She made a repelling gesture with her hand, and he quickly disappeared, before she was even able to discern his features.

As she walked under the still leafless trees, away from the noise and the music, she recalled his touch, which had doubtless been premeditated, with little or no resentment. Quickly, almost like a person in flight, she went on. Gradually the crowds began to disperse, and Theresa decided to rest on the first unoccupied' bench which she could find.

A young man walked past her. His appearance had struck her from afar — a lean, haggard figure, dressed in a ridiculously bright suit, well-pressed, but ill-fitting. Both hands were in his pockets, and he danced along rather than walked. Between two fingers, he dangled a soft brown hat.

He looked at Theresa with a childish, timid glance. Without being too audacious, he nodded and smiled in a friendly manner, so that Theresa, in spite of herself, returned his smile. He took a few steps forward, then suddenly turned, walked toward her, and seated himself beside her. She attempted to rise, but he had already begun to talk, entirely oblivious of her gesture. He spoke of the delightful spring weather, the races which he had just attended, the fall of a jockey, and joked about an ostentatiously dressed couple who chanced to be passing by at that moment. Finally, he asked Theresa if she had noticed the carriage of the Erzherzogin Josef a and that of the Baron Springer go by? Was it not nice to listen to music from a distance? It came to one as though from another world.

Theresa, confused by this sudden flow of words, answered laconically, yet not unamiably. Then she rose and hastily bowed. But he, too, rose, walked beside her, and continued his chatter.

He tried to guess who she might be. A Viennese? No, never! She smiled. Perhaps a German, since she was so educated! Ah, she was an Italian! Yes, most certainly! The dark hair and glowing, ardent eyes! That's it — an Italian!

Almost frightened, she looked up at him. He laughed. Well, of course, her parents — her grandparents, at least — must have come from the south. She herself was a Viennese. That one could guess from her accent even though she talked very little and, at that, "Hochdeutsch." Was she an actress, a singer, a prima donna, or a noblewoman? Surely a noblewoman, condescending to watch at close range the doings of the people. Goodness knows, she might even be a princess or a duchess! A duchess, of course!

He would not be deprived of that idea; he even pretended to be in earnest about it. Everything seemed to point to it. The unpretentious clothing, the bearing, the walk, the glance! He allowed her to precede him a few paces, the better to admire her bearing and walk.

"Your Highness," he said, suddenly, as they were nearing the bandstand, "I would deem it a great honour to invite Your Highness to supper, but, truth to tell — poverty is no shame and wealth no misfortune! — my fortunes are unfortunately low; about a gulden in all. That would not provide a very handsome meal. So Her Highness would have to pay for her own supper!"

She asked him, laughingly, if he were quite insane?

"Never less so!" he answered, seriously.

She quickened her steps. It was getting late. She had better be on her way home. Well, surely she would permit him at least to escort her to the court equipage that was waiting for her somewhere nearby. At the Schweitzerhaus or the Preussischen Museum? Or perhaps near the Viaduct?

In the meantime, they had arrived at a little lane. Behind green hedges, in a modest restaurant, some people were enjoying the music that floated from a distant cafe, while regaling themselves with cheese, salami, and beer. And soon, to Theresa's astonishment, she found herself seated with her escort at a rather rickety table covered with a red-flowered cloth. Both ate heartily of whatever the frock-coated, over-heated waiter placed before them.

Theresa's escort talked to him as though he were an old friend, and put all sorts of jesting questions to him.

"Oh, Herr Swoboda, how is your grandfather? Still a fortune-teller? And your daughter? Still the legless wonder?"

Then he surpassed himself in comic excuses for having dared to bring a princess to such an impossible place. Of course, here her incognito was far less likely to be discovered. Afterwards, he called her attention to the various people round them. That man in the dark coat, with his stiff hat brought low over his forehead — surely he was a defrauder, fleeing from justice! He had something to say of each individual — of the two soldiers who drank beer out of the same glasses as their sweethearts; the man with the protruding eyes, with his fat wife and four children; and the ancient, smooth-shaven gentleman who sat under the lantern and talked to himself. At last, with well simulated fright, he discovered, in a remote corner of the garden, a man wearing a black suit and high hat, who he insisted was a private detective, come to watch over the princess.

These trivialities were not in the least droll, and Theresa was fully aware of this. But after all these depressing months of conventional respectability in which no one had ever uttered a harmless joke in her presence, a tremendous yearning for fun and laughter was taking possession of Theresa. Sitting beside this man whom she had known for less than an hour, she felt free and happy. Her excitement heightened by two glasses of wine, she relinquished the restraint in which she had thus far held herself, and laughed merrily.

In her mind, she was trying to determine what manner of man her escort might be; whether a painter, or perhaps an actor. Well, what matter, after all? He was young and unrepressed. Surely, it was jollier today than when she had accompanied Alfred to the elegant Hotelgarten!

He had been in the Tyrol, in Italy, in Spain, and in Malta. Had she not yet guessed that he was a peddler, who travelled through the world with a pack on his back? He had arrived only yesterday, and was ready to start again tomorrow. But, of course, if he might hope to see Her Highness again, he would willingly sacrifice a few days — and nights, even, he added, casually.

They each paid their own check, then left the garden. The stranger took Theresa's arm and would not release it. The festivities were gradually drawing to an end. They made their way between booths, shooting galleries, restaurants, and games of chance, toward the exit. A barker who spoke in the Bohemian dialect tried to inveigle them to patronize the magic cabinet, promising them many surprises. To the evident enjoyment of the crowd, Theresa's escort entered into a conversation with the barker, imitating his dialect to perfection.

This displeased Theresa. She freed her arm, and started to leave; but there he was again beside her. He stood by the wagonstand and pretended to be disconsolate at not finding the court carriage there.

"Now the joke is ended," said Theresa, "and I think it best we bid each other farewell!"

"Well, if the joke is over," he said, with unexpected seriousness, "then it is only proper for me to present myself with due formality — Kasimir Tobisch! — Formerly," he added, ironically, "von Tobisch."

"But," he explained, "there is no sense in insisting upon the title, when one is nothing more than a poor wretch. And now Her Highness might guess what my profession is."

"A painter," she answered, without much thought. He nodded quickly. That was right. He was a painter, and a musician, upon occasion. Would she not visit his studio, some time? As she made no reply, he began talking again of his travels. He had been a musician and a painter, not only in Italy, but also in Paris, Madrid, and England.

He played nearly all instruments, from the flute to the kettle-drums. Ah, what a city, Madrid — mysterious and romantic! But Rome surpassed them all! The catacombs, for instance — a thousand skeletons and deaths' heads deep underground: it was eerie walking round down there. If one got lost in that maze, there was absolutely no hope.

It had happened once to a friend of his, but he was saved.

And the Colosseum — a giant circle, in which a hundred thousand people could be seated. Now it is in ruins, and the moon shines over it. Only at night, of course!

They were nearing the house in which Theresa lived.

She begged him to leave her, and, upon his insistence, gave him her name and address. She also promised to meet him two weeks later, at an appointed hour and place. She noticed that he followed her at a distance and watched her from the corner until she disappeared in the doorway. Suspicion? It might just as well be infatuation.

XXIX

DURING THE NEXT fourteen days, she received three letters from him. The first was formal and gallant; the second, a hit more sprightly. He called Theresa "Princess" and "Your Highness," and inscribed himself Kasimir, the great drummer, flutist, and journeyman. The third letter, however, held a touch of tenderness, and, as though carelessly, he signed his initials, "C. v. T."

They met each other as pre-arranged on the Praterstern. The rain was pouring down. Kasimir came without an umbrella, cloaked in the romantic folds of a travelling coat. He had tickets for the afternoon performance at the Karlstheater. Oh, he hadn't paid for them! He knew the director well, and some of the actors. He met them occasionally in restaurants and at studio parties. Well, one should not take that word, "party," too literally. Still, they had some jolly times together, although things were never as lively as similar gatherings which he had attended in Paris; at least they were not as abandoned. There they held artists' balls at which the models danced entirely nude or, what was even worse, covered with transparent veils.

Thus he entertained her on the way to the theatre. They sat in the second row of the third gallery. The production, an operetta, was neither better nor worse than many others which Theresa had seen in Salzburg. The play was quite amusing, and Kasimir's whispered comments on it made her laugh and blush in turn. When the darkened hall emboldened him to become too familiar, she had forbidden his caresses.

He changed immediately, remaining decent and quiet in his seat until the end of the play. He did not even answer her questions, although that was only another manner of clowning.

It was light and still raining when they stepped out into the street. They entered a nearby coffee house and sat on a window-seat. Theresa gazed absently at the illustrated papers, while Kasimir interested himself in a game of billiards, gave the players advice, and even tried a few strokes without much luck. He blamed this on the faulty cue.

Theresa found it strange that he should pay so little attention to her. When finally he did return it was already time to leave. He helped her into her jacket, threw his own coat about his shoulders, opened and held the umbrella over her, but did not attempt to take her arm.

He was reticent, almost melancholy; and she pitied him. As they passed a well-lit restaurant, his features assumed such a hungry look, that Theresa was almost impelled to invite him to supper. Yet, she feared to offend him; and perhaps she was still more afraid that he might accept.

They walked along silently. While taking leave of each other on a street corner, he declared suddenly, with some passion, that he could not possibly wait fourteen days before seeing her again. She shrugged her shoulders. It could not be helped. He insisted. She was a slave. Why should they not see each other for an hour, some day this week? Of course she was not a slave, she replied, but she held a position which entailed certain duties.

Duties! Toward whom? Strange people, who took advantage of her? That was no better than actual slavery. No, under no conditions would he wait fourteen days! Surely they would not refuse her an occasional evening off during the week! Although she remained outwardly firm, she thought that he was right.

The next evening he sent her a little note, saying that he had something of importance to talk over with her, and would wait for her on the corner. The lady of the house was present, and saw Theresa blush. There was no answer, Theresa informed the messenger. She did not hear from Kasimir again until the day of their rendezvous.

XXX

THERESA WAITED AT the entrance to the Stadtpark. Opposite her, in a café on the Ringstrasse, the guests sat in the open and sunned themselves. A pale child offered violets for sale. Theresa took a small bouquet. A passerby whispered something in her ear; an insulting invitation, couched in shameless words. She did not dare turn round. She blushed a deep red, and not entirely from anger. Was she not mad to live like a slave, like a nun? How everybody gazed at her! Some turned to look again. One handsome, elegant man walked by her several times, evidently wondering how long she would remain alone. Perhaps it was just as well that Kasimir did not come. A poor devil and a fool, to boot — and why, of all men, he? She could take her choice of men!

There he was, now, in his light summer suit, not of the latest cut, yet rather becoming; his soft hat in his hand, as usual, and the other hand in his pocket. His stride was free and easy. He kissed her hand. They wandered through the park, arm in arm, stood near the lake, and watched the children feed the swans. Kasimir told her of an experience on a lake in a park in Paris, where he had wandered about happily all the evening, and then had passed the night in the shadow of a beautifully fashioned rock. "Surely not alone," said she. He placed his hand over his heart. "I can't remember any more. A thing of the past!"

Theresa wanted to hear no more of Paris, Rome, or any other foreign city. If he yearned so much for them, why did he not go back?

He pressed her arm firmly against his own, and invited her to have tea with him on the terrace of the Kursalon.

They seated themselves at a small table, and Theresa was suddenly overcome with a ridiculous fear that some one might see her there with Kasimir and inform her employers.

As these thoughts passed through her mind, she involuntarily bowed her head; and Kasimir, who sat very formally, with legs crossed, smoking a cigarette, confronted her with precisely what was going on within her mind. She shook her head slowly, on the verge of tears.

"Poor child!" said Kasimir; and, with determination, he added: "all that will be remedied!"

He called the waiter and paid him, allowing the money to clink a little ridiculously on the marble top of the table. Then they descended the wide stairs into the park. He told her how much he had yearned for her. Only when working could he find any peace. He spoke of a fantastic landscape which he was painting, a sort of "tropical Utopia," and of others that he carried in his imagination, pictures of home.

Of home?

Yes, strange as it might seem, he, too, had a home. And he talked of the little German-Bohemian city in which he was born; of his mother, the widow of a notary, who still lived there; of the flower beds in the front garden where he had played as a child.

In turn, Theresa described her family. Her father had shot himself through offended pride; her mother wrote for the newspapers under an assumed name; her brother was a University student. And she herself — yes, why not admit it? — had been engaged to an officer whose parents had refused to consent to his marriage with a poor girl — but she would rather not speak of that; the memory of it was too sad. Kasimir did not press her.

They promenaded through streets that were unfamiliar to Theresa. She thought of her childish dreams — of losing herself in strange paths and, suddenly, when least expected, returning home.

“Well, here we are!” said Kasimir simply.

She looked up. They stood before an apartment house, exactly similar to a hundred others. He took her arm and together they entered the house, walked up the stairs, past doors with brass plates and others with calling cards tacked on them, past hall windows in back of which shadows flitted to and fro, and at last reached the top floor. Kasimir opened the door with a key that screeched in the lock. In the large foyer stood a laundry bag. The walls were almost bare. On one wall hung a large calendar. Through still another door, they entered the studio.

The tremendous window was three quarters covered with a dark green curtain, so that on one side it was day, and on the other side, almost night. In the darkness stood a big easel. On it rested a picture, hidden by a dirty cloth. On an old wardrobe were some books. A paint-smeared palette lay on a long box beside a blue velvet cloak. On the floor were several half-filled gloomy looking bottles. The room reeked of turpentine, leather shoes, and a sweet-scented perfume.

Kasimir threw his hat boldly in a corner, came up to Theresa, took her head in both his hands, looked into her eyes, put his arm around her, and drew her upon his knee as he sank into the armchair. She screamed a little, for it seemed to her that one leg of the armchair was about to give way. He reassured her; then he began to kiss her, almost deliberately. His moustache smelled of pomade, exactly like a barber shop where she had once gone to fetch her father. His lips were moist and cool.

XXXI

IN ORDER TO see Kasimir more often than once in two weeks, Theresa had to resort to various excuses. Once she said that she was going to a theatre with a girl friend; another time, there was a meeting with her brother which could not be postponed. Since she performed her duties as governess conscientiously, these trifling irregularities were passed over rather lightly.

Kasimir's friend, with whom he shared the studio, according to his story, had returned unexpectedly from a trip, which made it impossible for them to continue there. So the lovers, to remain undisturbed, were forced to take a room in a third-rate hotel, for which the rent was paid by Theresa when Kasimir's funds ran low. She did not mind this. In fact, it gave her a certain satisfaction. Of course, his constant financial troubles were responsible for his frequent ill-humour; once, without evident reason, he spoke to her very harshly. But when she, unaccustomed to this tone, silently left his side, quickly dressed herself, and was about to leave, he threw himself on his knees before her and begged her forgiveness — a grace which she knew she was only too ready to accord him.

During the first days of July, the attorney's family was to move to Ischl, there to spend the summer months. Theresa wished to change her position, so as to remain near Kasimir. He himself advised her against this, and promised to visit her. He might even be venturesome enough to rent a room at a nearby farmhouse, so that they might soon be together again.

On the last Sunday before the family were to move, Theresa and Kasimir took a little excursion into the Wienerwald. Late that afternoon, they sat in a restaurant garden situated on a lawn, surrounded on all sides by swaying trees. Around the tables, people were drinking, singing, and laughing. Children were running to and fro. In the house, by an open window, a fat man in his shirt sleeves was playing a harmonica.

Today, Kasimir had money, and he deprived neither himself nor Theresa of anything. Near them sat a young married couple with two children. Kasimir began a conversation with the parents. He praised the exquisite view of the Danube, drank their health, and poured the "Weinerl" to his taste. He talked of all the delicious outlandish wines he had drunk during his travels; of Veltliner, Sankta Maura, Lacrimae Christi, and of the Xeres de la Frontera. He related stories of intoxications which he had witnessed. Then, to the amusement of the company, he imitated the contortions of a drunkard, and finally sang a comic song, to the accompaniment of the harmonica. Everybody applauded, and Kasimir bowed his thanks.

Theresa felt herself growing more and more melancholy. If she were to disappear, would he even notice it? And if she were suddenly to go out of his life, would he miss her, think about her? Frightened by her sudden insight into reality, she wondered if it would not have been better to have told him on the way of certain fears which she believed she had reason to feel, and which would also be of importance to him. Now she could not bring herself to impart such news. And why should she? Tomorrow might prove her apprehensions premature.

The sun had long since gone down. The forest stood in darkness. Night was falling gently. Several students, in red caps, marched by. Theresa looked involuntarily to see if her brother might be among them. But he did not belong to a "Colour." That, too, had been a lie, like much else that she had told Kasimir. What would Karl say, should her anxieties prove well founded? Ah, what did he care? He cared as little as the others. She did not have to account to anyone except herself.

It was almost dark when she and Kasimir made their way homeward. His arm around her, they walked down the path along the woods. They ran down an incline and she almost fell, whereupon they laughed like children. He pressed her closer, and she was happy again. All too soon they reached the valley. They wandered through the streets at a brisk pace and rode to the city in a crowded car.

Theresa was again uneasy, but Kasimir was apparently in his element among the mob of tired women, laughing children, and excited men. He joined in the stupid banter exchanged between the passengers, played the gallant, and told a fat man that he must at once relinquish his seat to the charming young lady who had just entered. He passed his cigarettes round to everyone.

Theresa was happy when the trip was over. It was not far to her house. At the door, they arranged a rendezvous for the end of the following week.

Kasimir seemed suddenly to be in haste. He did not even turn round to look after her,

XXXII

THERESA COULD SCARCELY wait until the next meeting. During that interval, she wrote him two loving letters, but received no reply. On Saturday night, an undeniable fear trembled within her, which changed to instant delight as she saw him coming toward her, as young and jaunty as ever.

Why had he not answered her letters? What did she mean by "answered"? He had received no letters. She must have forgotten that he had moved. Moved? Of course! He had told her so. His friend had gone to Munich, and they had had to give up the studio. He was living temporarily in a small room, which was good enough for his purposes.

They had not walked far before they arrived at an old house in a narrow, unlit street, in the centre of the city. They climbed a narrow stairway to the fourth floor. Kasimir opened the apartment door. The hall was in total darkness, save for a small ray of light that gleamed through the keyhole of the kitchen door. The place smelled of gasoline.

They entered the room. Through the window, the outlines of chimneys on the houses opposite were dimly visible. The roof was so close that one could almost reach it with an extended hand. When Theresa looked out over the roofs and chimneys, she could see a large stretch of the street below. A clear view, and a quiet, central location. Perhaps he would take a lease for a year.

"Can one paint here?" asked Theresa.

"Oh, small pictures," he remarked, casually.

Kasimir had not yet lighted the candle, and in the clear moonlight that filled the room, the wardrobe, the narrow bed pushed against the window, and particularly the porcelain oven, looked cozy enough.

Kasimir laid emphasis upon the fact that they were now in one of the oldest houses in Vienna — a former palace. Part of the furniture had once belonged to a Count. Theresa wanted to look into the wardrobe, but Kasimir would not permit it. He had not been able to straighten things out yet, having only moved in that same morning. What, only this morning, yet he had not received her letters at the studio? That was strange, she thought; but she said nothing.

He had a little confession to make to her. He had been obliged to help his friend out of a difficulty, and he had not left himself enough money to provide supper. She handed him her purse, and he rushed out.

She sighed deeply, alone there, in the dark room. Why did he always lie, as though it were a matter of shame to be only a poor devil — and yet he was sometimes almost proud of it. All his lies seemed to turn upon his poverty. She would beg him to confide his troubles to her. Conditions were such that neither he nor she ought to have any secrets from one another. Today she would tell him that she expected a baby.

Kasimir was gone a long time. The thought flashed through her mind that he might never come back. Again she felt an impulse to open the wardrobe; but, unnoticed by her, he had surreptitiously abstracted the key. A small trunk stood under the bed. She pulled it out. It was unlocked. There was nothing in it except a few pieces of well patched underclothing and a frayed necktie. She closed the lid and shoved the trunk back in place. She was deeply moved. Kasimir's poverty cut her to the quick more deeply even than her own misery ever had. She felt more strangely bound to him than ever before, almost as though fate had destined them for one another. Each could help the other to bear his burdens.

As he entered with a little package and a bottle of wine, she threw her arms tempestuously about his neck. He condescendingly indulged her caresses. Whether it was only the wine that made her soul light and unloosed her tongue, or whether it was this sentiment of kinship which she had never experienced before, she did not know; but suddenly nestling in his arms, she confessed what had been locked in her bosom these many days. He was positive that she was mistaken. They would wait for a time, and then see. He said many things that would have hurt her, had she understood or cared to hear them aright.

When they descended the stairs, everything was as if she had never divulged anything. It was long past midnight when they bid each other goodnight at Theresa's door. Again he was in great haste. Everything was arranged; she knew his address, and he knew hers. Perhaps in a few weeks they would be together again on the green, under the starry heavens.

XXXIII

THE FASHIONABLE VILLA Ischl was situated in a large garden. From the balcony, one could see the bathers and cure-seekers walking up and down the esplanade. The men of the house being still in the city, the spirit of the Eppich household seemed freer; both girls were happier than Theresa had ever seen them. Frau Eppich was more friendly and kind to her than she had ever been in the city.

There were many visitors. An elegant, bald-headed young man, who had frequently dined with the Eppichs in the city, came almost daily. In the evening, he sat with Frau Eppich in the garden. Theresa took long walks with the girls. Occasionally, they were joined by younger and older friends, with their governesses, and now and again by boys and young men. Sometimes they went rowing, and, at home, there were usually harmless parlour games, in which even Theresa took part.

The older girl had become sincerely attached to Theresa, and made her her confidante. They often walked arm in arm apart from the others, and she would confide to her many of her innocent little affairs of the heart.

The beautiful countryside, the summer air, the walks out in the open — all greatly contributed to Theresa's well-being; and since she received a short letter from Kasimir about every other day, her spirit was free from care.

Then, abruptly, the letters ceased. Theresa became terribly excited. Her condition, which was now unmistakable, and which, at times, even delighted her, overwhelmed her suddenly with its seriousness. She sent Kasimir a special delivery letter, in which she spoke unrestrainedly of her anxiety. No word came from him; but, instead, a letter from her mother. Could not Theresa manage to visit her, now that she was only a few hours away? Theresa mentioned the invitation quite casually to Frau Eppich; and, as though they had just been waiting for such an excuse, an immediate visit to Salzburg was arranged.

The next day, Theresa started on her trip, in the company of the Eppichs and of a family acquaintance, with her son and daughter; and in addition, the elegant bald young man. At the station, Theresa left the others and hurried to her mother, who had moved to an airy corner room in a house near their old home. Frau Fabiani received her daughter in a quiet, yet affectionate manner. The strange, uncanny creature of a few years ago had entirely disappeared, and instead, there appeared an old woman.

She was pleased to hear that Theresa was happy. She herself, fortunately, had nothing to complain of. She earned a little more than was necessary for her needs, and as far as being alone was concerned, her work was benefited thereby. She wanted to know all about Theresa's present and former positions. Theresa was somewhat touched by this display of interest. But during dinner, which was ordered from a nearby restaurant, the conversation lapsed and Theresa became uncomfortable. She felt as if she were the guest of some strange, distracted old woman.

While her mother took her afternoon nap, Theresa gazed out of the window into the street. She could see the distant bridge and could almost hear the rushing of the water. She thought of the people with whom she had come to Salzburg; at that very moment, they were probably dining at the hotel. She thought of Max, of Alfred, and finally, of that strangest of strangers, Kasimir, whose child she was carrying, and who had not answered her last letters. Were he even less a stranger, he could not help her. With of without his love, she was alone.

Without disturbing her mother, she slipped quietly away, and wandered through city streets that were deserted on this hot, summer afternoon. At first, she felt inclined to visit those places which held memories for her; but these memories had lost their glamour.

Almost mechanically, she walked to the hotel where her travelling companions were stopping; they, however, had gone on a little excursion. Theresa sat in the cool lobby and glanced through the illustrated periodicals. Her eye happening to fall upon the writing room, she thought of once more sending a letter to Kasimir. She wrote to him in words of the warmest tenderness, intended to awaken anew within him the memories of the delights which they had enjoyed in common. She painted for him an alluring picture of the possibility of a meeting at night in the garden of the villa, and purposely refrained from all mention of that which was now so gravely troubling her.

She felt a certain relief when she had finished the letter. There remained nothing for her to do but return to her mother's room. Frau Fabiani was already at her work. Theresa took a book from the shelf, the nearest one at hand. It happened to be a detective story, which held her fascinated until far into the evening.

At last, her mother put aside her work and invited Theresa to walk with her. Silently, the two women strolled in the cool evening air, along the river bank; and later turned in at a modest, seldom-frequented restaurant. Frau Fabiani was treated as an habitué, and, to Theresa's surprise, drank three glasses of beer.

For the night, Theresa had to make herself as comfortable as she could on the couch. She awoke much cramped. Although there was still plenty of time before she would be required to meet the others at the station, she soon took leave of her mother, who was sleeping in a curtained alcove. She was much relieved when she found herself outside.

The morning was clear and bright. Theresa sat in the Mirabel gardens, amid the colours and odours of thousands of flowers. Two young girls, former schoolmates, passed by. They did not recognize her at first, but soon turned round and greeted her. Then they questioned one another. There: a told them that she was a companion in a refined Viennese home, and had just come in to visit her mother. She wanted to know all the news of the city. But since she did not dare to ask about Max or Alfred, she heard only small-town gossip, which did not interest her. Though of the same age as her two former schoolmates, she felt years older than they. She had nothing more in common with them or with this city, and she was glad when, an hour later, the little company assembled at the station, ready to leave.

XXXIV

THE NEXT DAY, at Villa Ischl, Theresa waited feverishly for news from Kasimir. It was in vain. Her agitated condition was beginning to be noticed. It was clear to her that something would have to be done. At least, she must talk to some one. In whom should she confide? She felt nearest to the fifteen-year-old Bertha, who fell in love with a different man every day. At night, before going to bed, she would cry out her heart on Theresa's bosom. This child seemed closer to her than any one, at that moment; she would understand and comfort her. But soon she saw the stupidity of the idea, and so remained silent.

Among the governesses and companions whom she had met during the summer, there was not one toward whom she felt inclined in friendship. They, too, may have had their own personal experiences; yet, she feared ridicule, indiscretion and betrayal. Naturally, she knew that there were ways and means to help her out of difficulty. She knew also that, this could not be accomplished without danger. One might be sent to jail, become ill, or even die. She recalled a half-forgotten story of a similar nature that had ended tragically.

She gave herself a respite of eight days more in which to await news from Kasimir. During this time, the distractions of country life kept her comparatively calm. When the eight days had elapsed, she pleaded for a leave of three days. She had some very important matters to discuss with her brother regarding the inheritance left them by their father. The leave was granted without question.

XXXV

THERESA ARRIVED IN Vienna at noon. She went directly to Kasimir's rooming house, and ran quickly up the stairs. An old woman opened the door. Herr Kasimir Tobisch did not live here; in fact, no one of that name had ever lived here. A few weeks ago, a man had rented the room and paid a small deposit, but he had disappeared the very next day, without leaving any clue of his present whereabouts.

Theresa was downcast and ashamed. Through the superintendent, she learned that a few letters addressed to Kasimir Tobisch had been received at that house, but that only one had been called for. Theresa saw her own handwriting staring her in the face. She begged to be allowed to take the letters. The superintendent refused to give them to her. Theresa blushed to the roots of her hair, and withdrew.

She then proceeded to the studio in which Kasimir had formerly lived. Here the name of Kasimir Tobisch was entirely unknown. Perhaps the two artists occupying the room at present might know something about him. Theresa hurried upstairs. An elderly person in a paint-besmeared smock opened the door. He knew nothing of a man named Kasimir Tobisch. The former tenant had been a Rumanlan, who had left without paying his rent. Theresa stammered thanks for the information. In the artist's eyes there glowed something akin to pity. She felt his glance follow her as she descended the stairs.

Now she stood forlorn in the street. In spite of everything, she could not believe that Kasimir had left Vienna. Fortunately, she was not obliged to return immediately. She could walk the streets a few days, until she found him. Though inwardly aware of the futility and ridiculousness of her efforts, she nevertheless walked for hours, hither and thither, back and forth, until, at last, hunger and fatigue drove her into a restaurant. She sat alone in the unprepossessing room, this being much later than the usual dinner hour. While waiting for the meal to be served, she sat feverishly counting the tables, over and over again, from those in the daylight near the window to those placed in the darkest niches of the room. The restaurant in which she now sat was the dining-room of a second-rate hotel. She decided to engage quarters there.

In her room, she washed away the dust of her journey. Evening was still far distant. She looked out of her fourth floor window into the dusty street. The inimical, monotonous noises of the city reached her even there. If Kasimir were to pass, would she have time to rush down the stairs and reach him? Would she be able to recognize him at all from such a distance? The faces all seemed to fade into nothingness. Perhaps he was passing at this very moment, and she did not know it! She leaned out of the window until she became dizzy. She drew back and seated herself at the table. The noises of the street receded.

Her loneliness, her complete detachment, and the consciousness that, at this moment, no one knew of her whereabouts, gave her, for a time, a strange feeling of calm, almost of well-being. Why had she been so restless during these past days and weeks, as though she were actually threatened by some palpable danger? What had she to fear? To whom did she owe an accounting? To her mother? Or to her brother? They certainly had never troubled themselves about her. To her employers, who paid her for her services and would, whenever it pleased them, dismiss her like a stranger? What did these people matter to her?

When last in Salzburg, she had learned from her mother that her inheritance was somewhat larger than she had imagined. With that, she could surely manage for a few months, and therefore would not be a burden to any one. Perhaps, after all, it was best for all concerned that she had not met and would have nothing more to do with Kasimir. Who knows? He might even have been capable of extorting those few gulden from her that were to tide her over her difficult period.

Why had she come to Vienna? What did she want of him? Ah, why question? She knew only too well. She wanted him — his kisses, his caresses. And then again, after a short time of peace, she became despondent. It was for his sake that she had come to Vienna — hoping, yearning, yet filled with anxiety lest she find him not. Now she knew without a doubt that he was gone. He had simply fled, so as to avoid all responsibilities and all unpleasantness.

Was that not stupid of him? Did he not realize that she would never have made any demands upon him? Why had she not told him? He had no duties toward her. She had not been an innocent, inexperienced girl when she gave herself to him. And she always knew that he was a poor wretch. She would never have required anything of him. And the child? Well, that was her affair — hers, alone!

The room had grown quite dark. Outside, the city was covered by a dismal light. What now? Should she go out into the street? Wander aimlessly about? And then the night, and morning! She could not possibly meet him accidentally, even if he were still in the city. She had nothing more to do here. Almost with a feeling of relief, she determined to return to Ischl at once. She paid her bill, ran down the stairs, and took a cab to the station. When at last she had settled herself in a compartment, she instantly fell into a deep sleep, from which she did not awaken until the train was within fifteen minutes of her destination.

XXXVI

THERESA WAS TREATED with great consideration by the Eppich household. Even the guests were polite to her, almost as though she were a poorer yet entirely worthy member of the family. A young, unprepossessing lawyer, quite myopic and of a delicate, sickly appearance, paid her marked attention. He spoke to her of his sad youth, his studies, and his experiences as a teacher. She felt that he was somewhat overrating her; yes, mistaking her for a person entirely remote from what she actually was.

She, upon her part, told him many things — about her parents, her brother, and about Alfred, her first love; all in the slightly casual and often untruthful manner to which she had lately become accustomed. She was completely silent about Max, and related her adventure with Kasimir as though it had been most harmless — just a few friendly walks.

On the last day of his stay, while in the woods, the two lagged behind the rest of the company. With a very clumsy gesture, the young lawyer attempted to embrace her. She pushed him back vehemently; then, forgave him, and gave him permission to write to her. She never heard from him again. Toward the end of August, young Herr Eppich arrived. His sisters, who did not get on very well with him, were nevertheless happy to see him, and all their girl friends promptly fell in love with him. According to the current style, he had shaved his moustache, and every one found that he resembled a certain famous actor and matinee idol.

At first, he was very reticent with Theresa. One day, on the stairs, he jestingly refused to allow her to pass, and she did not resist him as strongly as she had intended to. When she had entered her room, she locked the door after her. She looked out of the window and saw the young gentleman step out into the garden, a cigarette between his lips, without so much as a backward glance.

Dr. Eppich had come for two days. Something unpleasant seemed to have happened between his wife and himself. Every one noticed it. He left without making his farewells. The younger daughter cried much during the next few days. It was quite apparent to Theresa that this twelve-year-old knew more about the matters then going on, and felt them more deeply, than any of the others.

One night, Theresa started up in fright. She had heard a noise at her door. The thought came to her that George was trying to gain entrance to her room. Instead of fear, she felt a pleasurable excitement; and when all remained still after that, she was frankly disappointed. That which had flashed through her mind many times since that day on the stairs, was becoming a sort of plan during the sleepless night. She felt that in George she might assure her child of a father. Of course, it was high time for her to look for one. But as if the young man had divined her intentions, he kept aloof and distant. Theresa was at first surprised at his reticence, but during the course of the next few days, she discovered that he was carrying on an intrigue with a young woman who frequented the house.

She was by no means jealous. Her anger with herself soon changed to shame. She felt deserted. And more and more, she was conscious of the distressing nature of her condition and the danger of her situation. Above all, the thought of meeting her brother filled her with an almost ridiculous panic. At the same time, she was certain that most of the women she knew, and in particular, those of her profession, had gone through similar experiences and had known how to procure help for themselves. One could not ask outright, but surely, one might turn the conversation in such a manner as to learn something useful.

Among the nursemaids and governesses of her acquaintance, there were only two with whom she occasionally conversed in a lighter vein, without, however, touching upon any really delicate themes. One was a thin, pale, faded, and seemingly sweet person, who chattered, not only of the family in which she was employed, but of every one she knew, in the most acrimonious manner. She was addressed as Fraulein, though it was known that she was either a widow or a divorcée.

The other was a brunette, not yet thirty, and a girl of exceptionally pleasant qualities. Many amours were attributed to her, though not one had ever been proven against her. This was the person, Theresa thought, best able to advise her. While walking with her one drizzly afternoon in the middle of September, their charges some little distance ahead of them, she began, in a rather clumsy fashion, to talk of the many children in the Bank Director's house where Fraulein Rosa was employed. But since she hesitated to put a direct question to her, she learned nothing that she did not already know... namely, that there were obliging women, and also doctors, to whom one might resort in such emergencies, and that the attendant dangers were not at all too great.

This superficial information had the effect of calming Theresa. The light, careless manner in which the other treated the entire subject, convinced her that that which had appeared obnoxious and dangerous was in reality not so difficult, if it were not indeed to be regarded merely as a matter of routine. It was an accident that occurred in the lives of many women, and left no further traces. For her, too, it should mean nothing more serious than that.

XXXVII

AUTUMN HAD COME, and the family moved back to the city. Theresa scanned the papers, not for advertisements of positions, but for other information which might prove more useful to her in her present exigency. One afternoon, she entered an old house in the central part of the city, mounted the tortuous stairs, and, a few minutes later, sat opposite a pleasant, middle-aged lady, who was bathed in the pink light that penetrated through the curtains.

The comfortable room, furnished in the usual style, did not in any way divulge the secret of the lady's profession. Theresa, with no timidity, yet with some care, managed to put forth her troubles. The pleasant lady mentioned that, scarcely half an hour before, a young Baroness had come to her for an appointment — the second this year. She told further of her fashionable "clientèle," that she had recruited even from the nobility. She jested mildly of the light-headedness of young girls; then without transition, spoke of a very wealthy manufacturer who had recently come in with an actress. This man was tiring of his sweetheart, and she thought she could arrange a meeting for Theresa.

Theresa took leave with the promise to think the matter over and come again on the following day. As she stepped out of the door, she saw a man standing there. He was dressed in a black overcoat with a shabby black velvet collar, and carried a brief-case. Her heart throbbed painfully. She saw herself arrested, accused, and thrown into prison. And only when she had lost herself in the crowd below did she really become calmer.

This first experience did not discourage her. The very next evening, she visited a woman who had likewise advertised in the paper, but would not give her address except through mail. On the third floor of a new house was a sign on which was printed in gold letters: "Gottfried Ruhsam." A neatly dressed maid ushered Theresa into an almost elegant salon. While waiting, she looked at a photograph album, in which she recognized the familiar faces of many famous personages of the stage.

At last, a man entered, greeted her hastily, and then disappeared through another door. A little later he came back in the company of a slim, no longer young lady, dressed in a comfortable, though well-fitting house-dress. Again the man disappeared, after murmuring a quiet "pardon!" Theresa intercepted the affectionate glance with which Frau Ruhsam followed him to the door. "My husband," she said; and, almost by way of apology, she added: "He is nearly always on the road." Then:

"Well, how can I be of service to you, my dear child?" Theresa expressed herself even more carefully than she had the day before. The woman understood her at once, and asked when she proposed to take up her abode in her house. Theresa answered that such a thought had not entered her mind. The lady stiffened a little, and declared that she seldom agreed to any such arrangement as that which Theresa wished, but she would make an exception in this case, and take all the risks and responsibilities upon herself. She mentioned, however, a price which was out of the question for Theresa.

At that, Frau Ruhsam warned her not to commit any stupidities. She spoke of a man who had married a young girl, even though he knew she had had a child by another man. She cautioned Theresa to beware of the women who advertised in the papers. Only recently, two of them had been arrested.

Theresa was red and confused. She wandered through the streets in the warm, autumn rain as though in a dream. By pure chance, she found herself presently before the house in which she and Kasimir had last been together. Following a sudden impulse, she asked the superintendent if Herr Tobisch had called for the other letters. To her utter astonishment, she discovered that he had, and that only the day before. A new hope sprung up within her.

In a nearby coffee-house, she wrote Kasimir a letter that held no reproaches, but only passionate assurances of her unalterable love. She would ask him no questions; she realized that there were secrets in an artist's life. She was in excellent health, and wanted much to see him again, no matter where, if only for a quarter of an hour. She left the letter with the janitor. That night she slept well, and awoke with a hazy, happy feeling, as though something uncommonly agreeable had happened to her the day before.

XXXVIII

FOR A TIME, Theresa attempted nothing at all. Sometimes, in the evening, after her day's duties were done, a certain calm would come over her. She would wake at night and think. Everything seemed unreal. Her present condition, her entire life, all seemed strange to her. The figures of her father, her mother, Alfred, Max, Kasimir passed through her mind like phantoms. And the most unreal, impossible thing of all was that, almost without her being aware of it, something alive was developing within her, her mother's grandchild — a creature destined to fate, to youth and age, to fortune and misfortune, to love, sickness, and death, like every one else — just as herself. And since she did not understand it, she simply could not believe it possible, as though, after all, in spite of everything, she must be mistaken.

A too abrupt, well-meant, but not to be misunderstood remark made by the servant, brought her to her senses with a start. People were beginning to suspect how matters stood with her. At the thought, her heart almost stood still with fear. She realized again the seriousness of her position. Once again she attempted what she had twice before tried in vain. This time, the woman whom she went to see immediately inspired her with confidence. She spoke sensibly and kindly to her, stressing the illegality of her profession, of which she was not in ignorance. The laws were stupid, and had no consideration for one's social position. She closed her discourse philosophically with the remark that it were best on all accounts for people not to be born at all. The charges were not exorbitant, and it was arranged that Theresa should present herself for the operation in two days.

Theresa felt a great sense of release. The peaceful serenity in which she passed the next day made the fictitiousness of her calm in the past few weeks all the more clear in her mind. Her condition seemed perfectly natural, and not at all serious. All thought of the disagreeableness and the dangers which she had feared now left her mind. She was serene.

Yet, as she mounted the stairs, on the appointed day, her calm suddenly left her. She rang the bell quickly, so as not to be tempted to flee down the stairs again. But the maid informed Theresa that her employer was out on a case, and would not be back for several days. Theresa breathed freely again. It seemed to her that a painful duty had not merely been postponed, but actually accomplished.

On the first floor, two women stood talking. When Theresa passed, they ceased their conversation, looked at each other queerly, and smiled knowingly. A cab stood below in front of the door. The cab driver greeted her so politely that she felt certain he was enjoying a private jest at her expense. On the way home, she felt that she was being followed. Of course, she knew that all was purely imaginary. She no longer felt conspicuous because the cab driver bowed politely, and even the two women on the stairs did not frighten her. Nevertheless, she knew that she could not make that trip again, nor venture her luck with another such obliging woman.

It occurred to her to go back to Salzburg and confess everything to her mother. She surely would understand and know of some means to help her daughter. Even worse predicaments than this occurred in her romances; and they ended happily, for all that. And in the Salzburg house, many suspicious things had happened. Had she not seen officers and veiled women slip out mysteriously in the dead of the night? And had not her mother attempted to foist her on the old Count? But even so, how could her mother be of any use? She gave up the idea.

Then she thought of going away, anywhere, until after the child was born. She could place it in the care of a young, childless couple; give it to them, or simply leave it on somebody's doorstep and flee. Finally, she wondered, should she not look up Alfred, confide in him, and plead for his counsel? Such ideas and many others passed through her mind, but she discarded them all as futile. These thoughts came to her not only at night, when she was alone, but even at the dinner table and when she was out walking with the girls. Yes, even when she was helping them with their lessons. She was so accustomed to performing her duties mechanically and spiritlessly that no one seemed to notice what was going on within her.

Meanwhile, the woman to whom she had last appealed for help and advice must surely have returned from her case. Theresa reflected that she could do nothing more sensible than go once again to this woman. She made an appointment for the next day by letter. She did not mention her name, but recalled herself to the lady's mind by mentioning their former conversation.

A few hours before the time set for the visit, there came a letter from Kasimir. He had been, so he wrote her, at home with his mother; he was greatly surprised that he had received no communication from Theresa while she was at Ischl. It was only a moment ago that he had discovered her letter in the janitor's lodge of the house "where once we were so blissfully happy." Those were his words. Theresa became faint as she perused them. He must see her again, he concluded, even though his life depended on it.

She realized very well that he was lying. She felt certain that he had never been away; that he had most assuredly received all of her letters, and not merely the last one, as he claimed. Even his lies, she reflected, were part of him; the very part, indeed, that made him so adorable and attractive. And at that moment she experienced such a deep love for him that she desired nothing more than to hold him for ever, to bind him to herself for all eternity. And this was possible, so she reflected, primarily because there still was plenty of time; still many weeks must intervene before she would have to inform him of her condition. What she had already told him some time ago, he had no doubt already forgotten. However, if he still remembered it and she herself kept silent about it, he would gladly infer, then, that she had been mistaken. Nothing mattered but to be with him, to lie again in his beloved arms.

They met near the entrance of the Stadtpark, as they had done many a time before, in those lovely days of long ago. It was a cold, miserable autumn evening, and Kasimir was already awaiting her when she appeared. He seemed to her to have become somewhat more slender. He wore a rather short, bright-coloured raincoat, with the collar upturned; a coat that seemed much too thin for protection against the raw weather. He greeted her as though they had last seen each other but a few days ago. Why in the world, he asked, had she not written to him? She assured him timidly, in reply, that she had written; and, what was more, that the letters had been called for and delivered.

"What, called for?" he cried out, in surprise. "In all probability, they fell into the hands of an impostor. It's positively dreadful. Just wait until I get back. I'll make it hot for the janitor!"

She asked him why he had not sent her word at Ischl that he had left to pay a visit to his mother.

"Yes, you're right in asking that. But if you had any idea of the conditions at home! My mother's brother committed suicide."

As he said this, he pointed shyly to the black band surrounding his soft, gray hat.

"But I would rather not tell you now all the things I learned while at home. Some other time, dearest, I'll let you know everything." — In such wise did he express himself. "Now, everything is all right again. I even have hopes of obtaining a permanent position on the staff of an illustrated newspaper, and in addition, an art dealer has undertaken to sell a few of my pictures."

In the dining-room which she recognized so well, and which she noticed had not become any more pleasant since her last visit, he became more tender than he had ever been, and happy, too, just as in the days when she had first known him. He questioned her about her summer vacation, and jestingly demanded to be informed if she had also remained faithful to him. In reply, she stared dumbly at him, quite failing to comprehend his question, as though certain plans, which she had afterwards discarded, had never really existed for her. She told him of her walks, her trip to Salzburg, and the demands of her work which, she complained, exhausted her.

Kasimir shook his head disapprovingly at this last comment.

"It's beastly," he asserted, with vigour, "to have to exist in such a state of slavery. But it won't last much longer, you may rest assured! In any case, you must leave your position with the Eppich family and try to support yourself by giving lessons. I'll soon have a fixed income; then, we can occupy an apartment together. And really, after all is said and done, why should we not, as a matter of fact, get married? Wouldn't it really be the most sensible thing to do — why, in a certain sense, even the most practical thing to do?"

Notwithstanding the warnings of her better judgment, she could not forbear to accord him again her complete confidence. To be sure, timid doubts tried to assert themselves in her mind; but she crushed them, before they could take possession of her. Nevertheless, she was careful not to betray anything of her condition to Kasimir. The right moment for confession, so she thought, had not yet arrived. "Who knows," she mused herself, "how long it will be before the confession will be received by him as welcome and joyful news?"

XXXIX

THREE DAYS LATER, on a Sunday afternoon, they met again. For the first time since their acquaintance began, he brought her some flowers, and what aroused her to even greater excitement, he offered a small sum of money — in payment, as he expressed it, "of a part of his debt." She refused to think of receiving it, but he insisted with so much vigour that she at last consented to take the money out of his first month's salary. He readily agreed to this proposal, and pocketed the money once more.

"And now," he proceeded, "I must beg your forgiveness for mentioning a matter of which I have never spoken to you before, but which I can no longer conceal."

This preamble seemed ominous to her; but how quickly and gladly did she pardon him, when all that he had to confess was that he had this time spoken to his mother about her.

"And why not? In a short time, you two women will know each other and love each other well!"

Tears arose in Theresa's eyes. Now she, too, refused to conceal any secrets from him. He listened to her confession calmly, earnestly, and with obvious emotion.

"I had a suspicion that things were so; and all in all, it is a sign that we were meant for each other and that we must live together for ever. It's a genuine sign of fate. But," he continued, "I consider it my duty to warn you against acting in too much haste. In the meantime, you had better not give up your position with the Eppich family. One can't notice it on you at all. You mustn't leave the place before the New Year, in any case. It is two months until then, and goodness knows what might not take place in the meanwhile, especially as my affairs are apparently beginning to change for the better."

She left his arms calmed and almost joyful.

"I'll let you hear from me," he assured her, "in two or three days, at the very most."

Yet she had to wait a whole week for the promised information; and when it came, it proved to be a terrible disappointment, for Kasimir wrote that he was compelled to leave for home very suddenly on some business in connection with the settlement of his late uncle's estate. She wrote to him at once, in care of the address which he left her. She wrote a second and even a third time, but received no answer. At last, she decided to do something that she had not done before; namely, to fill out a return address envelope. Three days later, she received it back in person from the letter-carrier. It was marked: "Addressee Unknown." Her shock was not so keen as she had anticipated, for' she was in reality prepared, deep down in her soul, for precisely such an eventuality. But now she also knew that there could be no other way out for her, however the affair might turn, but the way which she had determined upon long ago. Nevertheless, she postponed from day to day putting her decision into execution; her anxiety mounted. Bad dreams troubled her sleep. And to cap this, it chanced that again, just at this time, there appeared articles in the newspapers about a suit against a physician for a crime against "budding life." Theresa became fully convinced that she would assuredly die, if she permitted the fearful operation to be performed upon her. But, as soon as she had decided to do nothing definite and let matters run their natural course, there came upon her a strange feeling of restfulness, at once blissful and incomprehensible.

XL

ONCE, AS SHE was walking with her wards through the central section of the city, she led them, partly by accident, partly with conscious intent, into the Cathedral of Saint Stephan. Since that memorable summer day when she had received the news of her father's death, she had not been inside a church. They halted in front of a side altar, which stood in almost total darkness. The younger girl, who was inclined to piety, knelt down and seemed to pray. The elder allowed her glance to wander at random. Her whole attitude bespoke her boredom.

Theresa felt her heart rise again with new courage. She had never been religious, in the true sense of the word. As a child and as a young girl, she had always taken part in the prescribed religious exercises, with zeal, but without genuine emotion. Today for the first time, a strong inner need caused her to bow her head. She folded her hands prayfully, but her lips were firmly closed. When she left, she did so with the firm intention of returning again, soon and often. And, in fact, thenceforward she seized every opportunity, either when alone or with the girls, though it might be but for a few minutes, to enter any church that she happened to encountered on her path, to say a short prayer. Soon that failed to satisfy her, and on the first Sunday in December, she asked permission of Frau Eppich, who manifested no surprise at the request, to take the morning off to go to early mass. There, whether on account of early morning fatigue or because of a lack of real piety, of which she accused herself — there, in the crowd, she remained unmoved, despite the rich music of the organ and the sacred unction of the ceremonies; and when she left the church and stepped out into the cold, frosty morning air, she felt more downcast than ever.

She now recited her prayers every evening at home, with an intensity even greater than any that she had ever displayed in the days of her childhood. And just as in those days prayer had come easily to her and she had begged the grace of heaven upon her parents, her teachers, her girl friends, and even her dolls, so now she prayed for divine mercy and forgiveness, not alone for herself, but also for her mother, whom she recognized as a lost and erring soul; for the child, whose first stirrings she now felt within her; and even for Kasimir, who, whatever else he might be, had sired this child, and who would perhaps one day find his way back to it — and perhaps also to her. And once she even offered up a prayer for her father's everlasting bliss, and then dropped bitter but healing tears upon her pillow.

A few days before Christmas, Frau Eppich called Theresa into her room and informed her that she was sorry that they could not longer keep her in the house. "I was really hoping that you would voluntarily take your leave at the right time," she said, "but since, for some incomprehensible reason, you seem to fail to realize your situation, I must insist, if only on account of the girls, that you leave today, or at the very latest, tomorrow."

"To-morrow," replied Theresa, almost in a whisper.

Frau Eppich nodded assent.

"Everybody in the house is already prepared for your departure. I have told them," Frau Eppich explained, "that your mother in Salzburg is ill."

Softly, and as if mechanically, Theresa replied:

"In any case, I thank you for your kindness, my gracious lady!"

She went immediately to her room and started to pack her belongings.

The leave-taking took place quickly and without any special excitement. Dr. Eppich expressed the hope that her mother might soon be well again; the girls believed, or pretended to believe, that Theresa would soon return; but in the mocking face of young Master George, she clearly read the thought: What a clever dog I am!

XLI

SHE SPENT ANOTHER night with Frau Kausick. But before the next morning had come, she realized that she could not prolong her sojourn among so much wretchedness and squalor. She considered her situation. Since her entire portion of her father's estate had been paid to her, she hoped, with some economy, to make it last possibly a year. Above all else, she had to find a suitable refuge for her approaching confinement. "But after that?" she asked herself. "What then, when all this will no longer concern myself alone?" Thought and breath failed her, as though she now for the first time realized with complete clearness what the future held in store for her. And suddenly she thought of Frau Ruhsam as the only person from whom she might receive sympathetic understanding, not only of her physical condition, but of her spiritual situation as well.

The friendly aspect of Frau Ruhsam, as evoked in her memory, aroused her to new hope. She went to seek her at once, without confessing to herself that any expectation drew her thither, other than of merely finding a haven for the period of her confinement.

Frau Ruhsam did not appear the least surprised at seeing Theresa again. As the latter approached the subject of her mission by asking timid and clumsy questions, Frau Ruhsam exhibited some impatience and, thinking that Theresa lacked the courage to state the actual issue, sought to come to her assistance by volunteering the information that she could recommend a physician who might perform the small operation at her home.

"Of course, the costs—" said Frau Ruhsam; but Theresa cut her short. She explained that she had not come on that account; that she no longer contemplated such measures. "Oh, I see!" observed Frau Ruhsam. "Then it is to arrange for lodgings. That would be" — she paused and eyed Theresa critically— "until about the middle or the end of May." As it happened, she had a few calls for just about that time, but she would see what could be done.

Though Theresa had not thought of it before, the offer attracted her. Here she would find rest, friendliness, and perhaps kindness — everything she longed for. She inquired as to the terms. At the rate quoted, a stay of three weeks would have consumed Theresa's whole fortune.

"It's really not too high," declared Frau Ruhsam. "Perhaps you will come sometime with your husband, and your husband will then see that for himself. I don't think you'll find anything better, and I promise absolute discretion. As regards the police notification, even that I can manage to arrange."

Theresa replied that she would talk the matter over with her husband, and left.

She decided to remain with Frau Kausick for the time being, at any rate. Soon she even became adapted to the humble circumstances which she found in the Kausick establishment. Frau Kausick was away all day. Theresa thus spent most of her time with the children, and she enjoyed helping them with their lessons and playing with them, thus keeping her tutorial talents in practice, so to speak. In addition, she felt safe here from any possibility of discovery, precisely as if she were in a strange city. And gradually, she adapted herself to the people among whom she now moved, not alone in her physical manner of living, but also in her language, even to the point of speaking in their dialect. From day to day, she spent less care upon her clothes; and the rapidly changing form of her body encouraged in her a carelessness which further operated to shut her out at the same time from her former world.

In order to dispel the monotony which frequently seized her, she subscribed to a circulating library in the suburbs, and quickly devoured many carelessly chosen books during the numerous hours which she spent alone in her wretched chamber, always fascinated by, and often deeply engrossed in the spectacle of a fantastic and trivial world. There were also a few casual conversations, held mostly on the stairs, with the humble families of the neighbourhood. And if ever anybody made a remark about Theresa's condition, it happened casually, good-naturedly, jestingly, for no one in this circle found anything unusual in Theresa's pregnancy, or even particularly noticed it.

But there were moments, especially in the early morning, while she still lay in bed, when, awakening from her stupor, she would see her whole existence as an unintelligible and unworthy thing. But no sooner did she become aware of her corpulency, as she usually did after her first involuntary movement, than she felt as though there rushed forth from the new life that was developing within her, a stream of sweet exhaustion, which seeped through all her limbs from some hidden source — a stream in which her whole being, given over fearlessly and humbly to a natural fate, magically dissolved.

She was singularly free from all the ailments which confinement usually brings to women; on the contrary, she experienced a condition of increased wellbeing. Only a certain physical lassitude increased from day to day; and it frequently happened that when, in the morning, she sat on the bed, combing her hair, she would remain for minutes with the comb in her hair as though petrified, and she would stare at the strange face which looked back at her from the wooden framed mirror which hung on the otherwise bare wall in front of her — a pale, mealy, almost bloated face, with half-open, somewhat livid lips, and large, amazed, vacuous eyes. Then, suddenly recovering from her blankness, she would shake her head, comb her hair, sing softly to herself, rise with some difficulty, and approach the mirror, so that, for a moment, her image would disappear in the vapour of her breath. When it reappeared, a queer expression of sorrow would seem to suffuse it — an expression which Theresa had not noticed before.

On a clear day in February, when she had just read a chapter in a novel in which the activities of a large city at night were temptingly described, the desire awoke in her to go again and see something equally happy and brilliant; and it seemed to her that nothing could be easier than to satisfy this longing. All that was necessary was to conceal her face behind a veil; with her figure, she felt certain that no one would recognize her.

Late in the afternoon, she left the house. At first, she felt a perceptible heaviness in her limbs, which, however, disappeared as though by magic as soon as Theresa arrived on a principal thoroughfare whose long and well-illuminated parallels seemed but to hint of still brighter and more beautiful regions. She rode on the street-car to the opera, allowed herself to be pushed forward by the crowds, stopped here and there in front of window displays, and was both excited and overjoyed at all the light, the noise, and the crowds.

She attended to a few minor, long-needed purchases; and it gave her a queer feeling to be spoken to, for the first time in her life, as "gnàdige Frau." When she left the store, a great feeling of lassitude overcame her. She hastened home, and went to bed at once.

Frau Kausick asked her casually what plans she had made for the near future.

"You cannot possibly remain here," said she, "and I think it high time that you looked about for a suitable place."

Frau Kausick mentioned the Foundling Hospital. Theresa shuddered at the thought. On the following morning, she went out to look for a room.

XLII

THE UNDERTAKING PROVED to be more difficult than she had anticipated. Every room had its own drawbacks, which were not at first apparent. It thus happened that Theresa had to change her residence three times in several weeks. Then, at last, she found a room on the fourth floor of a rooming house. It was kept by an old woman, was very clean and neat — and, by luck, was not above a room where children could be heard crying and screaming, or a drunken couple quarreling at every hour. The landlady seemed, from her appearance and speech, to belong to the better class. At home, she wore a faded, though well-made dress of pink satin, and while house-cleaning, which she herself attended to, she wore long gloves, which showed signs of frequent mending. During the first few days, she spoke only briefly to Theresa as she prepared her humble lunch, and seemed not to desire to enter into a more protracted conversation. In the afternoon, she usually left the house not to return until late at night.

Hence, Theresa was much alone; and when alone, she loved to take advantage of her privilege to use the so-called parlour. With its bright curtains and the oil paintings on the wall, the parlour seemed more pleasant than Theresa's bare room. After many changes of lodgings which she had made in the last few weeks, she felt so tired and heavy that she could hardly bring herself to go out of the house. She stopped reading books, but still continued to read the newspapers, which she devoured from the first to the last word, in a thoroughly mechanical manner, without really knowing in the end what the news of the day really was. Then she attempted to recall to her memory the various people who had been of significance in her life. But she seldom succeeded in concentrating her attention on any definite person, even for a short time. All the images disappeared at once, and they all floated about, vague and remote, like figures fancied in a dream. She fared no better even when she thought about herself. Once again she contemplated herself objectively. She felt lost; she could not comprehend her being or her fate — that the bloated body upon which she gazed, the hands which lay clasped upon her knees, really belonged to her; that her father had died in an insane asylum; that she had been the sweetheart of a Lieutenant, that in some Moravian or Bohemian village, or God knows where, somewhere out in the world, lived a man whose child she was bearing. All this seemed as unreal to her as the child itself — the child which, these many weeks, had given unmistakable signs of its existence, and whose heart she could feel beating in unison with her own.

It seemed to her as if some time in the past, she had loved this still unborn child. She hardly knew when, and whether it had been for an hour or for many days. Now she experienced none of this love. Neither did she feel surprise or regret that things stood with her as they did.

A mother... she knew that she was destined to become one, that she was actually a mother already; but it really concerned her not at all. She asked herself: would it have been different, if she had fulfilled the duties of her sex in a more fitting way than that fated to her; for example, if she were legally bound to the father of the child, or if, as a wife, she awaited the hour of birth in a well-ordered home. But all this was so far beyond her comprehension she could not even visualize it as a happy state.

Now and then, she was visited by another fancy. Since she felt no mother love stirring within her — no longing for, and hardly any knowledge of the child — perhaps, after all, it might be a delusion, a monstrous mistake. She had once read or heard of cases which bore all the resemblances of pregnancy, but yet were not. Was it possible, since her soul knew nothing and desired to know nothing of the child, that that which she had experienced physically in the past months was nothing else than repentance, bad conscience, fear — emotions which she denied to herself, and which betrayed their presence in this manner? The strangest thing, however, was that she did not long for her term of pregnancy to end; on the contrary she felt a certain diffidence about having to return to the world which she had left. Would she ever again be able to adapt herself to the normal routine of life; ever again be able to talk with intelligent people, and follow a regular routine of business. Could she ever again be a woman among women? She was now far removed from any willing or doing; and she had no other connection with the world than the bit of blue sky which she could see as she leaned back in the corner of the sofa. Thus, Theresa's mind willingly lost itself in idle speculations, as though she perceived that, as soon as she returned to practicality, only sorrow and pain would await her.

What appeared at times as somewhat strange to Theresa, was the circumstance that Frau Nebling seemed to notice absolutely nothing of her condition. At any rate, she did not take the slightest interest in it. At noon, the two women would sit together; in the afternoons, Frau Nebling always left the house, not to return before a late hour. At times, the consciousness of her solitude completely overwhelmed Theresa, like a sudden shock. Once she decided to invite Sylvia to come to see her and wrote her a short note. But when the latter called to see her on the following Sunday, Theresa instructed Frau Nebling to inform her that she had again moved away, she did not know where.

One day, as she was looking out of the window, she saw her brother rounding the corner. She quickly retreated into the room and feared for a few minutes that he had seen her and had gone into the house to ask for her. But immediately she felt annoyed at this silly apprehension because, as she said to herself, there was no man in the world to whom she was less responsible than to him. Furthermore, she felt quite secure from detection.

Frau Nebling had not even hinted that Theresa's further stay would be uncomfortable or painful to her. She did not lack money, for the time being. "And if it becomes necessary," thought Theresa, "I can have a doctor called who will be sworn to secrecy. It is unthinkable that Frau Nebling would turn me out of the house with a child on only a day's notice. Whatever happens, I shall manage to set things in order here, without having to hurry."

During these days, she toyed at times with the idea of writing to Alfred. She knew, however, that she would not do so; but this was a picture which she loved to embroider. She would imagine him calling on her, deeply moved by her plight — very deeply moved. She dreamed on — he still loved her, and surely he would also love her child; he had made her his wife; he was a country doctor, and they lived in a beautiful region; she bore him two children, no, three. And was he not really the father of this first child whom she was expecting? That fellow, Kasimir Tobisch — did he really exist? Had he not always seemed somewhat like a ghost? He might have been Satan himself!

Alfred was her friend — her only friend. Yes, he was her lover, even though he knew nothing about it. And his appearance took on a new and wonderful transformation in the recollection of her heart. His soft, much too soft features were ennobled, so that he almost appeared to her in the image of a saint. His voice seemed to her, through the distances of time, to be low and sweet; and when, in her retrospective thoughts, she saw him tenderly embracing her in that wide, dark field at home, she felt as though she were soaring with him above the earth, heaven-bent.

XLIII

On a night in April, ten days earlier than she had anticipated, Theresa was surprised by the pangs of childbirth. She leaped out of bed and knocked on Frau Nebling's door. The landlady was not yet home. She thought of running downstairs, or at least of calling to the porter's wife from the landing. But she stopped before she reached the door: the pains had already abated. She turned back into her room and got into bed. A few minutes later, the pains began to manifest themselves again.

"Is there still time to get to a hospital?" she asked herself. "Shall I call a carriage from the window? Could I not manage to go there on foot? It is not far from here."

She rose again, opened her bureau, and began to remove pieces of clothing and linen. Then, exhausted, she dropped her hands and sat down again. A short while later, she paced up and down the room in renewed, ever more harrowing pain. Then she returned to her bed, lay down, and moaned and sobbed. Could she be heard? She wanted people to hear her.

"Why should they not hear me? Is what is happening to me shameful? Nobody in the house knows who I am. My name itself means little. But why did I give them the right one? Why did I stay in Vienna, anyhow? Couldn't I have hidden away in the country? Is it really possible? Am I actually bearing a child? I, Theresa Fabiani, the daughter of a Lieutenant and of a noble lady — am I bearing a child? Will it really be true that I have borne an illegitimate child?"

Frau Nebling suddenly appeared at the open door, her eyes wide with fright. She had heard Theresa's cries below on the stairs.

"What, have I cried? Oh, it was nothing. It can't be anything yet. At the very earliest, there will still be ten days. I was only startled at awakening from a bad dream."

Frau Nebling left, reassured. Theresa heard the moving of furniture and the hushed voices in the next room, which she had become accustomed to hear every evening. A window was opened, then closed again. She began to fall asleep. Then, suddenly, the pain returned. She fought it down again with great effort, clenching a handkerchief between her teeth and stretching her arms on the pillow.

"Am I mad?" she asked herself. "What am I doing? What do I want? Oh, if only I could die! Perhaps I am dying! Then everything will be all right. What shall I do with my child? What will my brother say about it?"

All the modesty of her girlhood days awakened again within her. It seemed inexplicable to her, like the evil deception of a nightmare — such a thing as happens only to others, or such as one might read about in the newspapers and in novels. But that such a thing should actually be in the process of being fulfilled upon her was incredible.

"Perhaps there is still time to make an end of it all!" she thought. Then, suddenly, she cried out: "Help! Help!" Again she jumped out of bed and dragged herself through the hall to the door of Frau Nebling's room. She listened a moment, then knocked. There was no sound. Then she recovered her self-possession.

"What do I want of Frau Nebling? I don't need her. I don't need anybody. I want to be alone, just as I have been for so long a time. I like it better that way."

She lay quietly in her bed, until the pains suddenly overwhelmed her with such mighty force that she could not even cry out.

"Now," she thought, "now it is too late to call for any help. No, no! Help! No! I want to die! It is best that I should die — I, and the child, and the whole world with us!"

XLIV

RELIEF HAD come at last. An exhaustion, deep as death, yet filling her with joy, took possession of Theresa as she lay on the bed. The candle on the table had been burning the whole night. "When did I light it?" She could not recall. And there was the child. There it lay, with its half-open, blinking eyes and a wrinkled, ugly, senile face.

He is probably dead. Surely it is dead. And if it is not yet dead, it will surely die in the next moment. "That is exactly what ought to happen, for the mother who bore you must also die!"

She lacked the strength to turn her head. Her lids kept closing in spite of her efforts to stay awake, and she breathed short, deep sighs.

Suddenly it seemed to her that the child's features had moved; its arms and feet moved also, and its mouth was pursed as though it were about to cry. She heard a soft, complaining voice. Theresa was amazed. Now that the child gave evidence of life, its presence became strangely ominous; yes, even threatening.

"My child!" she thought. "And this child is an independent being, existing for itself alone! It has breath, sight, and a wee, small voice; a very tiny bright little voice, which comes from a new, live soul! And it is my child! But I do not love it. Why do I not love it, since it is my child? Perhaps it is merely because I am so tired; too tired to love anything on earth."

And it seemed then to her that she would never recover from her utter weariness.

"Why should you want to come into the world?" she asked, in the depths of her heart, of the gently whimpering, wrinkled creature, as she stretched out her right arm toward it and tried to draw it close to her. "What will you do in the world, without father, or mother? And what shall I do with you? It is well that you are soon to die. I will tell everybody that you never really lived at all. Who will care? Were you not already dead? Did I not consult three or four women, so that you might not be born? What shall I do with you now? Can I travel about the world with you? I must worry about other people's children. I would have to give you away, just the same. I could not keep you. I already killed you, three or four times, before you were born. What shall I do with a dead child, my whole life long? Dead children belong in the grave!

"I cannot throw you out of the window, or into the river, or in the canal. God preserve me from that! I will only look at you severely, so that you may know that you are dead. The instant you know that you are dead, you will fall asleep and pass into eternal life. It won't be long, and I shall soon follow you. Oh, look at all the blood!

Frau Nebling, Frau Nebling! Oh, why am I calling her? They will find me soon enough. Come, my babe! Come, my little Kasimir! You don't want to be a bad man, like your father, do you? Come! You will lie comfortably here. I will cover you well, so that nothing, nothing, will hurt you. Here, under the pillow, it is good to sleep, good to die. Another pillow, so that you may be warmer. Goodbye, my child! One of us will never awaken — or both of us, perhaps — never again! I mean it for your good, my sweet little child. I am not the right mother for you. I do not deserve you. You must not live. I am here for other children; I have no time for you. Good-night! goodnight!..."

Theresa awoke as from a horrible dream. She wanted to weep, but could not achieve tears.

"What has really happened? Where is the child? Did they take it away from me? Is it dead? Was it buried? What have I done with my child?"

Then she perceived the pillows piled high beside her. She pushed them away, and beheld the child. It lay there; it opened its lips; its nostrils distended; it moved its fingers; it sneezed. Theresa breathed deeply; she felt herself smiling, and knew that she had tears in her eyes. She drew the baby close to her, took him in her arms, and pressed him to her breast. He snuggled against her and drank.

Theresa groaned. She looked round. It was an awakening like none that she had ever known. The early morning light filtered into the room. The bristling noises of the day penetrated to her. The world was awake.

"My child, my child!" sobbed Theresa. "It lives, lives, lives! But who will nurse it, when I am dead? For I want to die! I must die!"

But her longing for death was tinged with a singular sentiment of bliss. The child would drink her life out of her soul. He would suck her life into his, drop by drop, and her own lips would become hard and dry.

She stretched out her arm for the cup of tea which had been standing on the night table since the previous evening. But she feared to disturb the child, and hesitated an instant. The child, however, as though understanding, stopped suckling, thus enabling Theresa to grasp the cup. In fact, she had strength enough to sit somewhat more erect, and to bring the cup to her lips. With her other arm, she continued to hold the child; to hold it tightly. And to her memory came the picture of that distant hour in a wretched little hotel room when she had been loved by a strange man, and had received this child.

That hour, and this one; that night, and this morning; that frenzy, and this perfect clarity of mind — was it possible that they had any connection whatever? She drew the boy closer to herself, and knew that he belonged to her alone.

When Frau Nebling entered the room, she showed not the slightest trace of astonishment at what had happened.

Without losing time or asking questions, she attended, with the skill of a midwife, to everything which the occasion required. It was now apparent that she had anticipated every possible need. A physician appeared — an elderly, cheerful man, dressed in the fashion of a past generation. He sat down at Theresa's bed, examined her, gave orders and advice, and, on leaving, pinched her cheek in a fatherly, somewhat hesitant manner.

On this and on the ensuing day, Theresa received as much attention as could be bestowed, during the time immediately after a confinement, on a blissful young wife in, her well-ordered home.

XLV

FRAU NEBLING SEEMED a person transformed since the birth of the child. She who was formerly so silent, now chatted with Theresa as if she were an old friend. Without having to ask questions, Theresa learned much of her life. Among other things she ascertained that she was engaged by a light opera company to play the part of an elderly lady, but that, during the few weeks past, she had not been required. She had been thrice a mother; her children were alive, but living abroad. She failed to inform Theresa whether or not she was married, or about the common parentage of children, just as Theresa failed to mention the paternity of her own child and the circumstances of her sorrowful experience.

Much as they discussed motherhood and the happiness of being a mother, they had little to tell each other about the happiness and the pangs of love, as though these things had not the remotest connection with the pangs and the joys of motherhood.

The doctor came to see Theresa several times after this, but rather to pay her friendly visits, than because of any real need of his attentions. It turned out that he was the house physician at the theatre, and was a good friend of Frau Nebling. Occasionally he told, with a certain dry humour, several anecdotes out of his experience; and some of these held a double meaning, which Theresa did not at all resent.

There was another frequent visitor — a young woman who lived in the same house: the childless wife of an ill-paid clerk, who was away all day at his employment. She would sit on the edge of Theresa's bed, and stare with moist eyes at the week-old child as the mother held him to her breast.

After a week, Theresa began to realize that she must soon make her plans for the future. As it developed, Frau Nebling's activities had anticipated her even on this point. One day, a chubby little country woman arrived, and offered to undertake the care of the child in her own home, for a relatively small monthly payment. She had brought along her own eight-year-old girl, whose red cheeks inspired confidence, even if she did squint a little.

She explained that she had often taken care of children. The last one had just left her house, the parents having married and taken the little one with them. She mentioned this with a friendly smile, as though it might be taken as a portent of felicity for Theresa. A few days later, Theresa, holding her youngster in her arms, sat beside Frau Nebling in a one-horse cart, which took them to the railway station. Soon after they left the house, a pedestrian at a street corner crossed in front of the wagon and chanced to glance up at its occupants.

Only the instant before, Theresa had taken the precaution of leaning back under the half-open cover. But a gleam in the pedestrian's eye assured her that he had seen and recognized her, just as she had him.

It was Alfred, and it touched Theresa deeply that he should see her in such circumstances, after so long a period of separation. It happened, by mere chance, much to Theresa's delight, that, just a second before, Frau Nebling had taken the child for a moment out of Theresa's arms into her own.

"That was the man!" said Theresa, as though to herself, with a happy smile.

Frau Nebling looked out of the wagon, to the rear, and faced Theresa again.

"The young man with the gray hat?" she asked.

Theresa nodded.

"He is still standing there," said Frau Nebling significantly.

And only now it dawned upon Theresa that, after her cry of recognition, Frau Nebling had undoubtedly taken the young man with the gray hat to be the father of the child. Theresa did not trouble to inform her of her error. It curiously pleased her to be so misunderstood, and she remained silently smiling until they had reached the station.

XLVI

AFTER A RIDE of hardly two hours in the crawling train, they reached their destination. The woman, Frau Leutner, awaited them at the station. They walked through the village, past comfortable little villas, most of which were still unoccupied, until they reached a narrow side lane which led up a steep incline to a not unattractive house, surrounded by blossoming fruit trees. Despite the low elevation, the situation afforded a considerable view of the whole neighbourhood. The village, a humble summer resort, lay at their feet; the railway tracks disappeared in the distance. The main thoroughfare was soon lost among the forest-clad hills. Behind the farmhouse lay a meadow, reaching to a stone wall whose upper edge was overgrown with bushes. In a clean, low-raftered room, the farmer's wife served her guests with milk, bread, and butter, and began at once to busy herself about Theresa's child, all the while explaining in great detail how she would nourish and attend it.

Then, while Frau Nebling remained with the child, she showed Theresa about the house. She took her to see the garden, the chicken coop, and the barn. The farmer himself, a tall fellow with drooping whiskers, came home from the fields. His body bent forward in walking. He said little, observed the child with glassy eyes, nodded a few times, shook Theresa's hand, and left.

Agnes, the eight-year-old child, returned from school and seemed pleased at finding that there was a baby in the house again. She took him in her arms; her whole behaviour indicated that she already perfectly understood how to deal with babies. In the meantime, Frau Nebling reclined on her raincoat beneath an oak tree, which stood in majestic isolation a little to the side of the house, and on whose massive trunk was suspended a picture of the Virgin Mary, framed in wood, protected by a glass pane, and surrounded by a faded wreath.

Time flew by. Only when the moment of leave-taking approached, did Theresa begin to realize that she must part with her child, and that, despite her many worries, an exceptional and beautiful epoch in her life was ending. On the way home, she spoke not a word to Frau Nebling. When she finally reached the house where everything reminded her of her boy, she felt as though she were returning from his funeral.

She awoke in a bad mood the next morning. Nothing would have pleased her more than to revisit Ensbach. A sudden rainstorm prevented this. The day after, it rained and stormed again. Not until the fourth day could she be with her child again.

It was a mild spring day. They sat out in the open under the pale blue sky, whose hue reflected in the eyes of her child.

Frau Leutner discussed in detail all sorts of domestic and farm matters, and narrated her many experiences during the years which she had devoted to the care of children.

This time, her husband joined them and remained a little longer, though still, for the most part, as silent as ever. Agnes appeared for dinner, paid little attention to the child, and soon afterwards ran off.

Theresa departed, more reassured and less sad than on the former occasion.

She remarked to Frau Nebling that same evening, that it was high time she began looking for work. Again Frau Nebling had anticipated her, and instantly supplied her with a number of addresses. Before the next day had run its course, Theresa had interviewed several ladies, and before evening had her choice of three positions. She chose one where she would have only a seven-year-old girl to supervise. The father was a rich merchant, the mother a good-natured, somewhat phlegmatic woman. The child was docile and pretty.

Theresa felt quite happy in her new surroundings. She had made arrangements to have a day off every other Sunday, and one afternoon every other week. Until late in the summer, her employers interposed no difficulties in the matter, but on a certain beautiful morning in July, the mistress, for some reason or other, asked Theresa to dispense this time with her day off, and instead to select any day during the following week that might be agreeable to her. Theresa, however, had been looking forward with eagerness to seeing her child. Contrary to her usual attitude, she insisted with unnecessary vehemence on her rights, which were finally granted. But this occasioned her discharge, and she had to leave the house after the customary notice.

XLVII

SHE SOON FOUND another position in the house of a doctor, as governess of two girls and a boy. The two girls, aged respectively ten and eight years, attended school, and in addition, received instruction at home in French and piano. The six-year-old boy was entrusted entirely to the care of Theresa. It was a model household. There she found everything conducive to comfort, without superfluous luxuries; the marital relationship was ideal, and all the children were docile and well bred. And despite the invariably strenuous day's work from which the doctor returned, there was never a word of impatience or unkindness, never a trace of sullenness, or even an occasional quarrel such as she had been accustomed to witness in so many other families.

Toward the middle of August, she was enabled to spend three entire days with her child. Unfortunately, two of these days were rainy ones. There were times when, sitting in the stuffy room with the farmer's family, a feeling of boredom and emptiness overpowered her. When she clearly realized this, she would rush, as though driven by a twinge of guilt, to the side of her child, who lay quietly sleeping in his crib. In the dim light of this rainy day, his tiny round face appeared to her unusually pale, small, and strange. With some fear, she would breathe on the eye-lids of the child, who at first would make a face as if about to cry, but, recognizing the well-remembered features of his mother looking down at him, began to smile instead. Theresa, overjoyed, would then take the child in her arms, fondle it, and weep with happiness. The farmer's wife, apparently moved, prophesied a happy future for her, and especially a good father for the boy. But Theresa shook her head at this. She declared that she had no intention or desire to share her darling with any one. He belonged to her, and would continue to be hers alone.

The parting was particularly difficult after these three days. When Theresa arrived at Semmering, where Frau Regan was vacationing with the children, she could not conceal her melancholy from the mother and children. In her gentle and friendly manner, without asking a single question, Frau Regan expressed the hope that the fresh mountain air would soon strengthen her. Impulsively, Theresa kissed her hand with emotion, but at the same moment decided not to betray her secret. As a matter of fact, she recovered much more quickly than she had anticipated. Her colour improved, as did her disposition. Strolls and mountain walks were the order of the day. The easy-going familiarity of the summer resort made it possible for her occasionally to meet certain young and elderly gentlemen who refused to respect her wishes for solitude. She resisted all attempts at intimacy. When, during the first days of September, the family returned to town, she did not regret it, but was on the contrary happy to be so near her child again.

The few hours at Ensbach, each week or fortnight, were hours of purest joy. And that feeling of emptiness and monotony, which had overtaken her that rainy summer day, never returned, not even during the dreariest days of autumn. In anticipation, she somewhat feared the winter trips, but soon found her apprehensions on this score unwarranted.

When the farm was snow-covered, nothing was more delightful than to hold her child in her arms and, from the well-heated room, gaze through the windows at the prospect of a white landscape dotted with sleepy cottages and, in the distance, the tiny railway station, from which the dark tracks converged in the distance.

Then came beautiful, spring-heralding days, when she fled the smoky city and found not only spaciousness and release, but also the pleasant companionship of the farm. Her boy on her lap, she would sit on a bench in front of the house and bathe herself in the glorious sunshine.

When spring returned, Theresa fancied that she perceived a portentous connection between the development of her child and the rebirth of Nature. The day when the first cherry blossoms appeared was likewise the day on which her boy ran toward her a few steps without assistance. The day on which the rosebushes of the white villa “Good Rest” in the Bahnhofstrasse were liberated from their straw coverings, was the very one in which Franz cut his second eye-tooth. On one of the gladdest days in April — for this had been an unusually long winter — on her way to the farmhouse, she surveyed the landscape, with its forests, gardens, and hills, clad in its early green dress. Then she caught sight of her little boy, held tightly by the farmer’s wife, standing at the window and clapping his little hands as he watched his mother approach across the meadow with a small package in her hand — for she always brought something along for him. And on a certain day in June, when she picked the first ripe cherries, the boy had, for the first time, spoken a few connected words.

XLVIII

THREE YEARS FOLLOWED — years so similar in their passage, that later, in Theresa's memory, one spring always merged into the other, one summer into its counterpart, and so with autumn, and winter. And this, despite the fact — or perhaps because of the fact — that she led a sort of double existence: the one as governess to the Regan family, the other as the mother of a small boy, who was staying in the country under the care of peasants.

Even on the way to Ensbach, when she went to spend an occasional day there, everything that she left behind her in the city, disappeared; the Regan couple and their children disappeared; the house disappeared, and even the room which she occupied. The whole city was enveloped in a gray mist of unfamiliarity, of which the reality slowly dawned on her only when she left the train, and sometimes not until she had actually entered the house.

But when she sat at table with the Regan family, or played with the children, or took walks with them, or when, her duties completed, she stretched her weary body on the bed, then reappeared the familiar Ensbach landscape, brilliant in the summer sunshine, or covered with the white frost of winter; the house on the hill, with a green or white blanket; the oak tree with the flower-decked image of the Virgin Mary; the rustic couple on the bench before the house or in the low living-room beside the stove. Always it seemed an incredible, fairy-like world. And always, like a marvel, when slowly climbing the sloping road to the Leutner farm, she saw everything as she had left it days or weeks before; and she could see her boy, the same and yet always a different creature, in her arms or on her lap. And it happened sometimes, when she closed her eyes for a short time and then opened them again, that somehow a different lad lay in her arms than him whom she had imagined with her eyes shut.

But things were not always so pleasant as her hopes had pictured them. There were times when Herr Leutner was sullen for long periods. Even the farmer's wife too, usually good-tempered and much inclined to gossip, was sometimes altogether different, unfriendly, and positively combative. On such occasions, when Theresa ventured the slightest criticism, she would make vicious remarks, complaining about the trouble which the boy gave her and the insufficient thanks and appreciation which Theresa gave her for her efforts.

Even after continued increase of payment, much resentment remained. Once they had forgotten to let Theresa know that her child had a rather mild illness. Or items would be added to her account for medicines which could not be properly accounted for. Again and again, Theresa thought she detected, by one sign or another, proofs that Frau Leutner by no means cared for the child as much as she professed. On other occasions, jealous feelings aroused, not only between Theresa and the farmer's wife, but between Theresa and young Agnes. Then Theresa would complain that Frau Leutner and her daughter spoiled the child by too great attention, as though they wished to alienate its affections from her. And, sometimes, bad weather was not exactly conducive to happy thoughts and harmonious feelings. It was enough to drive a person mad, this sitting with wet feet in the cold or over-heated room, which reeked of cheap tobacco smoke, and which was certainly detrimental to the child's lungs.

Theresa several times decided not to ride out to Ensbach, and would let one or two free Sundays pass without seeing her child. At other times, she believed that she could hardly contain her longing, which was so greatly impregnated with fear that her nights were troubled with baleful dreams.

On the whole, however, everything ran smoothly. Theresa often thought herself infinitely happier than many a mother who had her children always with her and could not therefore fully appreciate her happiness. As for her, the meetings with her child, at least in anticipation, always afforded her the thrill of a holiday.

She was, moreover, quite happy in the Regan house. The doctor, not quite devoid of pride in his work, always remained pleasant, despite the strenuous nature of his profession. Frau Regan continued, moreover, to be a very exacting, though always fair and never moody housewife. The girls were lively, yet diligent and obedient, and greatly attached to their governess. The boy had a quiet nature and a distinct inclination to music, so that already in his eighth year he could, on musical evenings, render the piano accompaniment for Haydn and Mozart quartettes. Theresa often played duets with him, and received, on such evenings, her humble share of the applause. In the atmosphere of activity, order, and respectability which surrounded her here, she was concerned more than ever before with her own instruction, and found time somewhat to further her own musical and linguistic studies.

In this well-ordered existence, there were small occurrences which interrupted the habitual routine of the day.

Whenever Frau Fabiani came to Vienna, on occasional business with publishers and editors, the Regan family would graciously insist on having the governess' mother to dinner. On these occasions, Frau Fabiani displayed a faultless, even actually dignified behaviour. She would take the opportunity to mention her son, a student of medicine, who, despite his extreme youth, had already begun to play an important role in the University, and had recently made a speech at the students' meeting that provoked comment.

After one of these maternal visitations, Theresa met her brother, whom she had not seen in several months, in the city. They discussed their mother, to whose last novel, now appearing serially in a Viennese newspaper, Karl referred with derision and contempt. Theresa felt singularly hurt. Brother and sister bade each other a cold farewell. At the next corner, Theresa turned to regard her brother, and noticed how little to his advantage he had changed in the lapse of only a few years. True, he dressed more carefully than before. But the drooping posture of his head, his somewhat too long, poorly shorn hair, which brushed against his coat collar, and his hopping gait, gave to his whole bearing an ignoble, hesitant, and degraded atmosphere which repelled her.

At first, she had several times felt the obligation of visiting Frau Nebling. One evening, she attended an operetta, for which the actress had presented her with a complimentary ticket. Frau Nebling sang in a shrill, strange voice, and played the part of an elderly, overdressed vampire. She acted in such fashion that Theresa almost blushed for her, and shuddered at the thought that one of her sons might return from abroad and see his own mother in such an indecent costume, painted with scarlet rouge, and prancing about the stage with lecherous looks and demeanour, to the derision even of her fellow actors.

Once, on the street, she fancied that she saw Kasimir Tobisch approaching her. But she was mistaken, for there was hardly any similarity between the father of her child and the gentleman who brushed past her. And when such mistakes occurred to her two or three times thereafter in quick succession, and she always experienced the same painful excitement, she realized that she actually feared to meet Kasimir Tobisch. She did not wish him, of all persons, to hear anything more of her life, and especially, of the existence of the child. But she was even more thrilled when she thought that she recognized, in some passerby, Alfred, whom she would have liked to see again. Though she knew that he lived in the same city, no fortunate accident ever brought them together.

Even the summer weeks with the Regan family, though spent at a different mountain resort each year, became miraculously merged in her mind into a single summer vacation.

Later, she could not differentiate, in her memory, the many young and old men who, at the country resorts, had tried to flirt with her. That none really succeeded in the attempt was not so much due to her own resistance, or carefulness, or indifference — for in contrast with many precedent and subsequent periods of her life, her senses in these years seemed atrophied — as to the lack of freedom necessitated by her work, which constantly prevented any budding relationship from ripening into intimacy.

It would occasionally happen that she became quite envious of more successful women when, on mild summer evenings, she observed ladies who, after the governesses had retired with the children to their rooms, could promenade up and down the brilliantly illumined square near the hotel, walk as long as they liked and with whomever they willed; or even disappear in the dark. She saw — this, of course, was nothing new to her — women, matrons, and young girls exchange significant glances with men and carry on flirtations; she well knew to what such beginnings generally led.

Frau Regan, though still a pretty, quite attractive, and desirable lady, was one of the few who seemed almost entirely untouched by the prevailing atmosphere. This afforded Theresa some comfort, and she felt protected and guarded in her presence.

Nothing suggested an impending change. Dr. Regan and his wife still continued to treat her with friendliness, and even affection. A kind of friendship had developed between her and the girls, especially the elder. Her duet playing with the gifted boy had become a pleasant habit. Suddenly, one morning in June, just before they were to leave for the country, Frau Regan called her to her room and told her, with some uneasiness, though in a firm and businesslike manner, that they had decided to employ a French governess, and that consequently they must let her go, though, of course, they should do so with the greatest regret. She explained that there was no hurry about her departure. They would give her weeks, or months even, to find another suitable position. For the immediate future, Theresa could decide, according to her own wishes, whether she cared to accompany the Regan family to the Dolomites, or whether, under the circumstances, she would prefer to have the entire summer vacation at her disposal.

Theresa stood pale, stricken to the heart; but she declared at once, without betraying any of the emotions which she felt at this abrupt dismissal, that she would not take advantage of Frau Regan's offer, but would, if possible, leave the house even before the expiration of the usual two weeks' notice.

It appeared strange to her that her unhappiness did not long continue. Indeed, in that same hour, she experienced a certain pleasure, almost a decided joy, at the prospect of a change. She quickly confessed to herself that she had by no means been as happy in this house as she had many times tried to convince herself that she was. And on the following day, when she spoke of her dismissal to Fraulein Steinbauer, the governess in a family that was friendly with the Regans, the governess — an old, embittered creature — quickly convinced Theresa that she had simply been exploited in the Regan house, and was now thrown out into the streets — a destiny repeatedly experienced by all of her kind. The constant kindness of Frau Regan now appeared to her as a mixture of weakness and deception. The selfsatisfied and self-sufficing character of the beloved doctor had always been hateful to her, she now realized. The boy, though truly a highly talented musician, was mentally backward; and the girls, although one could not deny their industry, were nevertheless mediocre. The younger was already somewhat spoiled, while the older one was not without guile. She felt that Frau Regan had long ago informed the girls about the change that was to be made. Falseness and hypocrisy existed everywhere.

She left the house with bitterness in her heart, and swore never to enter it again.

XLIX

THERESA SPENT THE next few weeks in Ensbach, with her child. The country life calmed her. Indeed, at first, it made her so happy that she conceived the idea of looking for pupils among the summer residents, so as possibly to establish herself there, rather than among the city people, whose children she educated only to be dismissed in the end.

She met a number of the townsfolk with whom she would occasionally chat; they sympathized with her and her boy. Some time before, she had made the acquaintance of a cousin of Frau Leutner, one Sebastian Stiozuer, a man still in his prime, who had lately become widowed. He was not at all bad-looking, was well built, in comfortable circumstances, and was seeking a second wife to care for his home.

It happened, not exactly by chance, that he often called on the Leutners, and on these visits he amused Theresa with his naïve and humorous ways. He would also occupy himself, in a touchingly clumsy fashion, with her boy. His, growing inclination for her was manifest.

Frau Leutner did not fail to convey clear hints, and there were times when Theresa seriously considered a possible alliance with him. But the longer he visited her, and the more plainly he conveyed his sentiments, especially on one occasion when, walking together, he had drawn her to him with unexpected brutal strength — the more consciously did she feel that there could never be a lasting affection between them. This she showed so plainly that he instantly withdrew his suit.

But when, following her refusal, boredom seized her, she at first accused herself because the companionship of her boy did not utterly engross her. Then she would tell herself that, despite her love for her boy, she was simply incapable of enduring inactivity any longer; that, furthermore, she had no right to lead an idle life on the farm, without working, and without giving thought to the matter of earning a living.

AND SO, SUMMER was still far from ended when she again took a position, this time with a family that at first struck Theresa as being quite fashionable. She was to act as teacher or companion to a fourteen-year-old girl. Several days after accepting the post, she accompanied this family on a trip to a small health resort in Styria, where they took lodgings in a hotel that was far from immaculate. The husband, a prominent public official, remained behind in Vienna.

The Baroness was polite enough to Theresa, but never addressed a single superfluous word to her. The people who lived at the resort were, for the most part old, gouty, and rheumatic. A thin, poorly dressed man of about sixty, who, much to Theresa's bewilderment, bore the name of a famous old family of Hungarian nobles, would sometimes, after dinner, hobble over to their table, leaning on his cane, and converse with them in his native language. Otherwise, they associated with nobody. In addition, the meals were so insufficient and poor that Theresa was reminded of the bitterest days of her youth.

At times, when she was alone with the young Baroness, Theresa would attempt to provoke some sort of conversation with her, by making jesting remarks about the people whom they met on their walks and in the park. But the girl was apparently unable to appreciate any harmless jest, much less understand it; and all that Theresa could get in response was a belated, if not entirely stupid, reply.

They travelled back to Vienna during the most distressing heat of the summer. The meals at home did not prove to be by any means more interesting, even though the husband now shared them. When, for the first time, Theresa had the opportunity to go to Ensbach, she breathed deeply, as though she had just escaped from a prison. From a distance, the house of the Baroness, in which she was now condemned to live, appeared even worse than ever — positively weird. She could hardly understand how she had managed to endure it for so long a time. She put off leaving from week to week, however, perhaps through sheer indifference, or perhaps because she was impressed by the unction of a noble name. But at last, when, at Christmas time, they presented her with a ridiculously small present of money, her patience came to an end, and she gave notice of her intention to find another post.

LI

BUT NOW, EVIL days overtook her. It almost seemed as though fate had decreed that she should witness at close range all the annoyances and ugliness of bourgeois family life. Or was it merely that she had become more observant than before? Three times in succession, she came in contact with unsuccessful marriages. First, it was a young couple, who, without regard for their two children of, six and eight years, and without the slightest regard for Theresa, said such frightful things to each other over their meals that Theresa believed she would die of shame.

At the first quarrel which she witnessed, she simply left the table. When, a few days later, she attempted to do the same thing, the husband called her back, demanding that she should remain, in order that he might have a witness to the cursing to which his wife subjected him. The next time, it was the wife who demanded the same service of Theresa. Both often entertained company at home, on which occasions, they acted the part of a happy couple before the guests. At times, though — and this was a thing quite incomprehensible to Theresa — the couple seemed to understand one another quite perfectly; and just as Theresa had been an unwilling witness of their mutual execrations, so at times she was forced to witness scenes of tenderness, which moved her even more painfully and disagreeably than the more frequent quarrels.
